Not a Case of Corpo-Rabies.

THE LINCOLN-ROOSEVELT REPUBLICAN LEAGUE is not running amuck among corporations. It is not afflicted with that form of rabies or any other. It recognizes that a great share of the world's business must be done through corporations until such time as the evolution of the race may enable co-operations to take the place of corporations, and that time has not yet come; but when a corporation steps aside from its chartered authorization to do business to undertake the function of government itself it is, in the League's opinion, time to call a halt upon that corporation and its hirelings and compel it to attend to its legitimate business and leave that of the public alone or take the consequences. A proved complicity of a corporation in the subjugation of a free government should be held treasonable and should involve the death of such corporation through a forfeiture of its charter. Judged by this standard the Southern Pacific company has deserved death a thousand times and ought to "get it in the neck," at least once.

The Amendment Accepted.

THE EDITOR OF THIS PAPER, at the state conference of Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican Leaguers held at Oakland on Monday, gave it as his opinion that the Republican State Central Committee of California is probably the only deliberative body on earth that does not have the right to "choose" its own officers, and insisted that such right should at all times have been enjoyed. The Oakland Enquirer, in reporting the statement, with rare sagacity, substituted the word "shoot" for "choose." The amendment is thankfully accepted. The members of the Republican State Committee should, at all times, have enjoyed that unhampered privilege.

Out of the Fog.

HAVING SUSTAINED THE SHOCK of a broadside from the San Francisco Star for two successive weeks, not without casualties, the editor of this paper is willing to concede that Mr. James Barry knows of more things that are not in the charter of the city and county of San Francisco than he does, and, if it will make the Star editor any happier, he is ready to concede that The People should have the right to use the initiative, the referendum, the recall, the imperative mandate, or any other political contrivance new or old that The People want to use, whenever The People want to use them, but with the reservation that it shall require a unison of more voices than those of the three tailors from Tooley street to constitute a demand from The People. Are we out of the fog, Brother Barry?

Charged With Two Offenses.

AT THE BAR OF PUBLIC OPINION the Sugar Trust stands charged with two serious offenses against the peace and dignity of the United States of America, viz., grand and petty larceny. There are situations in which it is possible for Big Business to stoop to petty larceny, and that is when the lesser offense can be committed on a grand scale, as in the case of a defunct Port Costa warehouse concern (which also wore out, broke down and defeated justice) that stole a pound or two of grain from every sack that passed through its doors. The petty larcenies of the Sugar Trust are believed to have extended over twenty years and to aggregate thirty millions of dollars. If, as reported, the statute of limitations has run in favor of some of the guilty men, that should not quiet the tongue, if it must restrain the arm, of justice. Let the guilty be branded before they are turned loose, as San Francisco has branded her rascals preparatory to turning them loose. If the dead Havemeyers were in these larcenies, dig them up and brand them, too, that the name may go down to posterity attainted. Than this there is no greater punishment that may be inflicted upon the guilty. Be he alive or be he dead, let no guilty man escape. No statute of limitations runs against branding and whoever avails himself of the statute of limitations in such cases thereby brands himself. Crowd it onto them, Mr. Wickersham.

The President Should Reappoint.

FRANKLIN K. LANE HAS MADE GOOD on the Interstate Commerce Commission. He has stood up. Roosevelt appointed him because he believed in him and his faith has been justified by the works of Lane. A howl went up from the Republican "organization" when the appointment was made and it demanded to know if as good a man for the place could not be found among the waiting hosts of Republican office seekers. Apparently not, certainly not in the "organization" crowd in California. Franklin K. Lane has proven himself especially fitted for that place. Let him keep it. There isn't any politics in that job anyhow and certainly ought not to be, most of all not railroad politics, but there will be if the California Republican "push" is allowed to have its say in the matter. If the President desires to make himself solid with the Progressive Republican sentiment of California let him reappoint this Democrat to this office.

A Good Spanking Coming.

THAT THE OLD NICK is in Nicaragua no one will doubt, and it is up to Uncle Sam to exorcise the villain. It is well enough for the mezzotints down that way to amuse themselves with playing at government, with attendant lunar revolutions, so long as they don't hurt anybody, but when it comes to taking American citizens out and shooting them, no matter if they have been playing at revolution, too, the diversion is being carried too far. God made a fairly good country down there. God's children have a right to occupy that country and build there a civilization, and if those who are there now cannot establish a stable and reasonably just government then God's country should take over the job and proceed to do exactly that thing. Uncle Sam's hand has been withheld too long from the Central American states. They nearly all of them have a good spanking coming.

A Promising Yearling.

WITH THIS ISSUE The California Weekly enters upon the second year of its existence. For it the management has no apologies to offer, no indulgences to crave. It has had to feel its way along step by step. It was unfortunate that its first issue could not have been the equal of its fifty-second, but, like other things that are worth while, periodicals must grow. Their character and quality must be developed as experience, initiative and pressure of circumstances may hinder or help. We have all of us done the best we could during the first year. We shall all of us do the best we can during the coming year. If those who like the paper and approve its character and course will do their best also The California Weekly will be a "go" and will become a powerful factor for Right Things in city and state.

THE UPHEAVAL IN THE ORIENT.

Mr. Moreton Frewen is here from England for the purpose of giving us a bad half hour over the low estate of silver. In its depressed condition, as commodity and money, he is able to read the rise of the Orient and the fall of the Occident, and he favors its artificial advancement to at least one dollar per ounce that the Orient may not rise out of its dependence and that the Occident may have a market for such wares as it is now producing at a comfortable profit.

It is hard for our civilization—our most Christian civilization—to get it out of its head that it can only be prosperous as the rest of the world is kept miserable, but it ought to disabuse its mind of that idea for the double reason that the idea is unchristian and economically untrue.

The cheapening of silver has borne hard upon the miserable millions of Asia, as hard, perhaps, as the cheapening of gold has borne upon the less miserable millions of Europe and America. With us of the Occident readjustments to changed conditions are sharp and agonizing. With the Oriental they are miseries long drawn out and are expressed in terms of starvation, but in neither case are they avoidable.

Wring our hands as we may the rise of the Oriental is inevitable. We ourselves are making it so and, in doing it, we are advancing God's purpose even while we believe ourselves to be in the service of that Satan whose instinct it ever is to reach out that he may grab. We are trying to force upon the Oriental all possible instrumentalities where-with he may compete, and take his equal station, with us and we make wry faces only when he does not buy fast enough.

The problem of coming generations is to be the holding together of our Occidental standards of living and doing while the Oriental climbs to an equality with them, to pull our brown brother out of the mire of poverty and a low standard of living without permitting him to pull us into the mud with him. In the solution of that problem we shall test all our resources, but we shall find no solution of it in adopting financial or other means for poking the Oriental back into the mud.

As for Mr. Frewen's panacea, the United States long ago adopted it. It now has stored in its vaults many hundreds of millions of silver, with paper out in its stead, scattering virulent germs of all manner of diseases alike among rich and poor, including the bad habit of preferring soft money to hard, a credit currency to the Real Thing. The real need is not for more paper money, but less; not for less coin in actual circulation, but more. And it is mainly a matter of habit. Mr. Frewen's remedy would accentuate a bad habit.

THE GEARY STREET ROAD.

It is not a good thing for a city to go into competition with a public service corporation. In Great Britain no municipality is allowed to do such a thing. If a city desires to undertake municipal ownership it must capitalize the remaining term for which existing franchises are to run, appraise the physical property to be taken over and pay the whole before it can clear the ground for a municipal venture; but the government of Great Britain is founded upon privilege—privilege is entrenched in parliament and parliament is autocrat of all the cities in Great Britain. That is why such things are as they are in Britain.

But while it is a bad thing for a city to be in competition with a great public service corporation, it is a worse thing for it to be in subjugation to a great public service corporation, a corporation that debauches its city government, mobilizes the thuggery, the red-light district, the liquor interests and a manipulated proletariat for political control of that city and for the breaking down of justice, the defiance of law and the degrading of labor. It is a bad thing to submit to the domination of a public service corporation that deliberately capitalizes the discomfort of its enforced patronage and makes the product of that discomfort pay interest on, and so make a market for, securities that have no right to exist.

The Geary street proposal is a choice between evils. Cities as well as individuals sometimes have to make such a choice and must not suffer the lesser evil to blind the public mind to the greater.

The Geary street system, extended to the Ferry depot and the ocean, built as a model line, may be extended laterally from year to year until it grows into a system that will meet the needs of the people of San Francisco up to such a time as the falling in of other franchises, and the growth of municipal ownership, may develop an urban transit system equal to all requirements. There is apparently no other way open to such a consummation. The greater the United Railroads system becomes, the more franchises granted it, the more arrogant it will be, the more deeply will it plunge into the debaucheries of civic life and the more unbearable may be the burden of inadequacy under which the city will stagger.

The initial investment is not great, it should be fairly profitable from the start, and, at all events, that way lies municipal deliverance and no other. For that reason the voters of San Francisco should hazard the municipal ownership fortune. It can not break the city. It may make it, and it may bring to terms a public service corporation whose arrogance knows no bounds and whose willingness to plunge the city into chaos, rather than yield to the interests of peace or justice, has been demonstrated more than once.

Let's take a chance on the Geary street bond proposition.

WHERE ABIDES CIVIC RIGHTEOUSNESS?

The Santa Cruz News asks if The California Weekly really believes that the only place where the spirit of civic righteousness abides is in the church? Absolutely no. On the contrary there is less of civic righteousness in the church than there should be. The political efficiency of the church fellowship is low, abominably low, and it is with that fact that The California Weekly has its quarrel.

The writer of this is at this moment running his eyes over a list of more than one hundred progressive, militant, independent citizens scattered widely over the state, men who are all standing for Right Things, men who give time and money to the political welfare without hope of advantage in which all may not share. Out of all these he does not know of more than five or six who are publicly known to be pre-eminently religious men, regular church attendants and all that. There may be others who are, as it is to be hoped that there are, but, if so, the writer, who is fairly well acquainted with most of them, has not heard of it.

The question is not, why are not these men, in whom the spirit of civic righteousness is to be found, more religious, but where are the men who are religious that they are not more generally enlisted on the side of better politics, better measures and better men? Why are they not right out on the firing line performing efficient service for the re-establishment of a democracy where a plutocracy has sought all too successfully to overthrow it?

Nearly every church, that is alive, has a men's league of some sort. If not, then a fellowship that could be made politically efficient, not for the advantage of the church, but for the advantage of human society. The California Weekly would like to see the church politically as efficient in proportion to attendance as the saloon. It would like to see the church fellowship as well organized for healthful political life as the saloon fellowship is for an unhealthy.

At bottom nearly all public issues are moral issues. Whether our national resources are to be conserved or exploited is a moral issue; likewise whether our tariffs shall mulct the million for the benefit of the millionaire; whether justice shall be established without fear or favor or be bought at a price; whether there shall be equality of opportunity in this country or if the spendthrift sons or daughters of the rich are to have their inheritances so tied to them, through the creation of trusteeships, that they cannot be separated from them by anything except death, no matter how viciously they may live. These are all moral questions, profoundly moral, and where shall we look for men to lead us toward the right, daring all things, fearing nothing, if not where we look for individual guidance, hope and steadfastness in the ways of personal righteousness?

We repeat, the political efficiency of church and synagogue is low while that of saloon and brothel is high. It is a condition that should not exist. Why does it? Why are not more church leaders out on the firing line for good politics, good government, and good measures and good men? They are there, in proper proportion, neither as church members nor as men.

WHOSE BUSINESS IS IT?

The political campaign now in progress in Great Britain will bear watching for other reasons than that an effort is making to impose a greater share of the burden of government on the shoulders of those best able to carry it. It is of interest for what the Socialists are boldly declaring: The right of every man to have work furnished him whenever he wants work. Whose business is it to furnish work?

This is a question that should not be lost sight of as we come to deal with public affairs. The world has found no source of employment, to speak of, not founded upon the desire to make money. That desire has found expression individually, co-operatively, corporately and, in recent years, through vast combinations of capital and ability, but chiefly through individual initiative. The great combinations have, by keeping the market starved and consumption restricted, while the price is kept up, tended rather to curtail labor than to furnish it, exactly counter to what takes place where there is free play for all normal productive forces.

The Socialists of Great Britain are not now demanding that government take over "all the means of production and all the means of distribution." They purpose still to rely, for furnishing work, mainly upon individual and corporate initiative, with the desire to make money for the inspiring impulse, but wherever these forces fail it is proposed that government shall make up the deficiency by having public work done for the public benefit at public cost.

They propose that the British government shall reforest denuded areas, create parks and pleasure grounds and keep them tidy, lay out and construct new roads and streets wherever they would prove convenient, take over eligible tracts of land and lay them out into additions to adjacent cities, construct tramways to them, build model tenements to cover them and so furnish homes to the people that congestion may be avoided. The government is to pay a low, but a living, wage for this service, but is to go into these forms of public activity so generally as to make all Britain a garden and leave not an idle man in the realm. The scheme is ambitious and the demand is made in the name of human rights, not human charity or a gracious benevolence.

How far the socialistic spirit has pervaded Mother England readers of contemporaneous history scarcely need to be told. It is enough to make old-time individualists turn over in their graves and present-time individualists almost wish that they had graves to turn over in.

Frankly, though, such alleged progress is along false lines. The farther it goes the harder will it be to get back to correct principles. The right to have work furnished one for the asking is no more a natural right than to have food, clothing and shelter furnished. The only natural right there is which may be insisted on is the right of access to natural resources that are not busy and, rather than concede this right, Great Britain is launching out into hazards of new socialistic fortunes whose end none can foresee.

Some Progress to Report.

It is nearly forty years since John D. Rockefeller and his associates began, through a system of rebating, advancing prices in some places and depressing them in others, to crush out opposition, extend their activities and apply The Cinch to scores of millions of people. Such of their number as Satan has not gathered to himself are still at it.

For nearly forty years these malefactors of great wealth have kept safely ahead of the law. If the police power of state or nation struck their trail it was only to see their coat tails flapping in the breeze as they disappeared over the brow of the next ridge. It has never really caught up.

The Standard Oil Company has been driven from open rebating to secret, from corporations to a trust, and from a vast trust to a vaster single corporation holding seventy-five per cent of the oil business of the United States in a single ownership, and now a circuit court of the United States has decided that this great corporation is illegal and must wind up its affairs and cease to exist. The supreme court of the United States still has something further to say on the subject. The victory for justice lacks much of being conclusive, although progress seems to be making.

To be sure this particular unlawful corporation has existed for ten years and it has taken three years to get the case against it so far. Of that we can not be proud. It lacks much of being a speedy and exemplary enforcement of the law. By the time Justice emerges from the supreme court John D.'s coat tails will be waving beckoningly in the distance.

Mr. Dickie's Final Word.

With this issue we present the seventh, and concluding, article by Mr. George M. Dickie on "American Shipping in American Ships." To those to whom our great highway of the world, whose throbbing pulses we feel along all our western coasts, means anything Mr. Dickie's articles must have proven a mine of information if not a source of inspiration. His concluding article will be found to be very suggestive. His desires are moderate when compared with what some other nations are doing and yet, if realized, would afford much hope for the future of American shipping in American ships manned by American men. Those who merely want American shipping carried in foreign-built ships, manned by the poorly paid labor of Asia, will be satisfied with much less, but we doubt if the American heart would swell to bursting with pride over seeing the American flag flying over a foreign built ship manned by coolies from Hongkong, even if American capital were invested in it and American goods stowed in the hold.

But Mr. Dickie's series of articles has treated the subject in a broad way and without specific application to the ship-subsidy measure now pending in Congress. That is another and more immediately practical issue, and yet one that can not be determined without such a foundation of foreknowledge as Mr. Dickie has laid before our readers. If some one feels competent to take up the Humphrey bill and explain its provisions, The California Weekly will appreciate the favor to the full. That also ought to help to a better understanding of what is likely to become one of the greatest of national issues.

Our sincere thanks to Mr. Dickie.

Two Hundred In One Tomb.

It is not probable that mine operators generally consciously view the many mine horrors of America as one is reported by an eastern magazine to have viewed them when he declared that "The gravity of mine accidents is much exaggerated, inasmuch as those killed are generally ignorant foreigners whose places are easily filled," and yet that is a more common sub-conscious state of the American materialistic mind than many may be prepared to believe. Industrially we have held life cheap and only dividends and stocks high.

There is scarcely a life-saving device in use in railroad operation that has not been forced upon the roads by legislation or by the penalization of verdicts of juries. The safeguarding of life and limb in factories has been an unceasing warfare between public sympathy and private greed. Without the most carefully drawn building laws our hotels would be fire traps and our tenements would be tinder boxes. Cities must fight to the last ditch with traction companies to secure the adoption of car fenders to prevent the crushing of bones and grinding of flesh of men, women and little children. Neither love for humanity nor a prudent safeguarding of the capitalists' own ultimate welfare, nor the two combined, can be relied on to secure needful care in mining, manufacture, railroading, the building trades or elsewhere. "The Beast" ravens in his "jungle" that he may feed on profits undiminished by safeguards for life.

At Cherry, Illinois, the mine has been sealed with 200 unrecovered bodies sepulchered therein. The chances are a thousand to one that some perfectly feasible precaution was neglected that dividends might not be curtailed. Among all our national scandals there are few more humiliating than the low value placed upon life in mining.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

It is related of Dr. Lyman Beecher that, while out driving with his family, the horses ran away, overturned the carriage and spilled the occupants out upon the roadside. Having gotten together again at the parsonage, the good wife suggested that they ought to offer prayer in thankfulness for their merciful preservation, to which the Doctor is said to have replied, "You may if you have anything to be thankful for, but as for me, I am confoundedly hurt."

George Wilson hired out as cook for a gang two hundred miles beyond civilization, and was carelessly shot through the leg, splitting the thigh bone from end to end. For eight months he lay in a rude hospital at a government post suffering the agonies of a thousand deaths, was then brought by stage more than a hundred miles to a railroad and from there home, so emaciated that at least one person fainted at sight of him. He endured other months of suffering until made strong enough to endure the amputation of the limb and, in half a year more, got well enough to get around on crutches. It was then that a good parson saw him for the first time and admonished him how thankful he should be for the mercy of the Lord in bringing him through tribulation. Glancing admiringly at the stout legs of the reverend gentlemen, who had no thought of being thankful for them, George ruefully replied "Yes, I suppose I ought to be thankful for small favors."

We who are surfeited with turkey and plum pudding, and are thanking our stars that we have escaped an indigestion, are minded to thank God that, of all ages in the world's history, it has been given us to live in this age, as well we may, but what of the countless thousands of millions of people who have lived in former ages, was the Lord unmindful of them?

We are thankful to God that we are sheltered from the storm while others are not; that we have meat to eat while others lack it; that we have prospered while others have eked out a scanty existence after long hours of toil in stuffy sweatshops; that the breath of scandal has not touched our home while our neighbor dare not utter the name of one of his children outside the family circle; that "things are coming our way" splendidly while departing from those less fortunate than we. Stripped to the bare bones four-fifths of our thanksgiving will be found of this quality, self-satisfied, unsympathetic and a temptation to Providence.

What then is the true basis of the thankful spirit? Who are we that God Almighty should vouchsafe us a living wage while the peon toils early and late for a pittance? Who are we and what have we done that God should suffer us to be free while the Yaquis are torn from their families and sold into slavery in tropical swamps? Who are we that mercy should follow us all our days while vengeance unceasingly pursues our less fortunate brother or sister?

Let the reader run over in his mind those among all his friends who, so far as he can know, are most profoundly thankful during this Thanksgiving season, and all seasons, and he will find that these are they who have rather the least to be thankful for, those who have been bruised, not those who are every whit unscathed; those who have endured suffering but have escaped with their lives; those who live in cottages, not castles; who have fared scantily, not sumptuously, every day.

The seeker will find thankfulness where he finds happiness, and he will find happiness where he finds self-forgetfulness, and he will find self-forgetfulness where he finds willing service, and he will find willing service where he finds love. There we have it at last, the true basis of the thankful spirit—in a heart that can love. All else is satiety of appetite, that physical comfort which comes of a gorgeous gorge.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Monorail Road Is Proving Successful.

Recent developments indicate that the day may not be very far distant when man will do much of his traveling on railroads of the monorail type. Such a road has just been tested with much success in England. As tested there, the gyroscope principle, or the principle which prevents a spinning top from falling over, was applied, the car running along a tight wire in apparent violation of the law of gravity. It looked as if it must fall, but it did not, and, what is more important, it apparently is demonstrable that it could not. The car carried forty people, and it is claimed that it can make 100 miles an hour without difficulty. While the monorail thus was being tested in England, it was about to receive a practical application in this country. A company, having this object in view, has purchased a piece of road running from Bartow, near New York, to City Island, and proposes to have a monorail line in operation there before long. Further extensions also are in view. As long ago as 1892 a monorail was successfully tested near New York, but it is said that the influence of those interested in the old type of steam railways prevented the introduction of the system at that time. Now, if the claims made for the single rail are made good, it is probable that its introduction will not long be delayed.

Wages and Living in Germany and Here.

Recently the Imperial Statistical Department of Germany conducted an extensive inquiry into the wages and the cost of living in that country—particularly in Berlin. It decided that the average income of a skilled workman there is $458.83, and his average expenditure is $457.71. It will be seen that he saves $1.12 annually. This record does not point much in the direction of opulence, but it beats that of his unskilled brother workman, who annually expends $411.70 out of an average income of $409.78, presumably borrowing $1.92 at the end of the year from his wife's father or somebody. This does not offer a very comforting outlook to the German workman, but investigations made in New York city indicate that the condition of the workman there is decidedly worse. There the Sage Foundation, after due consideration of conditions, has decided that an average family of five or six persons cannot live comfortably and normally on less than $800 a year. So stands one fact, and, on the other hand, the New York Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, announces, after careful investigation, that the average workman (skilled and unskilled) of that city has an income of but $525 to $575 per annum. That is, in the year he lacks $200 or $300 of having enough income to live comfortably and normally. So it appears that the New York workman is much worse off than his German brother, who is none too well conditioned. Consider these facts, and perhaps it will not seem strange that a grumbling from the basement of the social structure sometimes is heard.

Across the Continent in a Hurry.

The trip from New York city to Los Angeles may be made in 3 days, 16 hours and 15 minutes, as time is counted in various parts of the country, or just three hours longer in actual time. This is made possible by co-operation of the Pennsylvania, the Missouri Pacific and the Santa Fe railroads. The passenger leaves New York on the 2:50 p. m. Pennsylvania train, reaches St. Louis in time to take the 2 p. m. Missouri Pacific the next day, arrives at Kansas City and takes the Santa Fe at 9:15 p. m. that day, and arrives at Los Angeles 2 days, 9 hours and 50 minutes later. This is a gain of 10 hours and 45 minutes over the fastest time regularly made heretofore.

The Sunny South Rich in Cotton.

If the present high prices of cotton continue to prevail government experts estimate that the crop in the South this year will be worth from $900,000,000 to $1,000,000,000. The value of last year's crop was but $780,000,000, so the increase this year will be 15 or 20 per cent. Under this estimate the value of Georgia's crop will be about $175,000,000, South and North Carolina will do relatively as well, and while there will be a less crop in Alabama and Mississippi this year than last, its value will be greater. The foregoing numbers are too immense to be realized, but some idea concerning them may be attained from the following comparisons: The value of the South's cotton crop will be twice that of the world's production of gold; it will be greater than the combined capital of all the national banks in this country; if apportioned, it would give $11 or $12 apiece to every man, woman and child of our population. It is said that the wealth thus flowing in upon the South will be greater than any it has known since the civil war—wherefore these congratulations.

The Unfed Children of Germany.

The Public Weal Society of Germany recently investigated the manner in which the school children of 189 German towns are fed, and made some painful discoveries. According to this report 5 per cent of these children go without their suppers, while 36,000 of them habitually go breakfastless to school. As the report goes farther its revelations become, if anything, worse, for it is discovered that no less than 95,000 are fed by public assistance committees. To this end $150,000 were expended, and this sum was by no means sufficient to do away with the suffering of the semi-starved little ones. The report reflects seriously on German motherhood when it gives, as the first cause of this deplorable condition, the complete ignorance of the mothers concerning the very rudiments of housekeeping.

Boys Who Act as Police.

Council Bluffs, Iowa, has a unique institution in its boy police force, which, as the name indicates, is composed entirely of boys. It is a force of varying size, sometimes having as many as 250 members, its maximum number, and again having none. The members of the force receive no pay, but are content with the prestige which the position gives them among their playmates, the boys considering it a decided honor to have police authority. All classes compete for the distinction, and especially about holiday times the rivalry for it is keen, there being at times as many as 500 to 1,500 applicants. The "kid police," as the force is called, is popular in the city, does good work, and is so successful an experiment that other cities than Council Bluffs are considering the advisability of adopting the system. Its work consists in keeping mischievous children from law-defying pranks.

First Aerial Fleet Manoeuvres.

For the first time in the history of the world an aerial fleet is being maneuvered and the worth of its component parts estimated for military purposes. These manoeuvres are taking place in the vicinity of Cologne. Most important perhaps, and certainly most gigantic, of these aerial vessels, are the dirigibles, of which the merits of three types are being measured. These are the Zeppelin, the Parseval and the Gross, each one of which has its advocates and admirers. Aeroplanes of various types also are being tested. There are experiments in aerial wireless telegraphy, airship chasing, the dropping of bombs, with the new Krupp gun which is intended for use against airships, etc.

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES.

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHELF.

Coleridge and De Quincey.

Some bodily diseases, such as tuberculosis, often produce in their victims a strangely beautiful complexion which makes them more attractive than they were when in normal health. A parallel in literature appears in those writers whose minds have been inflamed by stimulants of various kinds and whose writings show, in consequence, an unearthly beauty that makes them irresistibly fascinating. Three works, by two writers, reflect this fatal origin of stimulation, yet they glow also with the unfading splendor of a supernatural light. These are "The Ancient Mariner" and the fragment, "Kubla Khan," of Samuel Taylor Coleridge, and "The Confessions of an English Opium Eater," of Thomas De Quincey.

Upon whom has not fallen the weird spell of the presence of that ancient bearded man, and been detained, as was the wedding guest, in shuddering attention upon his narrative of disaster upon that lonely, wide, wide sea? Fewer, perhaps, have followed the course of Alph, the sacred river, as it "ran, through caverns measureless to man, down to a sunless sea," but these, too, have felt the cold breath of an outer wilderness upon their cheeks and stared wildly at the flickering glories of uncharted northern lights.

De Quincey leads us to a different realm, but to one as inaccessible to normal minds. In the dreams described in the Confessions, we walk diminished through august, stupendous, unresounding halls, like spirits lost in infinite space. Majestic shapes bulk over us, prodigious as the sea, disport in colored, scented, decorated mansions, fade, and give place to other figures vaster, more inspiring.

Wonderful visionaries, wonderful visions! From the unwholesome morasses of diseased imagination, how could they bring back such beautiful flowers? We, who do not venture on the paths they trod, and would not if we dared, smell the exotic, sweet heavy odor of the blooms they brought thence, and for an hour dream wondrous dreams.

ORIGIN OF A POE TALE.

A letter written by Edgar Allen Poe to Dr. J. Evans Snodgrass, editor of the Visiter (as it was then spelled), of Baltimore, describes the origin of one of his famous "tales of ratiocination."

"I have a proposition to make. You may remember a tale of mine, published about a year ago in Graham, and entitled 'The Murders in the Rue Morgue.' Its theme was the exercise of ingenuity in detecting a murderer. I am just now putting the concluding touch to a similar article, which I shall entitle 'The Mystery of Marie Roget'—a sequel to 'The Murders in the Rue Morgue.' The story is based upon that of the real murder of Mary Cecelia Rogers, which created so vast an excitement some months ago in New York. I have handled the design in a very singular and entirely novel manner. I imagine a series of nearly exact coincidences occurring in Paris. A young grisette, one Marie Roget, has been murdered under precisely similar circumstances with Mary Rogers. Thus, under pretense of showing how Dupin (the hero of the Rue Morgue) unraveled the mystery of Marie's assassination, I, in fact, enter into a very rigorous analysis of the real tragedy in New York. No point is omitted. I examine, each by each, the opinions and arguments of our press on the subject, and show (I think satisfactorily) that this subject has never yet been approached. The press has been entirely on a wrong scent. In fact, I really believe not only that I have demonstrated the falsity of the idea that the girl was the victim of a gang, but have indicated the assassin. My main object, however, as you will readily understand, is the analysis of the principles of investigation in cases of like character. Dupin reasons the matter throughout."

A DREAM.

By E. French Strother.
(For The California Weekly.)

I leave the loom where Nature weaves
The robe that Earth shall wear,
I soar above the weathered eaves,
I scale the rarest air,
Beyond the rainbow's arch I sweep,
Beyond where moonbeams are,
I glide through astral aisles and weep
To pass the farthest star;
Alone through space I wend my way
With darkness by my side,
I cannot speak, I cannot pray
"Lord God, be thou my guide";
I wonder if a God there be
In all this emptiness,
I wonder if, eternally,
I shall be less and less
Until I vanish in this vast,
Resoundless void of gloom,
If, after life be dreamed, at last
My soul shall share this doom.
My soul sighs: my life resumes:
I speed my spirit on and on:
God! but how sweet are earth's perfumes!
It is the rose-dusk of the dawn!

THE BABY ON THE WALL.

By J. W. Gally.

Twenty years ago Dr. J. W. Gally was well known as a writer of stories and verses, and some of the latter possessed a great deal of genuine feeling, if no large share of literary finish. "The Baby on the Wall" is an excellent example.

I look on the wall at my baby,
The boy of my long ago,
And I say to myself, "Now, may be
The whole thing never was so."

Then I remember the winter night,
In a country far away,
When his dying face in the shaded light
On his mother's bosom lay.

I see her gather him closer still,
And note her drooping head;
And then, with lips that are white and chill,
She moans, "Oh, darling—dead!"

I see myself next morn going out
From sorrow into the storm;
I scarcely know, as I go about,
Whether I'm cold or warm.

I look for the man who sells the ground;
He marks me a lot in the snow;
He digs me a grave. And we gather round,
We and our friends, you know.

And there with words I never recall—
I heard but the broken moan
Of his mother when clouds began to fall—
We left him low and alone.

But his memory comes not o'er me now
As it did in former years,
When his mother would hang his picture low,
And look at it long in tears.

One grief over another has grown,
As time has worn me gray,
Till now the mother is dead and gone—
And that's the reason I say:

I look on the wall at my baby,
The boy of my long ago,
And sometimes think, "Now, may be
The whole thing never was so."

FICTION MORE REAL THAN TRUTH.

Truth is stranger than fiction because truth is often too strange to be credible. From which it follows that the best fiction is much more real than most fact. Consider the limitations of the human mind, and the truth of this statement will be readily perceived. How many people do you know? Say a thousand faces are known to you by sight, and five hundred people are known to you by enough intercourse with them to make them familiar to you in the sense that you know something of each one's personality. But not more than a score or two score people do you know well enough to be able to forejudge their opinions, their tastes, their actions. Outside of your family and your closest friends, the circle of genuine acquaintance rapidly narrows.

Thus, when you see a crowd of ten thousand people, they are not real human beings in your eyes; they are simply animate accessories of a scene, as buildings or trees are inanimate accessories. They no more touch your life or your sense of reality than if they were painted.

Consider, again, how much less than these the mighty host of the dead are able to reach forth, disembodied, from the grave, and live again in any vital sense in your imagination.

But what of the characters you know in fiction? Those never-corporeal spirits, fashioned of emptiness and designated by fantastic names, how real are they? Think, is not Caesar a bloodless shade, a vapor intangible when compared with Jean Valjean? Is not Charlemagne a myth; but is not Richelieu, not the historic Richelieu, but the Richelieu of Dumas and of Bulwer, a living man, as real as the brother you have not seen within the year? Go down the list of great characters in fiction and see how lifelike and how real they are, and compare them with the troubled sea of faces of living people that you pass every day and say if fiction is not less strange than truth.

LEADERS OF THOUGHT.

John Sterling, the Scotch journalist and friend of Carlyle, once wrote to his father a letter refuting his father's imputation that he had assumed to know more than other people about a certain matter. This letter, quoted in Carlyle's biography, is in part as follows:

"I suppose there may be, at the outside, 100 persons in England whose opinions on such a matter are worth as much as mine. If by 'the public,' you and my mother mean the other 99, I submit. I have no doubt that, on any matter not relating peculiarly to myself, the judgment of the 99 most philosophical heads in the country, if unanimous, would be right, and mine, if opposed to them, wrong. But then I am at a loss to make out how the decision of the few really competent persons has been ascertained to be thus in contradiction to me? And on the other hand, I conceive myself, from my opportunities, knowledge and attention to the subject to be alone quite entitled to outvote tens of thousands of gentlemen, however much my superiors as men of business, men of the world, or men of merely dry or merely frivolous literature.

"I do not remember ever before to have heard the saying, whether of Talleyrand or of anyone else: 'That all the world is a wiser man than any man in the world.' Had it been said even by the devil, it would nevertheless be false. It is quite certain there is always some one man in the world wiser than all the rest, as Socrates was declared by the oracle to be; and, as I suppose, Bacon was in his day, and perhaps Burke in his. There is also some one whose opinion would be probably true, if opposed to that of all around him; and it is always indubitable that the wise men are the scores and the unwise the millions. The millions indeed come round, in the course of a generation or two, to the opinions of the wise; but by that time a new race of wise men have again shot ahead of their contemporaries; so it has always been, and so, in the nature of things, it always must be."

FIFTY YEARS AGO

INTERESTING EXTRACTS FROM OLD SAN FRANCISCO PAPERS.

Through the courtesy of Mr. C. G. Cambron, of San Francisco, we have been permitted to browse at leisure through the files of some old San Francisco mercantile papers. Most of the news is dry as dust, prices of merchandise and the state of the market; but ever and anon a stray item wanders in, illuminating the past with a sudden flash of human interest. For instance, in the Prices Current and Shipping List of December 30, 1853, we note that gentlemen of fashion at that day suffered from General Grant's weakness for perfumes, as is indicated by the following advertisement:

"WASHINGTON BATHS, Washington st., between Kearny and Montgomery. Warm and Cold Baths, with Showers attached to each room. There is also, in connection with the Baths, a Gentleman's Dressing Saloon, where a constant supply of Perfumery is Always on Hand. Bay Rum by the Case or Bottle."

No atomic spray of the scented rum, but perfumed streams, "by the case or bottle."

But serious concerns of the business world were the backbone of these papers. One is impressed, upon reading them, with the very authentic gift of prophecy that was abroad in San Francisco fifty years ago. For example, gold mining was then the chief business of California, and placer mining was the principal method in use. But the Mercantile Gazette and Shipping Register of January 3, 1857, clearly discerned the future tendency of mining, as explained in the following:

Quartz Mining Prophesied.

"The leading object of interest now, however, among miners, is the quartz rock, which, although it very early attracted the attention of European miners and capitalists, yielded but meagre practical results. This was owing chiefly to inadequate machinery, their defective organization, and the incredible and unexpected expenses incident to their whole operation in the early days of the state. More recently, however, practical and experienced miners have entered vigorously into the business, all with some degree of success, and many of them obtaining a remuneration far beyond their expectations. It appears to be the general belief that according as the "science"—it is such in comparison with placer mining—of quartz mining becomes thoroughly understood, it will form the chief pursuit of miners generally."

This did not quite foretell the cyanide process, but it clearly indicated the subsequent predominance of quartz mining over placer.

The most prophetic vision, however, seemed to have been possessed by H. F. Williams, Esq., whose address before the Merchants' Institute of California was quoted at length in the same paper on September 11, 1857. In the address, Mr. Williams predicted in minute detail the combined gang-plow, seeder and cultivator, drawn by the steam traction-engine, and the combined harvester, steam propelled, that later became such a picturesque utility in the California harvest fields. This part of his address is as follows:

Combined Harvester Foretold.

"The Overton steam wagon (a California invention), is pronounced by most of the practical and scientific men who have examined it, to be an invention of superior excellence, and one which promises ere long to take the place of all other wagons for heavy transportation, and may perchance be applied to farming purposes of every description. If so, who will attempt to estimate its value? With its iron tread and untiring step it will become the advance guard of civilization and refinement, by removing the heavy burdens from the limbs of men, which have ever been so heavily taxed in the cultivation of the soil. If this invention possesses the qualities claimed for it by the inventor and those enlightened and unprejudiced persons who have examined it, the day is not far distant when it will be seen moving majestically over our broad fields with only one or two skilful hands to direct its course, followed first by a gang of plows to upturn the sod, then by broad harrows to crumble and pulverize the soil, to be followed in turn by a sowing machine, scattering the seed for a future harvest, thereby performing at one and the same time, all the varied processes now in use by the usual methods of manual and animal labor, in the cultivation of the soil. Then, when the harvest season shall come around, this mighty cultivator will again appear with a new train just suited to the times; to reap, to thresh, to clean and to bag the waving fields of golden grain; thereby completing at its second advent the multifarious duties that are now connected with the toilsome period of the seed time and the harvest."

The scene has never been better described since it was an impressive reality than by Mr. Williams when he saw it only by the sight of the constructive imagination.

By consolidation with another paper the name of the Gazette became the Mercantile Gazette and Prices Current. In the issue of this paper for September 12, 1859, an editorial article prophesied with remarkable foresight the present development of the raisin industry in California, making only the natural mistake of locating its probable center at Los Angeles, then the principal vineyard district, instead of at Fresno. The extract from the editorial containing this prophecy is as follows:

A Prophecy of Raisin Culture.

"The wonderful increase, from year to year, of the grape crop of our state, and the adaptability of our soil and climate to the cultivation of the vine, render it apparent that before the lapse of many years the vineyards of California will present a breadth and aggregate productiveness rivaling those of the most favored grape-growing countries of the world. For the present, and perhaps for some time to come, the wine-press will afford the principal medium of reward to the grape culturist, but when the product shall have been vastly increased, as vastly increase it must, we see no reason why our growers should not become exporters of raisins, as well as of wines and brandies. Already our wines are favorites abroad, and we can perceive no reason why the dried fruit from the same vineyards should not likewise become so. The dryness of our summers must be peculiarly well adapted to the curing of the ripe fruit, and we think that other circumstances, including the cheapness of the material, are favorable to the enterprise."

Labor's Wages About the Same.

The issue of January 10, 1861, contained a list of "Rates of Labor in San Francisco." No editorial suggestion was made as to the future of wages, but the list is remarkably close to the present scale. A few of the principal items are quoted:

Blacksmith, per day	$4.00
Boiler Makers, per day	$4 to $5
Bricklayers, per day	$5 to $7
Butchers, per month	$60 to $100
Carpenters, per day	$4.50 to $5
Chambermaids, per month	$25 to $30
Day laborers, per day	$2 to $3
Draymen, per month	$50 to $75
Hodmen, per day	$2 to $3
Plumbers, per day	$5 to $6

The Civil War.

The issue of April 30, 1861, contains an editorial paragraph headed, "Civil War Begun." It is worth noting that the editor was a far better prophet of the probable duration of the war than the northern public, which believed that Lincoln's call for volunteers "for ninety days" allowed ample time to resolve the animosities that had been gendering for nearly a hundred years:

"Since our last issue, we have received unwelcome tidings from the Atlantic side. The terrible alternative of Civil War has been adopted, and the questions at issue between the two sections of the Confederacy are to be settled by an appeal to arms. We chronicle the event with unspeakable sorrow. * * * To attempt to forecast the future, dim with the smoke of battle-fields, were idle. We turn away with sad forebodings, that for many a year to come the history of our country will be traced in blood."

Prediction of Dried Fruit Industry.

Subsequent issues of the paper, however, gave scant space to the war, except to note its depressing effect upon trade. Most of its attention was devoted to the arts of peace, and the number of October 19, 1861, contains another prophecy of California's advance in fruit raising, a prophecy that has been more than fulfilled:

"Preserved Fruits.—An exchange paper says: 'Ten thousand boxes of fruit have been preserved this year at Sonoma by M. Nathanson, most of them of fruits from M. G. Vallejo's orchards. The fruits preserved are apples, pears, peaches, nectarines and grapes.' A similar statement would be true of many other portions of California. Fruit is abundant and extremely cheap—quite as much so as in the Eastern states. It is a very common practice for families to put up all they want for their own use, and sometimes large quantities are prepared for market, and are preferred to the imported article. Hence our friends at the East may learn the reason why their consignments of 'case goods' so often result unfavorably. The business of drying is not yet carried to much extent, but we have no doubt will increase. Our long dry autumns are well adapted to it."

The Wine Industry.

The wine industry received numerous encouragements from the Gazette. It quoted the Alta California in its issue of November 12, 1857, as follows:

"It is estimated that 150,000 gallons of wine were made in the State last year, and from the grape crop this year it is expected 350,000 gallons will be manufactured."

The production in any one of the several counties today runs into the millions of gallons.

Just four years later, November 9, 1861, the Gazette wrote of the industry in the San Joaquin Valley:

"Vineyards at Visalia.—The first wine made in Tulare county was made on the ranch of James Persian, and yielded 1,200 gallons to the acre; it was pronounced by good judges equal to the best wine raised in California."

The "Pony Express."

There are many items of curious and historical interest in the Gazette. The Eastern market reports were not announced as "by the longest leased wire in the world," but as "per Pony Express." This relay of fast horses and fearless riders, connecting San Francisco with St. Joseph, Mo., enabled the Gazette to quote New York prices of March 22nd in its issue of April 10, 1861.

In its succeeding issue, of April 19, 1861, the Gazette notices the transfer of management of the Pony Express into the hands of Wells, Fargo & Co.

"The Pony Express.—Since the published announcement that the management of this enterprise has passed into the hands of Wells, Fargo & Co., much greater assurance is felt by the community in its permanency, regularity and speed. An assurance of regularity was needed to induce the mercantile community to renew their patronage, the number of letters sent by that class of correspondents having latterly greatly declined.

"The postage charge has been reduced and the fruit of renewed confidence in the Express was shown in the receipt of 160 postages on the occasion of the first Pony dispatched under the new management last Wednesday."

One cocktail killed Fairbanks politically, but the New York Times prints a photograph, taken at Mombassa, showing a consignment of fifty cases of beer for "Bwana Tumbo," and no decline in popularity seems to follow.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Thanksgiving Day in California.

Out here in California when Thanksgiving Day is here
The hills and vales are velvet-clad, the birds are singing clear,
And buds and blossoms strew the sod, and sparkling waters run
From dales of green to vales of green beneath a smiling sun,
And perhaps the time is summer, or perchance the time is spring.
But it surely is not winter while the birds in rapture sing,
And skies are like a down-turned vase of crystal clear and—Say,
Will some one kindly guarantee this is Thanksgiving Day?

Will some one guarantee the fact? For clearly I recall
Thanksgiving Days that once I knew were wont to wear a pall,
A pall of white, a pall so cold it added to our woes,
And though New England thanks we gave,
those thanks full oft were "froze."
Oh, how the bleak wind whistled down, its gratitude to tell,
And how the—List the songs of birds that ring in every dell,
And life is sweet, and life is fair, and life's divine, and—Nay,
Unless my memory serves me wrong 'tis not Thanksgiving Day.

Thanksgiving Day! Why, every hour is like a hymn of praise,
And Nature sings, "Out here, out here, all are Thanksgiving Days!"
Here life's a hymnal that is bound in covers velvet-green,
And letters gilded of the sun those covers lie between.
No winter here, no bonds of ice, no dreaded
Frost as king,
But blossoms smiling to the sun and birds that praises sing.
Ho, memory, trick me no more, for brooks unfettered play
Out here in California when we greet Thanksgiving Day.

A Talk With Minerva.

I admit, Minerva, that he is all that you say, a knight, a hero, a heaven-sent exception to the masculine rule. I know that he is all of this, because you said so, and, as you also remarked, you are very exceptional and blessed among women in having found this kind of a man. And yet, after you have married him, Minerva, and are snugly settled down in your beehive of honey, take my advice and keep him filled up.

I know the advice sounds crude, dear girl, terribly crude, but if you doubt the value of my observation, apply to some trusted woman friend to whom marriage has become a species of chestnut. See if she doesn't tell you never to ask him for a new hat or gown before dinner, but to wait until the beefsteak has had its soothing effect. While the flavor of the cranberry pie still is on his tongue cuddle up to him, say sweet things—and the world is yours if he is half a man, Minerva. But if you try it before he is filled up—well, you take your own chances, and cannot blame me.

Man is man, Minerva, and this means that he is a strange creature. He dreams of heaven, but he insists upon having his meals regularly. I have seen no statistics on the subject, but I would bet that nineteen murders take place before dinner to one afterward. I write it regretfully of my sex, but woman loses when she fails to face the fact.

What are you to do if his stomach goes back on him, do you ask? Minerva, I don't know, and I fancy that no woman ever found out. I suppose that all the gentle creature then can do is patiently go her way and pray-erfully hope for his recovery.

The Opinions of Rufus.

When a feller's told a lie till he b'lieves it, is he lyin' or not when he tells it after that?
I'm askin' 'cause I know a hull lot of us that ought to be intersted in the answer.

I can't help wishin' that some folks that has nothin' to say wouldn't use up so much time an' language in sayin' it.

I kind o' have an idee that we oughtn't to ask the Lord to do things fer us that we can do fer ourselves. Most seems es if 'twas wastin' His time, an' I reckon He must be middlin' busy.

I've known some girls I thought was reel
han'some till I et a meal they had cooked.

Still, I claim sech a girl is consider'ble han'- somer than one that cooks all of her meals by the sweat of her ma's brow.

I've got myself so regerlated now that I can stand trials an' triberlashuns pretty well
—all 'cept when they're mine.

Seein' es John D. Rockefeller has given more'n a hundred million dollars to the public, I hope St. Peter 'll either pass him in or, anyway, give him a testimonial that es neat a job of whitewashin' ain't often seen up that way.

I s'pose salvation's free because the Almighty knows that's the only inducement that would cause some folks to take any interest
in it.

Es I see it, the world is full of people that have sternly resolved to do their duty—if it don't cost too much.

Course, in climbin' the apple tree you may git a fall, but you also git better fruit than the windfalls that you have to be contented with if you stay on the ground.

Time an' tide wait fer no man, but I've known time to kind o' hesitate some fer a woman.

A Misplaced Reformer.

He was always a reformer,
For he saw the grievous wrong
That is born of human error,
How it hovers o'er the throng,
So he labored to suppress it
Every day and every night,
Saying, "Life is quite disjoined,
And I'll have to set it right."

Made reforming all his business,
And for it I honor him,
Though I sometimes fell to wishing
That his visage were less grim.
"God is leading, as He chooses,
Man to heaven from this sod,"
I would say, but he would answer,
"Yes, but we should help out God."

Saw a world that needed fixing,
Started in to fix it then.
If 'twas fixed as he demanded,
Then—he started in again.
So, he went his way, reforming:
'Twas the business of his life,
Grafting here and pruning yonder,
For the old world needs the knife.

He is dead and gone to heaven,
Ne'er a doubt of it at all.
For his virtues, they were many,
And his errors were but small.
Yes, he's doubtless gone to heaven,
Yet I think of him, and sob:
Heaven doesn't need reforming—
And I fear he's shy a job.

A Little Apropos Story.

"Yes, death is greatly to be regretted," the Higher-Up remarked, with a sigh.

"True," his friend responded. "It severs earthly ties, fills the earth with sadness, rends
—"

"It isn't these things so much," the Higher-
Up interrupted.

"What, then?"

"Why, it interferes with business."

The Thoughtful Man Discourses.

"A street car conductor said to me," the Thoughtful Man remarked, "that it was astonishing, the race, by leaps and bounds, that such weekly journals as Town Talk, the Argonaut and the Wasp are making."

"Do you believe it?" said I.

"I do," said he.

"How do you account for it?" said I.

"They're trying to get away from their perfume," said he.

"An Oakland man," the conductor continued, "went home, and sat down to his dinner.
'These eggs are too long ago,' he complained to his wife.

"They are not," she responded, 'they are perfectly fresh.'

"Then how do you account for it?" he asked, while his pained expression grew more pained.

"The idea of asking, when you have the Tribune in your hands!" was all the answer she made.

"I reported the conductor to Mr. Calhoun, and he fired him."

"Readers of daily papers here," the Thoughtful Man continued, after a pause, "are divided into four schools. The first school reads the Examiner because it likes its salad with saffron trimmings; the second school reads the Chronicle because it would sooner guess at the truth than to receive it direct; the third school reads the Call because it likes to witness acrobatic feats; the fourth school reads the Bulletin because it desires to see forceful and telling blows, even if they occasionally miss the mark."

"Are you not overlooking the readers of the Globe?" I inquired.

"I was speaking of schools, not of asylums," the Thoughtful Man replied. "We are going to have a Democratic paper, too," he added, as an afterthought. "It is hoped that every Democrat in the state will take it, and that would make a fair start toward a subscription list, wouldn't it?"

"It may, if Teddy is not running," said I.

Woman, Our Home-Maker.

As we men frequently admit, it is our chivalrous regard for woman which leads us to desire that she shall confine her wholly admirable energies to the making of our homes and the keeping of our houses. She is tender and frail, and so we urge that she shall not for a moment drop her role as the goddess of the household. There is nothing that so rouses our almost sacred admiration as to see our own particular goddess with a dish-rag in one hand and a frying-pan in the other.
Let us never, my brethren, let us never desert this high ideal of womanhood and its lofty purpose in life.

Particularly, let us not do so because if woman does not keep the house it will not be kept. Would we men engineer and prepare 1,095 meals in one year? Would we wash dishes 1,095 times, wipe them 1,095 times, sew, darn, mend, devote our lives to a gray monotony of treadmill effort? Not on your life!
Our chivalrous regard for adored woman would not permit it. And we would go crazy within six months if we tried. I know of nothing that we should cling to more closely than this chivalrous regard for our woman-kind—it saves the cost of many and many a hired girl.

I have penned this little tribute to man's chivalrous regard for woman because anybody can see that it deserves it. Woman, the housekeeper (and nothing else), the fried goddess of the fireside; the queen of her domestic domain, with a stepwar for a tiara and a stovehook for a scepter, let us together pledge her, while we register our chivalric vow that we will keep her where she is, unless we men need her as a stenographer or something else—in which event our chival-rous regard may stretch a few points.

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

The promises of your first number have been well kept. As between the man who thinks you too aggressive and the one who thinks you not aggressive enough, you seem to strike a happy medium. The trouble is that, as yet, your paper is read by an insufficient number of people. A weekly reminder of what is honest, is of value. In due course you will reach more people, for their good. Your "Deeper Significance of Living" aids the father; your "School for Citizenship" helps form the character of the son; I hope we shall not be deprived of either column.

JOHN SMITH.

San Francisco.

There is a type of aggressiveness that borders on the "cantankerous" and does not much appeal to the judgments of sane men, yet the John Browns, Pankhursts and Carrie Nations are not without their uses. They challenge public attention to their causes. The purpose of The California Weekly is to appeal to the common sense, not the passions of its readers, and yet understanding without an enthusiasm to vitalize it is wonderfully ineffectual. Society could not hold itself together a fortnight by power of what it knows. Knowledge must be transformed into emotion in order to be made productive of results. Therefore The California Weekly will first try to convince, and then to inspire enthusiasm, yet the enthusiasms lie very close to the passions. Over-statement is sometimes deliberately indulged with the purpose of making conviction potential. This may serve to make the "tone" of The California Weekly more clearly understandable. The fact that our paper has too few readers must be conceded, but it is getting more all the time and the more good words said for it the more it will get.

Your position on the ship subsidy question seems to me a peculiar one. I judge that you believe it economically incorrect (as I do) as you harp on what must be done to offset the action of other governments.

How then can you support ship subsidies as a general proposition? Is it not true, as Robert Dollar has said in his articles published in the Commercial News, that the bill now before congress will not give us a merchant marine, and it is not intended to do so?

Whatever your intention you are helping this bill which, doubtless, is designed not to give us a merchant marine, but to furnish pickings for a few powerful corporations.

Mr. Dollar's articles should be a sequel to Mr. Dickie's.

ANONYMOUS.

San Francisco, Nov. 20, 1909.

We do not like anonymous communications of any kind, but this one raises an issue that needs to be met. The California Weekly is not wedded to the ship subsidy idea, and yet it does not see how our American merchant marine can be recreated without subsidies so long as other nations do subsidize. American capital asks only for free ships and free men, which means that it will buy ships in Britain and man them with Chinese. That is not the sort of American merchant marine of which Americans would be proud. We want American-built ships, owned by American capital, and manned by American-born seamen. Nothing short of this will satisfy the national pride or the national conscience. We shall be glad to open our columns to the views of Mr. Dollar.

Editor and Manager The California Weekly.

My Dear Sir:—Compulsory voting, to me, would seem to be un-American.

A free right to exercise the privilege of voting seems to be much more desirable.

Compulsion is a harsh method to invoke to get people in this enlightened age to respond to citizenship privileges.

No doubt if all citizens availed themselves of their present rights at the polls the standard of officialdom would be very much improved; and it would seem to me that a more wide-spread education along the lines of good citizenship and the duties dependent upon the voter would in time bring about the results desired by the better class of people.

Compulsion or coercion is repulsive to a free American citizen, and if invoked by the law for political purposes would eventually be the means of defeating the end sought to be accomplished.

Respectfully yours,

WALTER F. PRICE.

Sacramento, Cal., Nov. 9, 1909.

Is compulsion so very un-American? We do not leave jury duty to the free grace of individual citizens. We put them under the necessity of going to the judge and begging off or going upon the stand and lying out of the jury job. We compel the payment of property taxes, service in the militia, the payment of poll tax (if it can be garnisheed) and, in well ordered communities, we force parents to send their children to school. In war time we first ask for volunteers, but if they do not fill the ranks we resort to the draft. In no other department of civic duty except voting do we, even in free America, depend upon willingness to serve for the safety of the state. If, as Senator Price affirms, if all men voted officialdom would be much improved, why may not a democracy insist that all men shall vote? Compulsion is not onerous when there is need for it.

Editor The California Weekly.

Dear Sir:—I wish to congratulate you for bringing forward the subject of compulsory voting. It has been in my mind over four years. I am in favor of it. It is a proper adjunct of compulsory education. The state requires the latter, to improve the character of citizenship, knowing that with the rise of citizenship the state strengthens and advances itself. Citizenship renders one of its principal services to the state by exercising the ballot, because it is in this way government of and by the people is made possible, the democratic idea maintained. Why, then, should not the state, when it exerts itself to cultivate improved citizenship purposely to benefit in the use of that citizenship, see that it gets the use of it? It does see that it gets the use of the soldier's training which it cultivates.

The Roman Republic became transformed into the Roman Empire because the attention of the citizen was allowed to be withdrawn from the state and devoted to private affairs. The same fate awaits every democratic form of government which fails to get the use of its citizens in the affairs of state. The use must be had if not voluntarily given, then must be compelled.

Yours very truly,

GUY EDDIE.

Los Angeles, Cal., Nov. 8, 1909.

As Mr. Eddie affirms, the one danger to our free institutions is the dread inertia, the unheeding apathy of the citizen. It will be by his neglect, not his perfidy, that free institutions will be overthrown if they are. It is the body of that death, and not lack of intelligence or integrity of intentions, that makes every free institution fight as for its life ever and always. It is true that we can not compel temperance or chastity, prudence or industry, by law, but we can compel men to drop their business for an hour now and again to go to the polls and answer "present" if they do nothing more, and if one does that much he will do more. The crux of the issue is, what shall the punishment for non-voting be? Will our correspondents give that subject their concern? The rest will be relatively easy.

The California Weekly.

Gentlemen:—I do not believe in compulsory voting, because when men are forced to perform a patriotic duty these same men would have their votes on the auction block.

Besides, compulsory voting by the law's mandate, would give notice to the world that Americans have repudiated the government of their fathers—have shifted the tedious responsibilities of sovereignty to a created higher class, aristocracy—and by this have recognized that democratic rule is at an end and that these miserable dwarfs, heirs of a brilliant era, would admit their own incompetency, degeneracy, depravity and ingratitude.

Far better be it to let us dissolve a hypocritical pretense and turn the government over to those who own it, rather than live a governmental lie and misrepresentation.

No law can reach such a defect, if any there be. Law can move the hand, but never regulate the heart and mind.

Let us quit the role of Amateur Statesman played by jumping at every new fad involving not substance, but mere form and procedure, by taking a positive course and creating issues that ring deep.

The only way patriotic interest can be increased is by enlarging the opportunities of the individual citizen so that each may have a better chance to gain an independence, have more time for study and recreation, and so that each may own his own home. These issues will arouse the voter, because there will be something to work, vote and fight for. Give us this condition and the ballot will take care of itself.

Very truly yours,

ROBERT G. LOUCKS.

Los Angeles, Cal., Nov. 8, 1909.

The issues that "ring deep," are not "created." Men do not say to each other, let us go to now and make them to order. They grow. They are conceived in the depths and often brought forth in full stature or, like the most deadly maladies, they gain access to the body politic and permeate it from center to circumference before their presence is known. Law can not, it is true, make men vote right,

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Herrin News Bureau Again in Operation Those who "keep the run of the papers" of the state will scarcely need to be told that the Herrin News Bureau has resumed business at the old stand. Many interior papers will contain special correspondences from San Francisco and they will all have a tone of impartiality that will deceive the elect if they don't watch out. "Gess" will probably take the field and tell how Gillett and Curry are the only candidates who have a ghost of a chance with the people. Or, we may hear of gubernatorial candidates innumerable from all parts of the state. It is not sure that that tack will not be tried first, but of one thing we may be certain: The plan will be to divide the reputable element into two camps and then hurl the mobilized programmers into the breach between the two factions. Those with even moderate endowments of discrimination will not have failed to notice that both the Call and the Examiner are playing upon the same string. Together with the Chronicle they may develop into a very interesting bunch of program triplets. The Herrin news service requires uniformity of action.

If You Don't Take Gillett We'll Make You Take Curry Deep down that appears to be a possible "organization" program. Mr. Curry is to do service as a horrible example, the same sort of service that McCarthy rendered with such distinguished success in the late campaign in San Francisco, with the possible difference that, in San Francisco, the "organization" intended from the start to elect McCarthy, whereas, whether the influence of the Southern Pacific's political bureau will be thrown to Gillett or Curry neither will know for certain until the votes are counted. As between Gillett and Curry the state may as well shut its eyes and make a grab. Both of them are straight-out corporation men. A difference between them is that Curry always has been an "organization" programmer, whereas Gillett did not have his ears pierced in token of submission until he had made a useful reputation for independence and courage. Of the two, Curry possesses the keener intellect and he understands the state's business better. Curry could make a better governor than Gillett could, but Gillett would make a better governor than Curry would because there is a better foundation of character that his subserviency has not wholly obliterated. But at bottom they are brothers, if not in iniquity, then in loyalty to the Southern Pacific's political bureau, which is a distinction without much difference, a mere hair-splitting.

Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League The meeting of representatives of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League held at Oakland Monday was called by a little group of men who have seen long service in resisting corporation control in this state. Invitations were sent out to something more than one hundred representative progressive Republicans living in all portions of California and something more than half of those invited were able to attend. Those who could not come sent words of encouragement or letters setting forth their views of what should be done. No better type of manhood can be found in all California than the Oakland conference represented. That conference was made up of men who want, first of all, to be fair to all interests and just to all legitimate enterprises, but they are determined that the people and not the corporations shall rule and that equality before the law shall be established on such a basis that it can never be shaken. This movement is part of a national movement, an upheaval and out-breaking of the American conscience. It is of that militant quality which opens a fight with silent prayer and then follows the God of Battles wheresoever he may lead, reckless of consequences to self. It was a splendid manifestation of manhood.

The Gillett Sentiment Conspicuously Absent If there are any Lincoln-Roosevelt men who are inwardly or outwardly consenting to the acceptance of James N. Gillett as the reform candidate, or as a compromise candidate, for four years more as governor, they did well to refrain from participation in the Oakland meeting and may properly consider themselves as read out of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League movement. When that League gets ready to surrender it will surrender to Mr. Herrin himself and make him its candidate for gubernatorial honors, but it will not have to rule over it any man whose political ears have been pierced in token of vassalage to the Big Boss. What man, not a candidate for admission to a home for the feeble-minded, can think of accepting as a leader in a movement, whose principle it is to free the Republican party from corporate control, a man whose most significant attribute is his service to, and elevation by, the most obnoxious form of corporation control any commonwealth was ever subjected to? The unanimity with which the repudiation of Gillett, as being representative of Lincoln-Roosevelt purposes and principles, was manifested at that meeting puts that issue, if there ever was an issue, beyond the pale of peradventure.

Platform Confined To Few Principles While the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League will, when it goes to the people for endorsement at the primaries, stand for every good thing that it is opportune to undertake, the platform adopted at the Oakland meeting covers only two features, both of which are most vital to the public welfare. One of these is the emancipation of the Republican party from corporation control and the other is the establishment of justice that there may be equality before the law. There were many other good things suggested, and they were not turned down. They were merely postponed in the belief that they should be considered by representatives from the people of California gathered in a fuller conference to be held later, or that, if the right kind of state administration can be elected on these principles, other reforms will come naturally and inevitably. An over-burdened platform would be a handicap in a sharp, swift contest that needs to challenge public attention to specific ills. At a later date a more ample platform is likely to be formulated and for the reason that, under the direct primary law, there will be no regular party platforms to which any attention will be paid. Candidates will have been selected two weeks before the platform-making conventions will assemble and the only chance a candidate will have of saying anything about what manner of platform he will stand on will be at such a pre-primary convention as the Lincoln-Roosevelt League will hold next spring.

Pre-Primary Conventions Will Prove Indispensable The "organization" will not require any pre-primary convention of its forces. Mr. Herrin will call in his lieutenants from time to time and give them their orders. They will know what to do and will keep out of each other's way. They will not be found bucking each other off the bridge. One directing head, and that a very astute one, is all that is needed under the system of government by corporation which has so long obtained in California. But when the people undertake to act it will be different. Without bringing together all aspirations, ideas and aims into one convention and there threshing them out the Herrin "organization" will confront a good-natured, unorganized, well-meaning mob with a platoon of disciplined police armed with hickory clubs. Therefore there must be a pre-primary convention of the reform forces, coming with mandates from the people empowering them to act for the common good. That convention will contain 431 delegates, as now planned, representing every part of the state and representative of such Lincoln-Roosevelt clubs as may, meantime, be formed. The organization of the League acted, in the first instance, from inside out; in the final form it will reverse the process and act from outside in. Any errors made by the convention can be corrected at the party primaries.

The League's Attitude Toward President Taft There were certain members of the League present who were much out of patience with President Taft and a little disposed to say so, but by far the greater number were disposed to give the President more time in which to make good. They look to the coming session of congress to clear the atmosphere and make the policy of the President more certain and, too, more satisfactory. The Roosevelt policies were specifically endorsed and the President's championship of those policies was accepted at its full face value and the faith of the League pledged to him in enacting them into law and enforcing the laws when enacted. The League is not disloyal to the President, but it is not going to suffer its loyalty to prevent its scrutinizing his every act with the greatest care. It will give him just judgment, but will hold him to his pledges to the letter and expects him to use all the powers of his official position to enforce their acceptance. No weak surrender to the interests will be condoned, nor will any tendency to halt and hesitate on the border line of propriety and executive jurisdiction, as laid down in the letter of the law, be taken as an excuse for non-fulfillment of promises. It is understood that the executive is the only department of government to which the whole people can look for representation and, whatever the constitution may say, the executive function must be used for all it is worth for the accomplishment of free government for the people.

Chester H. Rowell League President There are more Rowells than a few in California, and Fresno has two particular Rowells that the uninformed get confused to the disadvantage of both of them. First there is Dr. Chester Rowell, chief owner of the Fresno Republican, the father of Fresno, a man who has done more personal favors to more individuals than perhaps any other man in California and who has made himself as well loved as any. He is mayor of Fresno, and recently went wrong on vetoing a liquor ordinance because his judgment and conscience told him he ought to do so.

Then there is Chester H. Rowell, nephew of Dr. Rowell, editor of the Fresno Republican and, on Monday last, elected president of the state organization of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League. For the past year, and until Tuesday of this week, he was president of the California Weekly corporation, but resigned from it through fear that his being president of the League might hamper the independence of The California Weekly, which owes allegiance, first of all, to its readers, and will not be the "organ" of anything. Mr. Rowell takes the presidency of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League at great cost and inconvenience to himself, and with great reluctance. As secretary and organizer he bore the brunt of the fight two years ago and will have to take a leading part this time. He asks nothing in the way of official preferment and would rather work in the ranks, but he is a man who can forget self in the face

A Most Mystifying Political Muddle

Whoever says that he knows what the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau is going to do doesn't know. It is a close-mouthed corporation. Mr. Herrin never lets on. The best that can be done is to put this and that together, take a Yankee guess at it and let it go at that. But here are some facts. If they don't harmonize it is because they don't have to.

Curry counts on McCarthy and the Union Labor party vote, registered as Republicans, to see him safely through the Republican primaries. Without this support he will be afoot and alone wending his weary way to a jobless wilderness of woe.

The Southern Pacific's Political Bureau, and allied villainies, count on McCarthy, re-enforced by the tenderloin (all registered as Republicans) to carry the Republican primaries in the interests of the "organization" candidate, whoever he may be.

Gillett counts on this combination, further re-enforced by a few mugwumps who don't see anything real bad in Gillett (except that he trains with the Southern Pacific crowd, which, by the way, is the worst thing that any man can do except to assassinate the President or blow up the state capitol).

But Curry also counts on forcing this combination to take him up instead of Gillett, notwithstanding the fact that the Argonaut, never out of whispering distance from Mr. Herrin, says that Curry is impossible.

Now McCarthy also is ambitious, if not to be governor this time, at least to name the man who is to be "it." Of course, none of this is our fight, and yet the doings of the public enemy is never without interest to right-minded persons.

Oakland's Hallelujah

Oakland has, for the past week or more, nearly given itself over to rejoicing over its bond voting and annexation, and for the great stride it has taken it has been unanimously disposed to give largest credit to Frank K. Mott, its third-term mayor. He has made the mayoralty of the city his occupation, and he has developed not only a high type of executive ability, but a good deal of tact and the ability to inspire those with whom he comes in contact with great enthusiasm to work for the common interests. It is not unlikely that, as our municipal life grows in grace and efficiency, fitness for higher executive station will be looked for among those who have distinguished themselves by having made good as mayors of our principal cities. When that time comes, and there is no reason to suppose it a long way off, the reputation so well earned by Mayor Frank K. Mott of Oakland may stand him in good stead. But his work in Oakland is not yet finished. There is in sight a consolidated city and county government for the East Bay cities.

The Los Angeles City Election

No more important experiment in good government is being tried out anywhere in America than is now in the throes of a practical test at Los Angeles. Of course the fight there, as here and elsewhere, is on the one side between the public service corporations, lined up with the redlight element and those who believe in a wide-open town, and reputable citizenship on the other. Heretofore the associated villainies have been able, in Los Angeles as in San Francisco, to divide the reputable citizenship on party lines, while they, themselves, had no more of party fealty than they had of moral or civic virtue to hold them on one side or the other. The slogan of "party responsibility" has meant official irresponsibility. Los Angeles,

AMERICAN SHIPPING IN AMERICAN SHIPS

VII. THE LEGISLATION NEEDED TO CREATE AN AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

By G. W. DICKIE.

Having briefly described the methods adopted by other nations for maintaining their foreign trade shipping, I have now come to the point to which these articles have been leading. I have shown that the foreign shipping trade of the United States never prospered except when adequately protected; that, from the year 1828, when the policy of protecting American ships in the foreign trade was abandoned, the foreign trade declined at first gradually but with steady acceleration until now it is practically extinct; that, while this condition has been very much deplored, especially in those states which border on the oceans, no practical legislation tending to restore American shipping in the foreign trade has resulted. At present the sentiment in favor of a revival of our ocean commerce is stronger; out of that something should come in the form of needed legislation; what that something should be is the theme of the present article.

Evil of Foreign-Built Ships.

Whatever is proposed should enlist in its favor all the shipping and ship-building interests; then it would have a good chance to be enacted into a law. Any proposal that calls for the enrolling of foreign-built ships under the American flag will divide the forces which have worked for the revival of our foreign-going shipping. If successfully passed such a measure would not give results unless it went much further than merely admitting foreign-built ships to American registry; to be effective it must give our ship-owners the right to operate their ships as they were operated under foreign colors. It is probably true, as has been stated, that there are about one million tons of foreign shipping now owned by American citizens, but if they simply haul down the foreign colors and hoist the American flag, continuing as before to be operated by foreign cheap labor, provisioned according to the foreign schedule, turning in the same profits to the same owners, what profit will come to the country by having its flag fly over it? We are told that this grand rehoisting of the flag will cost the country nothing; that is true, but as the country will gain nothing I fail to see that it is worth while.

I have the misfortune to be a shipbuilder and probably do not see this matter in the same light as the American owner of foreign-built ships. I will adopt the light he has and illuminate the shipbuilder's prospects with it. Were I thirty-five years younger, equipped with the necessary capital, and guided by this light, I would turn my thoughts toward the Chinese empire and establish a shipbuilding yard there. I would take with me experts in every department, but my operatives, my labor, I would take from the Chinese. There would be certain advantages which I will roughly enumerate. A first-class shipsmith gets 30 cents per day there; materials are landed from Europe for less than the same materials cost here; fine teak wood may be had for half the price it commands here; my pay roll would be about one-tenth what it would be here. I could build ships and sell them to American owners at less than they could buy them for in England and get rich at it; these ships built by Chinese cheap labor and manned with Chinese seamen would get the American flag. But I perceive that China will soon be in the midst of a struggle to change from her old ways into the ways of modern times and western civilization, and my shipbuilding plant might suffer in times of disturbance; my machinery might be broken, my head also; my working force would be scattered and corrupted. What could I do to be safe in my shipyard in such stirring times? I would get a bill passed by congress granting the right to all foreign shipyards owned by Americans to fly the American flag over their yards; that would not do America any good but it would look patriotic, appeal to sentiment, and be a great comfort to me in time of trouble, for the American navy would protect the flag and with it my shipyard.

That is the kind of protection the American shipowner demands for his foreign property.

The French method is equally bad. Ships can be built and put on the ocean and navigated from one port to another if the government whose flag they fly will pay their expenses; that kind of nursing does not build up, it props up; when the props are removed there is a collapse. Such a method is not good policy; it is not possible to do immediately all that is necessary to restore shipping; it must be gone about slowly and steadily.

United States Should Connect Ports.

The first duty of the United States is to establish permanent lines of communication between her ports and the principal ports of the world, and especially with those where our products would be most likely to find a market. Such a service would be costly but the result would be a steady growth of foreign commerce, new markets for our commerce, and a fleet of merchant steamers ready for government service when wanted. That I believe is the present and immediate duty of the federal government.

I would recommend that congress authorize mail subventions in the necessary amounts to establish the following steamship lines, the steamships for which shall be built in the United States and wholly owned by a citizen or citizens of the United States, of the most modern type, designed for the service in which they are to be operated, the service to be for fifteen years, the subvention to be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder who shall give satisfactory guarantee that within two years from the date of contract he will have the line in operation; all officers and at least 10 per cent of the crews of such vessels to be American citizens; the speed named to be the average sea speed on the voyage and the average speed of six months' operation to be taken as the speed under the terms of the contract; United States mail to be carried free of charge, and the passenger accommodation to be first-class and ample for the needs of the service.

Lines That Should Be Encouraged.

The following lines occur to me as meeting the needs of the country at the present time:

1. From an Atlantic port to Brazil, monthly, speed 14 knots, 5,000 tons gross register or over.
2. From an Atlantic port to Uruguay and Argentina, monthly, speed 14 knots, 5,000 tons gross register or over.
3. From an Atlantic port to South Africa, monthly, speed 12 knots, 6,000 tons gross register or over.
4. From a Puget Sound port and San Francisco to South Africa, monthly, speed 12 knots, 6,000 tons gross register or over.
5. From a gulf port to Brazil, monthly, speed 12 knots, 3,000 tons gross register or over.
6. Atlantic and Gulf ports to Cuba, weekly, speed 12 knots, 3,000 tons gross register or over.
7. Mexico and New Orleans to Central America and Panama, weekly, 14 knots, 3,000 tons gross register or over.
8. Gulf port to Mexico, weekly, 12 knots, 2,500 tons gross register or over.
9. San Francisco to Japan, China, and the Philippines, fortnightly, 17 knots, 8,000 tons gross register or over.
10. Puget Sound to Japan, China, and the Philippines, monthly, 14 knots, 8,000 tons gross register or over.
11. Puget Sound and San Francisco to Samoa and Australia, including Honolulu, fortnightly, 17 knots, 6,000 tons gross or over.
12. Puget Sound and San Francisco to Mexican ports, Panama, and South America West Coast, fortnightly, 15 knots, 6,000 tons gross register or over.

13. From an Atlantic port to Europe or Great Britain, fortnightly, 22 knots, 16,000 tons gross register or over.

The establishment of these lines would require about 300,000 tons of steamships, about 250,000 tons of which would have to be built for the service. The cost to the country at large would not be 10 per cent of what it costs to maintain our navy; the lines would in time build up a commerce that would repay the country many times over for the cost of establishing and maintaining them. This is what all the friends of American shipping and commerce should strive for today; it is not all that needs to be done but it would be a grand beginning and would give experience as a guide to future efforts.

The Effect of the Panama Canal.

A great event that is getting so near to us now as to be necessarily a part of any scheme for the revival of American shipping in the foreign trade is the opening of the Panama canal. It is an event of first importance to American shipping both in the foreign and domestic trade. What might be called the inter-coast trade will become very extensive.

Sixteen knots express freight steamers will come here from New York in only fourteen days; the railroads cannot compete with that in either time or cost. Under circumstances such as these the cities of the West Coast will, if they choose, become emporiums in fact and ports of entry for the goods of the great territory behind them. A new interocean trade will be established affording an opportunity for the employment of new ships in the foreign trade. Merchants on the West Coast handling European goods can ship these goods in Europe direct to this coast in American ships if congress will let us have them, but whether in American or foreign ships they will be able to import direct by sea from Europe in from twenty-two to twenty-five days. The canal will enable us to ship our products to Europe and the East coast direct at rates materially less than prevail today.

Will American Ships Be Favored?

If this is to be realized six years from now, legislation will have to make it possible and enterprise will have to accomplish it. Will the American ship be favored in any way in the use of this canal built with American money? Will foreign ships be able to use it on the same terms as our own? I have not been able to get an answer to this question. If there be anything in our treaty obligations that will prevent any favors in the form of reduced rates being allowed to the ships of the country which owns the canal, then the government should write off from the capital invested in the canal such an amount as would justly represent the value of the canal to the nation as a military work connecting the East and the West coast and charge interest on the balance only against the revenue of the canal; the surplus revenue should be devoted to the benefit of American shipping in the foreign trade.

The net tonnage going through the Suez canal is about 14,000,000 tons, measured according to the rules of the canal company; 220,000 passengers pass through the canal each year. The annual gross revenue is about $22,000,000 to $25,000,000. Britain, although the largest stockholder, does not own the canal, but she is the largest user of it. The latest statistics I have show that 2,700 British ships passed through the canal to 12 American ships.

With an exclusive ownership of the Panama canal we should rank very much the highest in ownership of the vessels that use it; the Panama canal will in the course of time naturally carry a greater annual tonnage than the Suez canal, and it affords America an opportunity to take her place in the ocean commerce of the world. Another chance may never come.

Industrial Equality of East and West.

With the opening of the Panama canal new problems, not connected with shipowning and shipbuilding, will have to be solved by the people of this coast; the wages of labor will have to conform with Eastern rates and all other costs that go to make up the aggregate cost of industrial products will have to similarly conform. All kinds of water craft will be brought from the East at less than they can be built for here, making it impossible for the Pacific coast builders to survive if our present conditions are to prevail.

The Panama canal will either end the economic differences between the Eastern and Western coasts or end the industries that have struggled fitfully along here under many adverse circumstances. The result will be as we decide it for ourselves and will be of vital importance and for all time.

in its charter, abolished party elections in municipal contests, and the iniquities are making a last desperate struggle to hold partyism in line against public sentiment. The Republican "organization" held a rump convention and got a candidate for mayor on the ticket by a close shave. The forces of reputable citizenship determined candidacies by a process of public threshing-out of the whole issue, with the result that public sentiment so centered upon the right man that Mayor Alexander went on the final ticket by such a plurality of all the votes cast as nearly amounted to a majority. Had Los Angeles been working on the Berkeley plan, which makes a majority vote at the primary an election, it is probable that Alexander's election would have been effected at the primary. The issue now is as to whether all opposing interests can combine against him. It does not seem likely that they will in view of the fact that the opposition to Alexander got to fighting among themselves. Watch Los Angeles. December 7th tells the story.

Things Happening At Napa Hospital

When things get dull in the institutional life of the state interest is pretty certain to be enlivened by a new outbreak at Napa State Hospital for the insane, not among the patients, but among the doctors. Always the cause is the same, insubordination to Superintendent Elmer E. Stone. Drs. Cohen, Stice, Pulsifer, S. McL. Doherty, all insubordinated themselves and the heads of one and all (besides a few matrons) rolled into the waste basket at the nod of Dr. Stone. He still sits in the seat of the mighty as firmly as his name implies. There were those who supposed that Doherty, belonging as he does to the Humboldt dynasty, would dare to beard that lion in his den, and dare he did, but with the result that he also joined the down-and-out club. As to the merits of these numerous controversies, The Watchman knows nothing and therefore ventures no opinion, but how very quarrelsome all of the decapitated gentlemen must have been that they could not get on with the amiable and amicable Dr. Stone!

Verily They Shall Not Be Forgotten

A very pretty rearrangement of the rewards of faithful service has been suggested as probable. Peter F. Dunne has been elevated in the service of the Southern Pacific's legal department about as far as one may hope to climb without getting clear to the dizzy height. That made vacant a place at the head of legal affairs here in California, and rumor has it that United States District Attorney Robert T. Devlin is to step into Dunne's place. In taking up this work Mr. Devlin will not have far to go. To fill Devlin's place rumor is busy with the name of John L. McNab, of Ukiah, a bright man, bond servant to the "organization," and ambitious. From the standpoint of loyal service to the governing body of California he should without a doubt have the best thing going. In fact the best plum on the tree will not compensate him too well for the devotion of his exceptional abilities to the services of as thoroughly discredited a political organization as ever stood condemned at the bar of the public conscience. Verily, those who serve The Interests are not forgotten until they have so besmirched themselves by that service as to be incapable of lending further aid. Then they are dropped, but that time has not come in the careers of any of the gentlemen mentioned. It has hardly more than come even to Tom Dozier.

Post and Montgomery Sts.

TWO strange men had beckoned to him from the buggy which they drew up opposite the sidewalk where he was playing marbles for practice, by himself. "Say, son, git in en show us de way to de livery stable."

The speaker thrust a shining silver piece into the boy's hand as he spoke. A moment later the three disappeared around the corner and never came back. The first liberty that was allowed the boy was in New York, which they had reached by the underground and under-car routes of the underworld.

The men called him their "apprentice" and gave him a name, "Doc," for no particular reason, but, as he was called by no other, a few years sufficed to wipe from his memory the recollection of his own.

An apprentice he was, to the trade of theft. His journeyman masters took great pains with his education. They spent months teaching him the art of the "dip," or pickpocket, before he was allowed to practice it upon even the easiest of victims. Other months he was coached in his part of tout in a confidence game worked by his elders, before he was trusted to approach even the crudest "fall guy." In the interim, that he might help earn them a living, he was required to execute such minor larcenies as the lifting of carriage robes and overcoats.

Doc was an apt pupil. Captured before the age when any but rudimentary notions of right enter into the understanding, these dawns of conscience were easily smothered by the precepts and example of his companions. They had been harsh at first, even brutal, until he learned that their will was master over his, but afterwards they had won him with unexpected kindnesses and confidences. He learned from them the inverted morality of professional thieves, but also those rogues' virtues that even thieves possess, of mutual helpfulness and square dealing with one another.

Thus, though he learned to practice deceit upon strangers, he learned to be loyal to his "bo"; and though he came to believe that to steal from a stranger was a proof of skill and industry, he abhorred the idea of short-changing his pals. The world is full of these moral inequalities of vision; even churchmen and bankers are sometimes as guilty, in their way, as thieves in theirs.

Doc was not only an apt pupil, he was facile as well, and soon became adept. The trade was to him an art, and he practiced its finer manipulations as a painter experiments in half tones. Perhaps this interest in it solely as an art; or perhaps his unmoral youth, unconscious of moral distinctions; or perhaps the gentler stock from which he sprung—one or all of these conditions brought him a gift priceless in his trade: the prepossessing face of guileless youth. The evil cunning of his craft did not shine in his eyes as in those of most of its practitioners, nor were the lines of his face prematurely chiseled into sharp relief. His eyes were grave, now laughing; his face was rounded as it should be at his age.

His partners recognized his natural endowment and capitalized it. They bought him good clothes, which he wore well, and they put him at higher game, haunting fashionable hotels and the city districts of wealthy residences. From lifting carriage robes he rose to lifting diamond pins and costly furs. His new field of operations appealed to his artistic sense; he felt an esthetic pleasure in being within the pale of a life of which he felt himself instinctively a natural part. His pride of craft rose to equal dignity, and he strove to perfect himself in the subtler practical necessities of his higher calling. He even went to night school, when he could, to learn the language of the people upon whom he preyed, so that he might not risk detection in an emergency by reason of his uncouth speech. And with his idea of loyalty to his friends he tried to teach them his accomplishments, and did succeed in getting them to dress respectably and to practice a class of thievery in keeping with their clothes.

He was now seventeen, a skilled professional, at ease in his dangerous world, daring but cautious. His partners were "secondstory men," and occasionally, when an exceptionally careful piece of work was on hand, he would join them to handle the delicate parts of the mission. They had had a long run of good luck; their jobs had been successful, they had eluded both capture and suspicion, the hauls had been good. Doc afterwards was embarrassed by the suspension of the Knickerbocker Trust company, but even that was a good advertisement for him, because the habitués at the Waldorf, across the street, learned that he had an account there of considerable size, and it gave him a more secure position as a respectable youth of excellent financial standing. But this was some years later.

On his seventeenth birthday, Doc and his partners celebrated at a quiet luncheon in a quaint little old English tavern on Duane street, west of Broadway, where the low, dark-beamed ceiling hangs close overhead above a half-dozen oaken tables, where the walls are lined with clay "churchwarden" pipes, each neatly tagged with the name of the guest who smoked it and who will find it again when he returns, even years hence. They had chosen the famous specialty of the place, thick, juicy chops, which each guest chooses and whose cooking, over the open fire, each one superintends to his taste.

The meat, and the draft ale, and the solacing pipe, had put them all in a comfortable mood before they passed out through the swinging doors and made for the elevated. They left the car at Twenty-third street, and strolled over to the Flatiron building and struck into an easy gait up Fifth avenue, pleased at the spring odors in Madison Square, warmed and made indolent by the returning sun.

Doc, especially, felt the wistful invitation of the spring. He was at the day-dream time of youth; this was his vacation; he was free to yield for a moment to the sensuous appeal of life and color as he passed the stately buildings, the richly finished carriages and automobiles, the beautiful women gowned for the colorful display of Vanity Fair.

Why should he not be alive to all this beauty, how should he fail to fall into its snare? All suddenly the pageant dimmed before him and one face was there, the face of Spring herself, blue eyed, rose-checked, with the sunlight for her crown. He looked again, and she was of the rout, decked for its Fair; but not of it either, for her eyes were guileless. She was gone. Doc wondered idly upon which of the four streams from Eden she had floated to him and beyond.

"See that bracelet, kid? Spot it!"

Mechanically Doc wheeled and left his partners, following the plume upon her hat. He had not seen the bracelet, but who else should wear it if it were desirable? She did not see him, but he could have reached her side at any moment of the day, in shops or restaurant or street. He, Doc, was trailing a turquoise setting in a golden band. He, Youth at Seventeen, was trailing the lost Lorelei back to the gates of paradise. At five o'clock the gates clanged behind her; they were the doors of fashionable apartments, Central Park West. By six he knew where her room lay and how the tradesmen's entrance led to a fire-escape which passed her window. The job of Doc, trailer, was done, and the job of Doc, second-story man, was forgotten as Youth at Seventeen walked solemnly to his apartments, seeing in the glow of every street lamp the golden crown that framed her face. After dinner Doc met his partners with an ultimatum.

"Spotted it, all right! And I'll get it. But this is my last job. I've made you money, and I've taught you a better trade than you had when you got me. I've got a stake, and I'm going to quit and go it on the square—what?"

His partners exchanged knowing glances, gravely. This lure of respectability comes once in a while to citizens of the underworld, and often it lifts an old-timer into a new life, in which he never sees his former friends. These friends recognize the symptoms, accept it as fatalists accept disease, and respect the victim's wish to forget his past.

"Afraid?"

Doc smiled, tolerantly. After a long pause: "Or a skirt?"

Doc still smiled. The others eyed him intently, silently. At last they shook their heads:

"A skirt, for fair. Too bad!"

They shook hands with him as one says goodbye to a friend on his deathbed, and turned to go.

"Let this job slide, if you want. We'll glom it."

"Nope, it's my farewell try. I'll get it. S'long."

He laid his plans with the scrupulousness of the artist, and with the joy of a fresh enthusiasm.

If one may wonder that he went so lightly to the task of robbing her whom he loved (the word rang sweetly through his brain, for it was his first taste of it since he had remembrance), bethink you that Youth at Seventeen always regards its object of desire as surely won, so he was merely going forth to steal his own. And he dreamed, as well, of brighter jewels he would give her in its stead when he should claim her for his bride. And he must be square with his friends; the gem was theirs, and he must capture and deliver it.

He stepped softly from the fire-escape over her window ledge and gently drew the shade down over the open space to hide from the next house any flash from his pocket lantern if he had to use it. His nerves were tense with the mingled influence of the dangerous task and of her presence. He paused to hear her breath, even and regular, as a child asleep, before he began his search. Then his lithe fingers reached out deftly, touching the walls, the furniture, sensitively recording every aspect of the room that lay in darkness, telegraphing it to the brain that recast it and painted it upon his memory as clearly as if he saw it by the light of day.

The search was fruitless. The artist in him thrilled at the undiscovered pigment of success; the craftsman's pride rose at the unusual difficulty. Shrewd housekeepers sometimes hang jewels high, above a man's reach when searching the backs of picture frames. He drew his lantern, flashed it on the nearest wall, turned it to the next, glanced to the left and—

Sitting up in bed, with eyes half-scared, half humorous, she was watching him in silence. He snapped the light out and stood poised for a spring. Her voice rose softly, but appealingly:

"Please, Mr. Burglar, turn that light on again. I'd feel so much more comfortable if you would."

It was her voice he heard: he felt irresistibly the impulse to see again her face; to join face and voice in the complete vision that he loved. He turned the light again upon her, muffling his face in his handkerchief.

"Thank you so much. Now, may I ask what you want? I'll tell you where it is, if you will. I hate disturbances, and I'll do anything in reason to have you go away quickly."

The voice and face were harmonious; together, they dazzled him, bound him in the chains of a fascinated admiration. Her tumbled hair, with its firm braids around her shoulders, the face flushed by sleep, the lace

THE FEDERAL CORPORATION TAX LAW

EVERY CORPORATION MUST MAKE "RETURN": HOW AND WHEN.

The new corporation tax law, which was incorporated into the tariff bill approved by President Taft on August 5th, last, requires every corporation, whether organized under state or federal laws, to make a "return," or statement, of its business to the Internal Revenue Department before the first of next March. This article will quote the substance of the first clause of the bill, putting in black-face type the significant phrases, and will conclude with an abstract of the remainder of the bill. Next week The California Weekly will publish some of the points of discussion that have been raised regarding the legal, economic and practical phases of the law.

The first two clauses read as follows:

That every corporation, joint stock company or association, organized for profit and having a capital stock represented by shares, and every insurance company, now or hereafter organized under the laws of the United States or of any state or territory of the United States or under the Acts of Congress applicable to Alaska or the District of Columbia, or now or hereafter organized under the laws of any foreign country and engaged in business in any state or territory of the United States or in Alaska or in the District of Columbia, shall be subject to pay annually a special excise tax with respect to the carrying on or doing business by such corporation, joint stock company or association, or insurance company, equivalent to one per centum upon the entire net income over and above five thousand dollars received by it from all sources during such year, exclusive of amounts received by it as dividends upon stock of other corporations, joint stock companies or associations, or insurance companies, subject to the tax hereby imposed; or if organized under the laws of any foreign country, upon the amount of net income over and above five thousand dollars received by it from business transacted and capital invested within the United States and its Territories, Alaska, and the District of Columbia during such year, exclusive of amounts so received by it as dividends upon stock of other corporations, joint stock companies or associations, or insurance companies, subject to the tax hereby imposed: Provided, however, that nothing in this section shall apply to labor, agricultural or horticultural organizations, or to fraternal beneficiary societies, orders or associations operating under the lodge system, and providing for the payment of life, sick, accident, and other benefits to the members of such societies, orders, or associations, and dependents of such members, nor to domestic building and loan associations, organized and operated exclusively for the mutual benefit of their members, nor to any corporation or association organized and operated exclusively for religious, charitable, or educational purposes, no part of the net income of which inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual.

Second. Such net income shall be ascertained by deducting from the gross amount of the income of such corporation, joint stock company or association, or insurance company, received within the year from all sources (first) all the ordinary and necessary expenses actually paid within the year out of income in the maintenance and operation of its business and properties, including all charges, such as rentals or franchise payments, required to be made as a condition to the continued use or possession of property; (second) all losses actually sustained within the year and not compensated by insurance or otherwise, including a reasonable allowance for depreciation of property, if any, and in the case of insurance companies the sums other than dividends, paid within the year on policy and annuity contracts and the net addition, if any, required by law to be made within the year to reserve funds; (third) interest actually paid within the year on its bonded or other indebtedness not exceeding the paid-up capital stock of such corporation, joint stock company or association, or insurance company, outstanding at the close of the year, and in the case of a bank, banking association or trust company, all interest actually paid by it within the year on deposits; (fourth) all sums paid by it within the year for taxes imposed under the authority of the United States or of any State or Territory thereof, or imposed by the government of any foreign country as a condition to carrying on business therein; (fifth) all amounts received by it within the year as dividends upon stock of other corporations, joint stock companies or associations, or insurance companies, subject to the tax hereby imposed.

The third clause declares that there shall be deducted from the amount of the net income, as ascertained above, the sum of $5,000, and that the tax shall be computed upon the remainder of the net income for the year ending December 31, 1909, and for each calendar year thereafter.

What the "Return" Must Show.

This clause further provides that on or before March 1, 1910, and on the first of March of each year thereafter, a true and accurate return, under oath or affirmation of the president, vice-president or other principal officer and of the treasurer or assistant treasurer, shall be made by each company liable to such tax (every corporation being "liable" in the sense that they must all make a return; exemptions determined by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue) in such form as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe, setting forth:

1. Amount of paid-up capital stock;
2. Total bonded and other indebtedness;
3. Gross income; also dividends received from stock in other companies that is subject to the tax;

4. Total amount of ordinary and necessary expenses, actually paid within the year, stating separately all charges, such as rentals or franchise payments required to be made as a condition to the continued use or possession of the property;

5. The total amount of losses, not covered by insurance, stating separately sums allowed for depreciation. (In case of insurance companies, stating sums other than dividends paid within the year on policy and annuity contracts and the net addition, if any, required by law to be made within the year to reserve funds.)

6. Interest actually paid within the year on bonded or other indebtedness not exceeding the paid-up capital stock outstanding at the close of the year (in case of banks, stating separately all interest paid on deposits within the year);

7. The amount paid within the year for taxes imposed under authority of the United States or any state or territory thereof, and, separately, the taxes paid to any foreign government for carrying on business in a foreign country.

8. The amount of net income as defined by the first and second clauses.

The fourth clause is quoted in full, as it is the famous "Inquisitorial Clause" that aroused so much opposition, permitting the federal examination of the books of all corporations under certain conditions:

The "Inquisitorial Clause."

Fourth. Whenever evidence shall be produced before the Commissioner of Internal Revenue which in the opinion of the commissioner justifies the belief that the return made by any corporation, joint stock company or association, or insurance company, is incorrect, or whenever any collector shall report to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that any corporation, joint stock company or association, or insurance company, has failed to make a return as required by law, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may require from the corporation, joint stock company or association, or insurance company making such return, such further information with reference to its capital, income, losses, and expenditures as he may deem expedient; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, for the purpose of ascertaining the correctness of such return or for the purpose of making a return where none has been made, is hereby authorized, by any regularly appointed revenue agent specially designated by him for that purpose, to examine any books and papers bearing upon the matters required to be included in the return of such corporation, joint stock company or association, or insurance company, and to require the attendance of any officer or employee of such corporation, joint stock company or association, or insurance company, and to take his testimony with reference to the matter required by law to be included in such return, with power to administer oaths to such person or persons; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may also invoke the aid of any court of the United States having jurisdiction to require the attendance of such officers or employees and the production of such books and papers. Upon the information so acquired the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may amend any return or make a return where none has been made. All proceedings taken by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue under the provisions of this section shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Penalties.

The fifth clause provides that, for making a fraudulent return, 100 per cent shall be added to the tax, and that, for neglecting or refusing to make a return, 50 per cent shall be added.

Dates of Assessments and Payments.

This clause further provides that all taxes be assessed and corporations notified by June 1st of every year, and that all taxes must be paid by June 30th.

In the case of sums unpaid on June 30th, after ten days' notice and demand, 5 per cent. shall be added to the amount of the tax, together with interest at the rate of 1 per cent. a month.

The sixth clause declares that "when the assessment shall be made, as provided in this section, the returns, together with any corrections thereof which may have been made by the commissioner, shall be filed in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and shall constitute public records and be open to inspection as such."

The seventh clause makes it unlawful for any collector or subordinate to divulge any information obtained by him or the contents of any document received, evidence taken, or report made, except upon the special direction of the President. The penalty is a fine of $1,000 or, and, imprisonment for one year.

The last clause (eighth) provides that, if any corporation shall refuse or neglect to make a return at the time required or shall render a false or fraudulent return, it shall be liable to a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $10,000; and that any person authorized to make a return who shall make a false or fraudulent return shall be liable to a penalty of a fine of $1,000 or, and, imprisonment for one year, and the costs of the prosecution. All internal revenue laws applicable to the execution of this law are extended to it, and jurisdiction is conferred upon the federal circuit and district courts for its enforcement.

at her throat, and her smooth white arms made her a picture of radiant loveliness. For a moment Doc winced as at the desecration of a shrine, but the vision of the jewels he would some day give her, and the thought of being square as he had always been with his friends, made him strong again.

"That bracelet. The one with the turquoise setting."

The girl smiled at him.

"You should learn to pronounce that turquoise, really you should."

"I'm in a hurry. Where is it?"

"Will you promise to go at once if I tell you truly? I'll wait five minutes, too, before I call the police, after you're gone. Is it a bargain?"

She was splendid, superb. He admired her from his soul.

"All right. That's fair," he replied.

"Well, I'm awfully sorry, but, honestly, I put that in the safe deposit vault last night. You know, the Night and Day bank vault. Now you will keep your bargain, won't you?"

"That's on the square?" he asked.

"Honor bright."

He snapped the light out and slipped to the window.

"Five minutes, remember," he whispered.

"Good night."

"Thank you, yes. Good night."

He drew the window down, almost shut, and flung down the fire escape. He halted sharply at the next landing. The click of a button was followed by a thin line of light at the window of her room. He would look once more, the last glimpse he should have for months, perhaps, of the lady of his dreams. He crept back and peered through the crack at the bottom of the window. She was just hanging up the telephone receiver and replacing the instrument on the tabaret by the head of her bed. Then she reached under her pillow, drew forth the turquoise bracelet, slipped it over her wrist, pressed it snugly against the smooth white flesh of her arm, and held it out to catch the sparkle of light in the gem.

Doc met his partners an hour later in his rooms.

"Get it? Let's see it."

"Nope. Stalled. She'd hocked it."

They said nothing, acquiescing like good fatalists. Doc spoke:

"I'll do better next time, bo. Wot's de scent?"

"Thought this was your last job, Doc. What?"

"Ferget it!"

SHORT TALKS ON DOMESTIC SCIENCE

By MARY ROBINSON THOMAS.

Trained nurses to be thoroughly competent must include dietetics in their course. They will then know the how and why of the meal placed on the tray, relative to the disease they are treating. They will also know the aesthetic side, for a dainty tray tactfully served will tempt a patient to take much-needed nourishment, when an untidy tray indifferently served, even though it holds the proper food, will disgust and repel. A thorough understanding of the physiology of digestion should be the fundamental step in this course, followed by simple but comprehensive chemical experiments, classification of foods and a knowledge of the when in serving the different diets, liquid, soft and convalescent.

Coupled with this theoretical training should be practical cookery lessons. Individual instruction is best here, for each nurse should know exactly the cooking of albumen to a nicety, otherwise the patient is sure to get a leathery poached egg instead of one of a jelly-like consistency, which can be so easily digested and assimilated. Broths, too, are always void of nutrition when the albumen is coagulated. Proper combinations, proportions and exact recipes should be conscientiously followed in these cookery lessons.

If the nurse is familiar with the market prices she can choose so wisely that the poor may be as well nourished as the rich. Adaptability, one of the trained nurse's chief characteristics, can be used to advantage here, in the case of a diabetic patient, for instance, in substituting chicken, hamburger steak and an orange for the more expensive game, tenderloin of beef and grape fruit. Appropriate garnishing and an occasional blossom add charm and interest to the tray, and if everything in the general service is immaculate there is nothing left to be desired by the most fastidious patient except perhaps the good appetite. The course can be covered in one year, but it would be more satisfactory if it extended over two years.

From the foregoing brief outline of the needs of every hospital in the dietary department, one quickly concludes that a well-trained head is quite essential. Until recently the housekeeper took charge of the culinary department. In some hospitals this is yet done, but as physicians realize the magnitude of the subject, they demand some one at the head of the diet kitchen to attend strictly to its needs, both scientifically and aesthetically even though the housekeeper may oversee the house kitchen. In some hospitals the dietitian has charge of both and according to the size of the hospital she has one or more assistants to carry out her instructions. A person scientifically educated along this line is needed to give the necessary instruction to the nurses. Such a woman should be the social and mental equal of every other teacher. Improvement along any line needs an ideal as an impetus, and this is especially true in dietetic work, for there are many depressing and discouraging sides notwithstanding the silver lining always present. People are so greatly influenced by the order or disorder of their digestive machinery, and why? This is a large question and necessarily requires a broad answer. We all know how quickly an infant's disposition and health are affected by the condition of the mother's milk, how through this medium, excitement or calmness, joy or sorrow, health or sickness is conveyed to the one at the breast. If this has been proven then we can say conclusively that food must influence disposition and health at all times of our lives. Food, including air, sunshine and water, is the prime necessity in all life, animal or vegetable.

THE LINCOLN-ROOSEVELT LEAGUE REORGANIZES.

The Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League gathered last Monday at the Hotel Metropole, in Oakland, to reorganize the league for the campaign of next year. It decided to retain the name of the League as it is. The following officers for next year were elected: President, Chester H. Rowell, of Fresno; vice-presidents, Harold T. Power of Auburn, Meyer Lissner of Los Angeles, Hiram W. Johnson of San Francisco, and William R. Davis of Oakland; treasurer, Adolph Uhl of Piedmont. The office of state secretary was left to be filled by the executive committee, which will consist of the above-named officers and three members from each of the eight congressional districts, making the number on the executive committee thirty-one in all. The members from the congressional districts will be named by President Rowell, and they, in turn, will appoint five state central committeemen from each of the eighty assembly districts, making 400 central committeemen besides the executive committee.

The morning hour, preceding lunch, was devoted to general discussion of the state situation and of the political outlook. Immediately before the adjournment for lunch was taken, the following committees of the temporary organization were appointed, going into session at once and deliberating throughout the intermission: Platform—A. J. Pillsbury, E. A. Forbes, C. H. Rowell, George S. Walker, M. J. Kuhl; organization—Clinton L. White, W. A. Sloane, E. O. Larkins, Harold T. Power, William Kent, M. Lissner, Ralph L. Hathorn.

After these two committees had made their reports a committee of five, consisting of Judge M. A. Sloane, R. L. Hathorn, William Kent, M. C. Zumwalt and A. J. Pillsbury was, on motion, appointed by the chair to suggest candidates for nomination to be voted on to fill the offices provided for by the committee on organization.

The platform adopted is as follows:

The Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League has been organized for the purpose of gathering into an effective working body the majority of the Republicans of California, which majority has long been ineffective through lack of organization.

The league aims to free the Republican Party from domination by corrupting corporations, political bosses and the criminal classes manipulated by their political bureaus. The league aims also to place the political and official life of the state on a higher plane, to the end that every citizen, upon an equality, may participate at every stage in the affairs of government without fear of any loss of self-respect and that the public service shall be restored to its old time dignity, efficiency and honor.

We reaffirm our allegiance to the Republican Party and to the Roosevelt policies, and heartily indorse President Taft in his avowed determination to carry out and enforce those policies, and we pledge him our support as Republicans in securing their enactment into law and in the enforcement of such laws.

We, as Republicans, pledge our united efforts to emancipate the politics and government of the state of California from corporation control, and to this end we favor:

The election of a state administration free from control by the political bureau of the Southern Pacific Railroad company and allied interests, and pledged to a policy of efficiency and economy rather than to the maintenance of a political machine through the spoils of office.

Such a revision and simplification of our system of laws and procedure as shall result in the speedy and equal enforcement of the law.

The nomination and election to the legislature of those candidates only who are known to be capable and honest and free from all obligations to the political bureau of the Southern Pacific company and allied interests, but who will treat the rights of corporations as justly as the rights of individuals.

We demand that the next legislature adopt in proper form and transmit to congress an act or joint resolution favoring amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of United States senators by direct vote of the people, and pending the adoption of such amendment we urge that the existing primary election law be so amended as to afford a statewide advisory expression of party opinion as to their election.

Presuming that the state committee of the league will find it necessary to call a later conference for the purpose of agreeing on candidates and preparing for the campaign, we defer the consideration of other issues calling for detailed legislative reforms and confine this platform to the immediate and vital issues of party emancipation without which no other reforms are possible.

Believing in the patriotism, good intentions and common honesty of the membership of the Republican Party of California, notwithstanding that in this state its organization has long been dominated by un-republican influences, the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League invites all Republicans and citizens of the state who believe in the principles above enunciated to support the league in its efforts to carry out these principles, thus quickening and elevating the civic and public life of the state.

but it can make them vote, and, if one votes there is no reason, based in compulsory voting, why he should not vote right. Jurors do not bring in wrong verdicts, or witnesses give false testimony, or conscripted soldiers refuse to fight, because the law compelled them to be jurors, witnesses or soldiers. The California Weekly is no devotee of compulsory righteousness, but in compulsory attendance upon public duties it has considerable faith.

The California Weekly:

In response to your letter of November 6th I may say that from the beginning I have been a subscriber to The California Weekly, and would not do without it. Of all the publications in this region it alone seems to me to be really "safe and sane," unless the only characteristic of sanity be to "help business" at any cost to the individual or to the community.

With reference to compulsory voting, one who is not acquainted with the labyrinths of the law can scarcely offer any suggestion against which legal or constitutional objections would not be found by those satisfied with present conditions. Certainly there seems little ground for doubt but that not voting at all is as disastrous in its results as voting corruptly, and that it would be a merited punishment to deprive delinquents of the franchise if they fail to heed a warning. A more effective remedy if it could be applied might be to increase the burden of taxation for such delinquents on the reasonable ground that they are enjoying all the benefits of citizenship while shirking its duties.

Very truly yours,

E. P. LEWIS.

Berkeley, Cal., Nov. 8, 1909.

Mr. Lewis has given at least some attention to the crucial issue of the kind of punishment that should be meted out to the electoral shirks. A fine is no punishment at all to the rich and, sometimes, a hardship to the poor. The only justification for a fine in any case is the reimbursement of society for the cost of conviction. The electoral shirk should somehow be held up for such public contempt as the racing fraternity, for instance, visits upon the "welcher" which contempt is, however, ordinarily expressed in the form of a sound beating if the crowd can get hold of the delinquent. Loss of citizenship, in common with convicted criminals, might not be too cruel and unusual a punishment for an habitual offender. But how shall the scheme be worked out?

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Some Elementals of Taxation.

In former lessons we have shown how the state makes up its budget for spending the people's money, but we have not shown how the state government gets the people's money to spend. This is something that every property owner must face. His only escape from paying taxes is to have no property. Not all men escape taxes even then, for there are poll-taxes that men pay merely because they were born male and not female. No, two things we shall not escape—death and the payment of taxes. What more natural, then, than a desire to know why and how we must be taxed?

One fundamental principle is that those only (except women) who have had a voice in voting a tax, or a chance to have such a voice, shall be made to pay a tax. To this end Section 12 of Article XI of our state constitution provides: "The legislature shall have no power to impose taxes upon counties, cities, towns or other public or municipal corporations, or upon the inhabitants or property thereof, for county, city, town or other municipal purposes." Therefore each county, city, or town must authorize its own taxes for its own purposes. The state assesses and collects taxes for state purposes only.

The next question that arises is upon what principle of justice taxes are to be levied and exacted from individual citizens for the common good?

The principle most commonly accepted is that government is for the protection of life and property. The life of one person being as dear to him as the life of another, whatever his circumstances may be, all should pay alike for the protection of life. But as society has found no means of segregating from its police protection that portion which should go to the protection of life alone, it has lumped the two together and put the burden all on property. It is one of those numerous instances wherein a theoretical principle is forced to give way to a practical way of getting at substantial justice.

Let it be remarked here, and stowed away in the understanding to stay, that government, under best conditions, is a blunt instrument for attaining the ends it seeks. Its successes are never complete and its failures are often profound. We must do the best we can and let the things we can't help go.

We find, therefore, that government is, practically, for the protection of property and that property must bear the cost of it. It follows, then, that each property owner should pay for the cost of protection in proportion to what he has to be protected, but, again, as a matter of common human experience, this is seldom done. Those who have the most property pay the most taxes, but not pro rata with their possessions. The greatest property owners are notoriously the greatest tax-dodgers. There probably is not a thousand-acre farm in California that pays tax pro rata with forty-acre farms of equal quality adjacent thereto. Wealth demands, and receives, some measure of immunity from the common burden for no other reason than that it has the power to exact it.

While the main burden of state taxation is carried by property under the principle above explained, that burden is supplemented by other forms of taxation whose substantial justice lies in the belief that, in practice, the burden is ultimately distributed with reasonable equity. These are called indirect taxes and the tendency, in state affairs, is to resort to this form of taxation and to leave direct property taxation to the counties, cities and towns.

Another principle of taxation, one that is growing in favor, especially as to supplemental taxation, is that at least some part of the burden of government should be meted out in proportion to ability to pay as well as in proportion to the value of the property to receive protection. This is the justification for the income tax which the constitution of California authorizes, but which no legislature has put into operation. Indeed, the tendency of our time is to leave the imposition of income taxes to the General Government, as well as the imposition of tariffs and internal revenue taxes. An amendment to the national constitution giving the General Government unquestioned power to levy and collect such a tax is now before the states of the union for adoption.

Finally, there is a growing opinion that, in its last analysis, property owners own their property subject to the common good and in no absolute sense; that they are stewards yielding service to the human family. An account of this stewardship must be given at death if not sooner. Property rights end at death, but the public welfare may warrant the disposal of one's possessions by will or deed or by general laws governing the probating of estates. At this final distribution of what has been raked together and piled up it is held to be proper and just for the state first to take out an inheritance tax for the common good.

Epistle of Knox to the Nicaraguans.

GENERAL APPROVAL IS TO BE ANTICIPATED for the matter and tone of Secretary Knox's note to Nicaragua. It is time for those Central American states to quit their foolishness and for them to understand that they must quit it or lose their independence. The country that cannot govern itself must be governed by some country that can govern it, and Uncle Sam can perform that service. The time is coming when Uncle Sam must take those states in hand, allow Europe to do it, or fight one or more nations of Europe to prevent their doing it. Three score-and-ten years of almost incessant disorder is as much as humanity needs to endure at the hands of Nicaragua.

Carnegie's War Policy.

ANDREW CARNEGIE WANTS NO MORE battleships than enough to blockade our own ports and those of Canada so that, in the event of war with any European power, Uncle Sam will have only to prevent the exportation of food stuffs from America in order to starve Europe into unconditional surrender. It has been a long time since Andrew has gone hungry and he has forgotten how it feels or else he would not wish to punish the women and children of Europe, especially, and the poor in general, for the commission of offenses with which they cannot stand charged. Let those who make the quarrels be the only ones to go to bed without their suppers.

The Lamentable Gallagher.

TRUTHFUL JAMES HAS FLED. Frankly, who can blame him? And what a splendid solution of all enigmas! For three years Gallagher has been grilled, dynamited, roasted, toasted. The statute of limitations has now run in his favor, also his legs. He stayed with his job as long as Heney needed him, as long as Burns needed him and as long as Rudolph Spreckels had any use for him. To the grafters the absence of Big Jim means more than the presence of a battery of seven lawyers, forty detectives, a boughten press and fixed juries by the dozen. If he did not take away enough cash with him to enable him to be a globe-trotter for the rest of his life, riding first-class and stopping at the swellest hotels, it was because he failed to make the most of his opportunities. Jim Gallagher was the crux, citadel, coign of vantage, sine qua non, etc., of the prosecution. His absence at roll call will cause Fickert to wring his hands (if he can keep his face straight while he is doing it) but he will not refuse to be comforted. Vale, James! May the grease of gold go with you! Exeunt everybody. The asbestos curtain slides down. Nobody unhappy but Justice and she is used to getting the worst of it. Ruef will be let out, too, for having fallen down and remained down until the battle was over. Great guns, what a country!

Out-Pinchoting Pinchot.

SECRETARY BALLINGER'S REPORT TO CONGRESS is no hesitant, half-way document. It goes a stride or two farther than Gifford Pinchot has ever ventured in that it recommends, as a condition precedent to the use of a reservoir site or right of way, the conveying to the United States government, in perpetuity, of all rights derived from states to water for the utilization of which rights of way or reservoir sites are desired. That is going some. The public will take Secretary Ballinger at his word, provided that the needful legislation results and, provided further, that what is left of the common heritage is kept in "cold storage" until congress does act.

Congress Comes Next.

ON MONDAY NEXT CONGRESS RECONVENES. There will be no lack of business. Our resources are to be conserved, a new policy with regard to the ownership and control of mines and power privileges is to be inaugurated, interstate corporations to be regulated, railroading to be supervised and, in short, "The System" shaken loose from the throat of American industrial and commercial life. The records made by congressmen will be watched hawk-like and, next November, their reckoning day will come. It bids fair to be a mighty interesting session. And chiefly held responsible for results will be William Howard Taft!

Greeting to the Western Pacific.

THE WESTERN PACIFIC RAILROAD is ready for business. It should be given a generous share. It merits well of California. It took grit, and all the cash the Gould interests could scrape together, to parallel the main Harriman artery for 900 miles. To be sure it does not begin operations by cutting rates, but it will compete in trying to render a prompt and efficient service and that will mean much. Heretofore the consignee walked the floor if his freight did not come while the traffic man took his ease. It will be different now. One more hope we dare venture, and it is that the Western Pacific will feel called upon neither to go in with the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau, as the Santa Fe did, nor to establish one of its own. Its present tendency is to keep hands off, an inclination to be encouraged until it becomes a habit. The freer the government the greater the safety of these great properties.

The Tie-Up In the Northwest.

IT IS NO INSIGNIFICANT MATTER to have the traffic of the two northernmost tiers of states, from the great lakes to the Pacific, tied up at the coming of winter. It is such an occurrence as ought not to be permitted to happen in any civilized country. It is on a parity, in industrial life, with the government of Nicaragua in the family of nations. The merits of the controversy the public does not know, but the public does know that if both sides were striving to reach a just settlement of their differences they would be able to do it without punishing people living along more than 20,000 miles of railroad.

The Public Welfare Fund.

NO BETTER USE OF MONEY can be made than plentifully to supply with it a committee of prudent, trustworthy, clear-headed men of San Francisco, with power to use it as they see fit, no strings or limitations being put upon that use. Unless men who can be implicitly trusted can be selected for this trust then no such trust should be created. Therefore, first select the men who are to constitute that trusteeship. Then let those contribute who are willing to trust those men. Los Angeles met that difficulty and San Francisco can do as well. A hundred thousand dollars a year will not be too much for such a committee to handle for the political, economic and moral welfare of this city. Amiability and honesty are not enough qualifications for membership on such a committee. There must also be the ability to say "NO."

TO JUDGE LOVETT, GREETING.

You are here, Judge Lovett, to familiarize yourself with Californian conditions affecting the vast properties over which you preside as executive head. Permit The California Weekly to facilitate your investigations by submitting a few facts for your consideration.

The people of California wish your great railroad, as a railroad, well. They do not wish it overtaxed nor made the victim of cinch measures. They wish it to pay a reasonable rate of profit on a reasonable valuation, after having paid a living, yes a saving, wage to its employees, maintained its way and kept its rolling stock in apple pie order.

Californians go farther and entertain a sense of pride in the splendid achievements of that group of builders that constructed the great system over which you preside—Huntington, Stanford, Hopkins, Crocker and the others. The evil they did the people of California are inclined to suffer to sleep with them in their graves, remembering only the splendor of their achievements.

For these and other reasons the People of California are well disposed toward you and the great property at whose head you have been placed, but there are circumstances that militate against that reciprocity of good feeling that should exist between your great corporation and the people that corporation serves. It is within your power to remove these obstacles. Will you do it?

That you may be able to answer this question explicitly The California Weekly begs permission to state the case of the People of California against the Southern Pacific Company.

On the 13th day of November, 1849, the People of California adopted a constitution which declared, in its first section, that "All men are by nature free and independent," and, in the second, that "All political power is inherent in The People." In these two cardinal principles the People of California still believe and toward their realization they still look forward with hope.

But your predecessors, the builders of the Southern Pacific railroad system, not having capital of their own with which to carry out their mighty enterprises, early entered politics with the purpose of inducing county, city, state and nation to furnish the needful capital for them. In doing this these astute men learned how to subvert the popular will, to reduce deliberative conventions to political auction houses, to corrupt legislatures and compromise courts, to select and elect representatives of their own and not the people's to sit in the halls of Congress and, through them, to constitute even federal officialdom in their own and not the public interest.

This political mechanism and mastery of California your predecessor, Mr. Harriman, took over with the other properties constituting the great Southern Pacific system and, under his genius, and that of his hired men, that system has been refined of many of its crudities, perfected in detail and discipline until now, almost without observation, it dominates the government of California and that of most of its cities, affording a government by an incorporated plutocracy where there should be a government by the suffrages of a free people.

This mastery of California is maintained by a lavish use of money in hiring the services of cunning but treacherous mercenaries, the mobilization of that human scum that floats on the surface of the tenderloin, a proletariat manipulated by crafty adventurers, the unification in one political bureau of all corporate enterprises that want things they ought not to have, and the financial cowing (if not terrorizing) of commercial interests dependent upon your great corporation for the fetching and carrying of all their wares, they well-knowing that resistance to your political bureau will be punished through your traffic department if not otherwise.

In proof whereof The California Weekly cites the undisputed facts that the present governor of California is governor by virtue of your political bureau's having made him governor; that the two United States Senators from California occupy their seats by the let or put of the political department of your corporation; that the appellate courts of the state, and many of the courts of first instance, were constituted by the one litigant having cases in all courts and, either by type of mind or through direct influence has deprived the state of an independent and impartial judiciary.

The foregoing, Judge Lovett, while incomplete, may be taken as constituting the gravamen of the case of The People of California against the Southern Pacific company now on trial at the bar of public opinion. This case can be settled without a fight if you desire it by your confessing the truth of the charge and, as earnest of your purpose not to allow the great corporation over which you preside to offend further, your discharging from the employ of your company all and singular those who constitute the Political Bureau of your great corporation from head to tail or the taking of them out of the state. Unless there shall be a prompt and unconditional surrender the forces making for free government will move immediately upon your works.

PASSING OF THE HOLDING COMPANY

If the Supreme Court of the United States shall affirm the recent circuit court decision in relation to the Standard Oil company of New Jersey we may witness the passing of holding corporations. Their existence will not be any more unlawful than they have been ever since the Northern Securities decision was rendered, but the courts will be quicker to apply the law as laid down.

And yet the passing of this device for nullifying the natural and salutary law of competition cannot be counted on with certainty. A maxim of Big Business is: "Beat the law in the courts if you can; if you cannot then get Congress or the legislature to repeal it." The report comes from the East that strenuous efforts are to be made to induce congress to so far modify the Sherman anti-trust law as practically to nullify the recent circuit court decision, which means to nullify the law itself.

This should not be done. The only purpose of a holding company is to stifle competition, and competition ought not to be stifled. It is more than the life of trade. It is the life of the race, and without it there would be no such thing as human progress. The holding company starves the market and paralyzes enterprise. It is the author of The Cinch and for no other purpose came into the world.

Away with it! If Big Business cannot learn to live and let live smaller business can as small business does, and humanity will be the happier and more prosperous for it.

There is no reason to suppose that our country is richer or more prosperous than it otherwise would be had not the United States Steel Corporation, or the Standard Oil company, been formed. Whatever economies of administration may have resulted have gone for the over-enrichment of the few rather than for a more ample compensation for the many. They have resulted in the most unhealthful malady of all history—the accumulation of hundreds of millions in a single ownership.

Moreover, it will no more be possible in the long run, in time measured by generations rather than by decades, to repeal the law of competition than to repeal the law of supply and demand. Competition may be between giants rather than between men of ordinary stature, but will be in full proportion to the size and power of the competing bodies if not, in fact, in greater ratio.

The so-called Sherman antitrust law was drafted by the late Senator George Frisbie Hoar, of Massachusetts. It probably lacks something of being specific, but the end it sought was everlastingly right, that end being the prevention of combinations in restraint of trade and of a free competition, whether sought through a trust, a holding company or a single, gigantic, all-embracing corporation.

But it is by no means certain that the Supreme Court of the United States will sustain the circuit court decision. We are not unlikely to have a four-to-five decision pivoted on the point of whether the statute is to be interpreted according to the common law doctrine of restraint of trade or the evident intent of the statute, with the fifth man on the side of the common law doctrine and in favor of The Interests.

The Pool to Be Cleansed.

The League aims to place the political and official life of the state on a higher plane, to the end that every citizen, upon an equality, may participate at every stage in the affairs of government without fear of loss of self-respect and that the public service shall be restored to its old-time dignity, efficiency and honor.

So reads one plank in the platform adopted by the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican conference recently held at Oakland. It may sound utopian, but the Men of the League believed it possible.

There are things once held in high esteem that are now as empty of honor as so many sucked eggs. Is a man rich? The question quickly arises: How did he make his money? If he made it in running gambling dens, by owning redlight districts, by bribing supervisors and city councils, by methods of financial ruthlessness, even if he made his money unfairly rather than dishonestly, wealth brings to its possessor little honor, nothing better than a cringing servility, the meanest of all counterfeits of respect.

It is so with office. A governor known to have received his office at the hands of a great and unscrupulous corporation derives no honor from that office. On the contrary he finds it attained wherever he goes. A supreme justice known to have been elevated to the bench by corporate favor derives no honor from his position. Right minded men look upon him askance and he knows it. To be elected mayor of a great city by a combination of all the villainies in that city from higher-ups to tenderloin, confers no honor upon the successful candidate outside the realms of human shadow. To be a legislator is to be an object of suspicion except in rare cases where the public has reason to know that the election was above-board. Wherever there is corporate domination there the pool of politics is a pool of filth in which no man can wal-low without needing a baptism in clear waters immediately thereafter.

The Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League hopes, by re-establishing free government in California, to make the pool of politics so clean that men descending into it will come out cleaner than they went in; that men taking office will find honor conferred upon themselves and their families; that men of parts may choose for themselves public careers not only without reproach, but with that sense of dignity and honor that has been the just due of statesmanship in all ages of human history, prior to the advent of political bureaus as adjuncts to great and greedy corporations. That advent has not only emptied office of honor but it has driven from public life men who wish, above all else, to leave as a heritage to their children a reputation unsullied and a name untainted. No better work than that set forth in the above resolution was ever undertaken in the name of patriotism.

Shall We Buy Spring Valley?

This paper has no means of placing a just estimate upon the property of the Spring Valley Water Company. That property could be appraised in the course of half a year by experts working separately, and then averaging their reports. The sum total of the market value of the stocks and bonds of the corporation only approximates the value inasmuch as market quotations rise and fall with every turn of the tide toward or away from municipal ownership. If the city enters upon an independent enterprise the bottom will go out from under Spring Valley securities. A prospect for the city becoming a purchaser, or the defeat of the Hetch-Hetchy bond proposal, will send these securities up to a fine figure. A good, Yankee guess is perhaps as good an appraisement as can now be made of that property.

The Spring Valley can afford to take several millions less than the property is worth rather than face municipal competition. San Francisco can afford to pay several millions more than the property is worth in order to have the atmosphere cleared of a corrupting miasma a half century old, and to clear the ground for a municipal enterprise unhampered by competition with a bankrupt corporation, the most disastrous form of competition ever to be met. For either the city or the water company to haggle over trifles would be folly.

Therefore the voice of The California Weekly is for taking over Spring Valley if it can be had for within two or three or four millions of a bottom valuation of the property. The municipalization of that system will not bring the millenium, but it will eliminate from the body politic one source of political corruption even if it shall superinduce another. The exchange of a cancer for a carbuncle may prove advantageous. It will be worth the risk. No city can afford to have its big men made into law-defying and justice-defeating scoundrels through the overmastering temptation of easy millions. The little rascals may be more easily looked after. Leeches may be torn off when bull-dogs cannot. The hazards of municipal ownership are to be preferred to those of a public service corporation of the known character, or want of character, of the Spring Valley Water Company.

For a Better Understanding.

The Commonwealth Club has taken up the discussion of the labor question from the standpoint of inquiry rather than of controversy. So has The California Weekly. The need is for a better understanding between employer and employee and, on the part of the general public, of the points of view of both sides as well as of the public's rights in the premises.

The California Weekly will open the discussion next week with the first of a series of four articles prepared especially for it by Dr. Charles Reynolds Brown of Oakland, a member of the Oakland Labor Council and a close and sympathetic student of the labor problem. His articles should appeal to every person capable of entertaining a thought for anything outside of self and there are thousands whose self-interest alone should command their attention also. Our hearty thanks to Dr. Brown for the service he has so kindly rendered.

Shall Judges Be Chosen By Lot?

The reader's attention is called to what we call our "backbone" article for this week, to be found elsewhere under the above title. Its novelty will commend it if not the feasibility of its suggestions.

The two fundamental faults of the American judiciary, as now constituted, are that the men on the bench are, as a rule, inferior in mentality and learning and that they are to an extent under mortgage to political or special interests. Judge Billings' device for selecting judges would insure freedom from obligation to the power that made them judges. Judges selected by lot would certainly not be under obligation to remember, at crucial moments, who made them judges.

But with reference to judicial capacity his plan would be more of a potluck procedure, if anything, than we have now. Some men have the judicial temperament and some have not; some can look at an issue broadly and some only narrowly; some have a discernment that amounts to prescience and others are so warped by prejudice and whim that their judgments are as little regarded as those of a giddy school girl.

No, judges must be selected because of their fitness. We believe this can be accomplished through a free, non-partisan selection and election by all the people direct. Once free the judiciary from corporation grip and it will become as independent as fallible human nature can be made. Better salaries and longer terms will make the bench attractive to bigger men. It is, in our opinion, in these directions that progress is to be looked for.

The Right Roads Idea.

Michigan allows farming road districts a bonus of $1,000 to $1,500 for each mile of standard road built and accepted, which sum goes quite a way toward defraying the cost of building and the road is built where it is most needed, between the farm and the nearest market for farm products. The difference between the Michigan idea and the Gillett scheme is fundamental. The Gillett eighteen million dollar travesty has for its object joy riding in swift automobiles; the Michigan system looks to good roads from country to town in all the trading districts of Michigan, over which roads the products of Michigan are to be taken to market. The Gillett scheme appeals to outing parties; the Michigan plan to the everyday life of the "wolverines." Can there be any doubt in a sane mind as to which is the better plan?

The British Budget.

There will be things doing in England during the next six weeks. From even the suffragettes not so much as a squeak will be heard until it is ascertained whether privilege is to be made to bear its share of the common cost or if the whole burden is to be packed upon the backs of the toiling masses. It is time for Britain to slough off privilege, and for the House of Barnacles to give place to an elective upper chamber as a brake on the commons.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

It is a generally received opinion that whatever all men have believed in from all time must have at its foundation at least some element of truth. Perhaps so. If so, then witchcraft must be in some part true, for men of all times have believed in it.

But perhaps as prevalent a belief as mankind has ever cherished is destiny. The astrologers had their day, the oracle also, and they were succeeded by clairvoyants and palmists whose function it is to separate the fool and the fooless (chiefly the latter), from their money. They do it with facility.

Half the world believes in fate, and parts of the remaining half believe in fore-ordination, predestination, the eternal fixedness of the universal machine or something that prearranges our careers for us beyond our power either to will or to wont, and way down at the bottom of things somewhere there would seem to be some bit of warrant for the faith in fate that finds lodgment in so many breasts. May we, without joining the ranks of the eternally gullible, look into this matter of destiny?

Our first step will be so easy as to be obvious. Some of us were destined to be tall, some short and some neither tall nor short. Some were destined to be lean and some fat, and some fat and lean, like the bacon that sells best. Some were destined to be light and some dark, some to have blue eyes and some black or gray, some to be light-hearted and some serious or sombre, some warm and some cold, some timid and some full of daring. About some of these differences from others we had it in our power to do nothing at all, about some others to do only a little, to effect a possible variation from our type, such as a hard environment or an easy one might produce. As for the rest a microscopic germ cell, floating down to us through the loins of innumerable ancestors did the business for us. Destiny had its way.

Destiny took things out of our hands, too, as to nationality, language, race, infancy, elementary education, laws and institutions, traditions and aspirations of that portion of the human family to which we belong and, more irrevocably than otherwise, perhaps, destiny made sure of us as to those human attributes which we all share with the race.

Destiny fastened its grip upon us also when it surrounded us with perils not of our making, sent the lightnings and the storms, made our bodies subject to the law of gravitation, to cause and effect, to liability to perish in water and certainty of perishing without it, to susceptibility to heat and to cold, to disease and to accident. We are what we are mainly through destiny. Our boasted freedom is at the broadest confined to narrow limits. We were put here boxed like a compass.

Of all the functions performed by the body ninety-and-nine out of the hundred are performed without our willing yes or no, and so as to all the rest of life, it is the hundredth factor alone that is left to us to do with as we will. We face all the rest with a "kismet."

And yet, after all, there is a fractional hundredth or so (or it may be only a thousandth) of complete liberty left to us in which we may do as we please. Even the little of latitude which destiny left to us has proven more than was safe in the hands of many of us. From the moment we awake in the morning until we fall asleep again at night we are, within our little range of unpredestinated liberty, making choice betwixt one course or another, good choice or bad, wise or foolish, and, in the light of the use we make of that fraction of liberty, is it not rather fortunate for us, after all, that destiny holds us in as closely as it does? Not until we have proven our capacity for a broader freedom shall we scale the air to its altitudes or sound the sea to its depths.

If "signs of the times" indicate anything it is quite possible that football, as it has been played, soon will be relegated to oblivion. Since the record of the recent games has been completed a number of our higher institutions of learning have decided against further playing. Among these are Georgetown University of Washington, D. C., the University of Virginia, the United States Military Academy at West Point, and St. Mary's College, Kansas. Loyola University, of Baltimore, has ruled out all games for the remainder of the year, and the school board of Bellefontaine, Ohio, has taken similar action. It is considered probable that Virginia will legislate against the game. The record justifies this action, unless it be true that our young men should be permitted to kill one another at will in their sports, for the deaths this year were exactly double the number of those last year, and very nearly double that of 1907. To be explicit, there were 26 deaths this year, 13 last year, and 14 in 1907. This, of course, does not include any who yet may die of their wounds. On the whole, there is not much room for doubt that football will be played as it has been played but little longer.

The natural inference from a recent lecture delivered before the Royal College of Physicians, of London, by Dr. J. Lindsay, is that man, as we know him, is gradually fading away. The eminent doctor is convinced that every last individual of us all has too many yards, or rods, of intestine, which nature eventually will slump off, although he suggests that the "successful operations" of his profession might pleasingly expedite matters. So here we are, dragging around too many coils and coils of intestine. Nor is this the worst of it: The good doctor feels certain that we have too much jaw—which, in some instances, is not to be denied—and opines that nature will remedy this unfortunate defect by permanently removing several of our teeth which, at present, require too much jaw for their development. The outlook is gloomy, but it becomes worse when we learn that we are going to shed our toes, all except the great toe, which, according to the doctor, "is of service in maintaining the upright posture." With a short-circuit intestine, a rapidly fading jaw, a nearly toothless mouth, and but one toe on each foot, we will be quite attractive creatures, will we not; and the worst of it is that we never can tell when the doctors will discover that we are in possession of something else that we ought not to have. Yes, the prospect is very gloomy indeed.

Where Our Lumber Comes From.

First among our lumber-producing states, according to a Forest Service report, are Washington, Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas and Wisconsin, in the order named. These are followed by Texas, Michigan, Oregon, Minnesota and Pennsylvania, while Utah is lowest on the list, although Nevada and North Dakota produce so little lumber that they are not rated. The total valuation of lumber, lath and shingles was $541,545,640. This is an immense sum, but it stands against a valuation the year before of $703,306,000, which is a reduction of $161,760,360, or 23 per cent. The average value of lumber at the point of manufacture was $15.37 per thousand feet, of lath $2.27, and of shingles $2. The most yellow pine was produced in Louisiana, the most Douglas fir in Washington, white pine in Minnesota, oak in Kentucky, and hemlock in Wisconsin. The report, which contains 57 pages, can be obtained free of the Forest Service.

The Beef Trust and Our Cattle.

As the so-called beef trust is widely circulating documents in which it maintains that the present high prices of its commodity are due to the decreased number of cattle raised in the inter-mountain states, it is timely to call attention to the fact that United States government officials who have investigated the matter do not agree with the trust in its conclusions. In the first place, they contend that there never have been enough cattle raised in the inter-mountain states to largely effect the market. In the second place, they give the figures to prove that even in those states, as well as in others, there has been an increase, rather than a diminution, in the number of cattle. Here are the figures in which they compare the numbers of 1900 with those of 1909: In the former year Arizona had livestock valued at $13,227,000, now its valuation is $15,545,000, a 17 per cent increase; Colorado had $29,000,000, now $49,000,000, or 69 per cent; Idaho, $7,000,000, now $21,000,000, or 200 per cent; Montana, $33,000,000, now $52,000,000, or 63 per cent; New Mexico, $25,000,000, now $31,000,000, or 24 per cent; Oklahoma, $3,000,000, now $54,000,000, or 1700 per cent; Texas, $138,000,000, now $240,000,000, or 74 per cent; Wyoming, $18,000,000, now $39,000,000, or 117 per cent.

The Pay of English Actors.

The voice of one crying in the wilderness is heard in a lecture recently given before the London Dramatic Debaters by Cecil Raleigh, a writer of melodramas. The purport of the voice will best be recognized in his own words, which follow: "The average English actor is engaged for about twenty-five weeks a year. If he is very lucky he may be thirty-five weeks. Thousands of actors get no more than two pounds a week, some only thirty shillings, or even one pound, and there is a thing called a 'joint engagement' of man and wife at thirty-five shillings a week for the two, which is a crying iniquity." Expressed in terms of American money, it will be seen that an "average actor" over there receives but $250 a year, or $350 if he is lucky, while some of the profession receive but half as much. Taking for granted that these figures are correct, it is no wonder that Mr. Raleigh sums up the case by saying, "This, to an educated man, is rank, horrible starvation."

Fertility of Earth's Soil Increasing.

There undoubtedly is a popular impression that the fertility of the earth's soil constantly is being depleted, and that nature's capacity for feeding mankind consequently is being reduced. In a bulletin recently prepared by Professor Milton Whitney, chief of the soils bureau of the United States Department of Agriculture, and issued by that department, the professor combats this old theory. He holds that the earth's soil is not wearing out, but, on the contrary, that those soils longest worked now are yielding larger crops than they have yielded at any time in the past. For instance, during the ten years ending with 1906 the average wheat yield in Great Britain was 32 bushels to the acre, in Germany 28 bushels, in France almost 20 bushels, while on the comparatively virgin soil of the United States it was but 14 bushels. He also shows that during the past 25 years the average yield of wheat in Germany has increased from 18 to 30 bushels per acre, of rye from 15 to 25 bushels, and of oats from 28 to 55 bushels, and large increases in other European countries also are shown. Turning to America, he shows that during the last 40 years we have increased our yield of wheat to the acre by two bushels, and surprises most of all by claiming that during the last 40 years the soil of New England has yielded more corn and wheat to the acre than has that of the Mississippi valley.

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHELF.

"The Tribune Primer."

Doctor Eliot's five-foot shelf ran very strongly toward seriousness of purpose, toward those hearty substantial of the intellectual diet, and gave scanty room for cream puffs or lolly-pop. Our shelf, on the contrary, as those who have deigned to follow it have observed, is bent toward no strict regimen, but rather contains whatever an unfettered and rather vagrant appetite has found to be either wholesome or agreeable.

Thus, we include Eugene Field's "Tribune Primer" as, say, an olive, or a radish, or, perhaps better, as one of those pungent desserts that have a sub-taste of bitter almond in them. Field's delicate and delightful genius had a streak of grisly humor in it which, upon occasion, he could utilize in satire that burns like caustic and makes one shudder as it burns. These nonsense fables, published originally in the Denver Tribune, exhibit this quality in its blossom. They are humor so broad as to expose the very foundations of the American type of humorous comparison by exaggeration. And yet they have a saving grace somewhere, something elusive, of Field's own personal charm, that makes them attractive, perennial, classic. For a relief from subtlety, and "problems," and "exposures," take down the little Primer from the shelf.

WHAT PEOPLE READ.

New York is not only the chief publishing center of America; it is the largest body of readers as well, and what New York reads may be taken as a fair index of American taste in books. A writer in the New York Times has carefully compiled library and publishing statistics, and describes the following writers as the favorites of the present:

Judging from those which have survived, the readers of New York are to be congratulated on their discernment. Of what are called the standard authors, Dickens and Balzac have been in the lead and growing in popularity, for some years. Immediately behind them are Dumas and Robert Louis Stevenson with the leaven of romance to lighten the realism, using the word "realism" in its broader sense, rather than applied to the school of which Zola was the most conspicuous member. There is a notable falling off in the call for that type of realism. Along with this romantic appeal goes a constant call for the poets, Whittier and Longfellow receiving as much attention as Browning, Byron attracting as much as Shelley. But directly after come Carlyle, Hugo, and Hardy with an equal popularity.

George Eliot has fallen off, Scott and Cooper have also had a slump, and with them have gone Bulwer-Lytton, Charles Reade, Walter Besant, Black, and Washington Irving.

Individual works of writers have often survived where all their other works have been forgotten. "Charles O'Malley" still holds and amuses, "Midshipman Easy" goes his merry way, "Lorna Doone" has never lost its popularity, and "Jane Eyre" has persistently held the reading public, but the rest of the long lines of books written by Charles Lever, Capt. Marryat, Blackmore and Bronte are rarely taken from the shelves.

Of the living writers none appeal so steadily as Kipling and Conan Doyle. "Robinson Crusoe" is read by old and young, but of all the books dear to the hearts of children "Little Women" has never ceased to appeal to girls, and Henty, in any of his exciting books, to boys. Grimm's Fairy Tales appeal to both. Barbour is also read by boys as avidly as ever.

John Macy, who married the lady who educated Helen Keller, has lately resigned from his post as associate editor of the Youths' Companion and retired to his country place at Wrentham, Mass., where he will devote himself to literary work.

TO A WIFE.

By Edwin Chase.

(For The California Weekly.)

III. Be Mine That Love.

With clinging robe scarce lending to thy Modesty its due protection, I saw Thee at the dawn-time of a day in June, Fare forth upon a verdant lawn spread out To catch its early manna from the sun. And in the space whereon no shadow falls I saw thee stand, draw an half-circled bow, And from the impatient string let fly an Arrow to'ard one lone pale star that lingered, The last rear-guard of slow retreating night. Why didst thou choose that aim or wish that swift

Invasion of the skylark's realm? Emblem Of thine own ambition, radiant and strong, I saw the shaft leap toward the vaulted Heaven, and there I saw thee stand, a queen

And then I saw the arrow turn an arch In that high space, and marked its homing flight;

Beheld it leave the glory of the blue, Cleave through the upper airs of light and song,

And come to burial in the fragrant turf. Shall it be so with all the winged shafts That leave the quiver of thy hope? Shall they From all heights sublime return to thee, and Shall thine arm its strength, thine eye its cunning Lose and send them flying forth no more? Shalt thou, with arrows broken, bow unstrung, Need love, a fire, to cheer thy winter day? Be mine that love. All evil days and times Let God forfend. But chance they come, be mine

That love to make their coming even sweet. Or should the river of thy blood run low, Its current seep away into the sands Of carping care, that erstwhile flood become But silent pools between deserted banks— The fertile valleys of thy nature fail; Oh, then, be mine that love, that sun and rain, To bring the wine, the olives, corn, and balm, With joyful songs into those fields again.

IBSEN'S IDEA OF NORA.

The posthumous works of Henrik Ibsen, just published in Norway, disclose much of the inner workings of Ibsen's mind, and especially his care in planning out every detail of a play before writing it. The preliminary sketch of "Nora," which he wrote out in Rome on October 19, 1878, includes the following sketch of the moral of that play as Ibsen intended it:

"There are two kinds of spiritual laws, two kinds of conscience, one for men and a quite different one for women. They do not agree; but in practical life the woman is judged according to the law of the man, as if she were not a woman, but a man. * * * A woman cannot be true to herself in our modern society, with laws written by men and with accusers and judges who regard women's actions from man's point of view."

IS YOUR FAVORITE HERE?

The Gaulois (Paris) has been asking its readers to name the twenty-five greatest writers in the world up to the present day. The list which resulted from the votes given by 11,247 readers runs: Victor Hugo, Shakespeare, Racine, Corneille, Vergil, Moliere, Homer, Dante, Goethe, Bossuet, La Fontaine, Lamartine, Chateaubriand, Voltaire, Cicero, Pascal, Schiller, Plato, Cervantes, J. J. Rousseau and Milton. Votes were given for 432 other authors.

It will be noticed that the list contains the name of no living writer, and that fourteen of the twenty-five are French, three Latin, two Greek, two English, two German, one Italian and one Spanish.

THAT GREAT AMERICAN NOVEL.

The book reviewers and the publishers' press agents have filled the press for several years with much sound and fury about the great American novel. It is not known that the public has stood expectant and impatient, awaiting its advent; though it has eagerly read the perennial crop of novels that have been heralded as fulfilling the prophecy. It must be confessed, however, that every one of the books so heralded, from "The Octopus," down through "The Virginian," and to "The Adventures of Joshua Craig," have all received their generous measure of applause and passed on to the rank of "once best seller."

A friend points out that most of the very popular American fiction won its popularity because of its novelty alone, because it made us acquainted with some strange land or strange type of life or some exotic stratum of society. Thus, Jack London and Rex Beach have brought Alaska and the primitive man to the library table; Owen Wister painted anew the disappearing, romantic frontier; David Graham Phillips made us intimates of political greatness and acquaintances of the Four Hundred; and so on, through the list. If, then, this is the tendency and the characteristic stamp of American fiction, the author of the Great American Novel, aforesaid, would be likely to arise in the person of a globe trotter of fashionable social connections, some diplomatic experience, an acquaintance with the underground politics of Washington, and a large intimacy with the Wild and Woolly West—in short, a sublimated Teddy Roosevelt, John Hay, Jack London, and Reggie Vanderbilt in one.

But, our friend continues, if a novel were written by such a composite genius, it would be merely a tale of "surface indications" of American life, and in no vital sense a reflection of the American genius. Our talented friend sees a hopeful vision of a great American literary revival, imminent upon the horizon of events (and we are inclined to agree to that), but he conceives the form of its literary expression to be subjective and analytic, rather than objective and pictorial.

Perhaps he is right. But let us examine this plausible-sounding phrase, "the Great American Novel," and test it by analogy. What is "the great French novel?" Echo answers. What is "the great English novel?" Echo encores. What is "the great German novel?" Echo is asking for a contract at "space rates." In brief, the genius of a race is not like those fabled geni of the Arabian Nights, whose heaven-effacing bulk could be compressed into the compass of a brazen urn. The genius of a race is not for one man to grasp and fix in terms of art, complete as Athene springing from the brain of Zeus. Many arts, manipulated by many hands, may avail to transmit the glories of a race in some degree approaching to completeness. No one artist, not even Shakespeare, has caught the whole spirit of an age. The best one artist can do is to give a supreme birth to the best conception of a most sensitive and creative mind.

Furthermore, no artist can be the last word in artistry. So long as a race endures, the opportunity continues that a greater than he may arise and overtop him. Even the towering form of Shakespeare, sublimest peak in English literature, may not be the Mt. Everest of that literature. His race and his language yet endure. The future is unexplored.

So we feel that the great American novel is not a vital issue; rather, that it is a phrase of empty meaning. We suggest that it be expurgated from our terminology.

PLAYGROUNDS IN LOS ANGELES

By JOHN W. SWEENEY.

This article was first changed by the editor of The California Weekly, but the report made by Mr. Sweeney to the Playground Commission of San Francisco, of which he is secretary.

The Los Angeles Playground Commission control twelve playgrounds, including seven permanent playgrounds and five vacation playgrounds. The permanent grounds are in several instances complete, and the others are yet in a constructive stage.

The five vacation playgrounds are merely in active use during the school vacations, but the property of the School Department, and by grace of the latter, are managed by the Playground Commission, who equip the grounds in a modest manner, from their own funds.

The properties of the permanent grounds are elaborate affairs, and commend themselves from a standpoint of results. The "Echo Park Playground" is a best example of the energy exerted in this work, as it is practically complete in all its departments, as an up-to-date playground, as well as progressive in detail.

I was first impressed with the perfect discipline and ease wherewith the many outdoor games were carried on and the varied exercises were carried, each merging with the other in perfect harmony. Everything that could appeal to the tender child or more rugged youth was in evidence, and all in active operation.

In perfectly safe surroundings could be found the mother with her charges, revelling in the sport that appeals to the child, including the sand boxes and miniature slides; also the may poles and safety swings.

The more rugged could be seen playing croquet, basketball or even tennis. A baseball match was on; the outdoor gymnasium was active in its invitation for the athletic boy or girl; the bowling alley was thronged with its devotees, and the shower rooms were enjoyed by the youth who had concluded his play for the day.

Here was democracy triumphant, and play levelling all to an equitable, placid ending.

Recreation centers are present on all the grounds, and in which every detail for indoor enjoyment is observed. Here we have an auditorium for lectures, amateur plays or other entertainments.

The auditorium is also an indoor gymnasium, a kindergarten school, a nursery, a meeting room or a cantata hall. The stage or platform can be utilized as a reading room, committee room or a lecture room, by lowering a folding curtain similar to a roller desk.

A branch of the Public Library is established in an adjoining room, supervised by the Public Librarian. Once a week a good reader appears and gives a reading from a popular work, and then explains the story.

In the recreation centers, apartments are provided for the "ground keeper" and his family. This assures constant attention, notwithstanding the rules call for open and closed hours on the playgrounds. These apartments are entirely free from public intrusion, and are, as a matter of course, protective to family rights.

I found that every detail was carried out with the most economical arrangement, even to the space under the platform being utilized as a storeroom for benches or chairs, as the case may be, and the seats around the wall made into lockers for storage purposes. Everything that could be utilized was placed in action, and even the day was divided into watches that permitted the director to organize special bands or clubs, while the patrons could instruct the girls, as well as promote the high ideals that will make them better housekeepers, as cooking schools are a specialty.

I found that one special feature cultivated was the encouraging of meetings of the mothers in each playground district, thus insuring a moral influence in each section. The result of this work was in evidence all through the city of Los Angeles, by the absence of boys and girls from the streets. I believe these recreation centers are a forceful factor in the uplift of the children, and that it is a mistake to neglect this important feature.

I wish to emphasize the necessity of making the children a part of the constructive work, as it compels an interest of pride. All of the work is of local makeup, and where it is possible to have the work done by the children, the Superintendent will so arrange it; but where adult mechanical skill is required, then only local help will be employed, and thus a home interest is cultivated.

I found that when anything was not provided in the makeup of properties, the superintendent would arrange for an entertainment, and a nominal fee was charged; the proceeds were applied to the acquisition of the needed property, even to the uniforms, instruments and ornaments.

All through there was an utter absence of class distinctions, and I left the city of Los Angeles impressed with the conviction that the Playground Commission was solving the query, "What will we do with our boys and girls?"

The youth can be encouraged to greater things by the playgrounds of the cities. The boy in particular should be encouraged to cultivate his bent for any exercise he wishes for; then our calendars of juvenile crime will be minimized, the mother's worry eliminated, and the boy will be kept off the street.

The playgrounds of our cities will solve the problem of our children's salvation.

San Francisco owes it to itself to push the playground work.

EARLY CALIFORNIAN NEWS ITEMS.

The old Mercantile Gazette and Shipping Register, of San Francisco, was quoted last week. When the telegraph was completed to San Francisco the Gazette hailed its advent in glowing terms in its issue of October 31, 1861:

"The Continental Telegraph Complete."

The achievement of this enterprise is a matter of great moment to the Pacific coast. We are now in direct and daily intercourse with the Atlantic cities, at a distance of more than 3,000 miles. It is one of the great achievements which marks the age in which we live as an age of wonders. Thought is now materialized, we may almost say, without being shorn of its ubiquity. It can, at least, traverse a broad continent with the rapidity of a spirit messenger; suddenly assume form and shape before startled eyes in distant regions, and reveal mysteries that may change the course of trade and make or mar the fortunes of thousands.

"There are still some hindrances in the way, so that the transmission of intelligence is occasionally interrupted, owing chiefly to the anarchy prevailing in Missouri. A branch line running through Iowa will soon be in working order, when this difficulty will be obviated, and we may expect regular daily advices."

First Pacific Insurance Company.

The year that saw the telegraph completed saw also the incorporation of the first home insurance company, noticed by the Gazette of March 9, 1861, as follows:

"We notice with great pleasure the incorporation of the first insurance company upon the Pacific coast. * * *

"It may never become our true policy to be totally our own insurers. The disasters to which we are liable could, by possibility, embrace an extent that would make it imprudent to risk here our losses and all the ability to cover them. But we may divide these judiciously." * * *

The name of the company was not disclosed at that time, but was announced in a later issue as the California Mutual Marine Insurance Company.

Early Property Valuation.

Property values in those days were not equal to the prices now paid. The fifty vara lot at the northwest corner of Kearney and Geary streets was assessed in 1857 at $13,000. Last week Mr. Selah Chamberlain bought a lot across Geary street from this one, with a frontage on Market also, for $500,000.

The St. Francis Hotel, in 1857, was assessed at $7,500.

THE ORIGIN OF "SHOW ME."

The Cleveland Plain Dealer declares that the Missourian's watch-word originated in an Ohio printing shop, and describes the circumstances as follows:

About fourteen years ago there was working there a printer by the name of Sam McIlhenny, who hailed from Missouri and who did not hesitate to say so. He talked about it so much that it got to be a joke among the printers. One day a letter came from a Missouri farmer complaining vociferously that his paper had been cut off. In concluding, he said: "You folks may think it's all right to stop the paper I paid for, but I'm from Missouri; you've got to show me."

The circulation man who read the letter thought it was pretty good and took it up to show McIlhenny and the other printers. It soon became a byword among them and for many months was a phrase on everybody's lips.

One day a "tourist" blew in and he astonished everybody by springing the much used sentence.

"Where did you hear that?" queried the astonished McIlhenny.

"Oh, I first heard it in Cleveland, from Harry Wines," he said, "and he's been using it all over the East."

Wines was a tramp printer of the most typical sort. He hailed originally from Springfield, worked there part of the time and set type all over the United States. It appeared that he had made industrious use of the worn Farm and Fireside joke.

Gradually it was spread and it received a big impetus when used in the comic opera, "The Shogun," which is supposed to have given the phrase its first really national circulation.

McIlhenny is still working in Springfield.

A CITY'S WOMAN GUARDIAN.

In Milwaukee there is a woman who has had so much to do with the city's affairs, with the appearance of its streets and show places and with the upkeep of its largest philanthropic institutions that according to the "Book-keeper" she may be called the municipal patroness. She is Miss Elizabeth Plankinton, daughter of the late John Plankinton.

Her father in the early days supplied the growing town with buildings, notably the famous old Plankinton Hotel, he built business blocks and founded one of the great banks of the state, which failed only after his death. To the daughter has fallen the self-appointed task of beautifying and embellishing the streets and public buildings.

In every enterprise that has as its object the betterment of Milwaukee Miss Plankinton makes herself felt either by approval or disapproval, according to her view. Her opinion is respected, for by years of experience city officials and a great part of her fellow citizens have learned that she speaks only after having fully investigated each new problem.

As manager of her fortune she has shown great mastery of business, while her study in law has enabled her to attend to the legal intricacies of the great estate her father left her. On the occasional vacations she allows herself she is no less energetic and forceful. She is a traveller, and it might almost be said an explorer, for her pleasure is found not on the grand tour but on journeys into out of the way corners of Europe and Asia Minor, where few American women have ever been.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

The Woman Led Us.

Of all the grandpas I have had,
The very good and very bad,
Arrayed in skins or Paris-clad,
I most despise old Adam,
For he was first of all the chaps
Who, when their sins have brought mishaps,
Their protest whine as Justice raps:
"Ouch! I was led by madam."

He was the craven first revealed
Who fain had guilt in love concealed
By using woman as a shield
When he had sinned, to rue it.
The first, but not the last, was he,
For still too oft his sons agree
In urging as their doleful plea:
"The woman led us to it."

"The woman led us." Be it so;
Say hand in hand we walked to woe,
Yet none the less we surely know
That e'er her love hath fed us;
And every height to which we rise
Where rests the soul 'neath tranquil skies.
Each heaven sweet of high emprise,
A woman's love hath led us.

And some there be who, straying far,
Have lost in mists hope's guiding star,
And walked where grisly phantoms are,
While error's clouds o'erspread there.
Then came a whisper soft and low:
"Arise, dearheart, nor yield to woe."
They rose; they stand, and e'er they know
'Twas woman's love that led them.

One went his way of toil and pain,
And, stumbling oft, did rise again,
E'er vowing, "I will good attain,"
For she doth love and heed me,"
And when he reached the higher place
Where saints do look upon His face,
He cried, "Thank God that by His grace
The woman, she did lead me."

Where Santa Goes Wrong.

Sometimes it seems to me that old Santa Claus gets terribly mixed concerning the disposition of his Christmas gifts. Does it not strike you occasionally that he bestows them where they are not needed, and withholds them where they are? For instance, the child of wealth receives a thousand-dollar gift which she little appreciates, while the child of poverty, to whom such a gift would mean the difference between suffering and comfort receives nothing. Does it not seem unreasonable, unjust, even cruel in a degree? Of what can the good saint be thinking, that he does these unreasonable things?

I have been thinking of what a blessed Christmas the one at hand might be if Christmas gifts, save for a few inexpensive remembrances, went only where they most are needed. Suppose that the thousand dollars (many times repeated) went, not to one who rolls in wealth, but to one to whom it would mean support and sustenance through otherwise weary days, what a day of days it would be! Why it would be the Christ-life making itself felt again through a divinely perfect 24 hours, yes, and through many days still to come.

But it will not come to pass. Santa Claus again will move on in his old, blind, stumbling way; rich presents will go to the rich, little or nothing to the poor, and when that little is doled out too often it will be to the accompaniment of the old, selfish prayer, "Thank God that I am not as he."

Christmas is a good day, but do you not realize how vastly better we could make it?

Merely Suggested.

I wish to call attention
Of some papers on their roost
To the fact that you're not boosting
When you're merely yelling, "Boost!"

The Opinions of Rufus.

Mr. Rockefeller says the way to git rich is to save money. F'rinstance, if I should save a thousand dollars a year fer 300,000 or 400,000 years I'd be worth 'bout es much es he is. B'lieve I'll commence right away.

If you think the world ain't advancin' jest reflect that the One who had not where to lay his head was crucified nineteen centuries ago, while under our vagrant law, he'd only be sent to jail, or more likely, given a "floater."

Blow your own horn if you want to, but you're es likely es anything else to prove you're a poor bugler by doin' it.

Let us, brethren an' sisters, rejoice in the fact that the glad an' blessed Christmas season is approachin', when them that don't need presents git them an' them that do need them don't.

I dreamed that a man that remained a multimillionaire while people hungered an' starved to death about him died an' went to heaven. St. Peter didn't have a microscope.

It's true, Joshua, that persistency's a good thing, an' yit ain't you ever noticed that a mule ain't the most admired of all animals?

When you can prove to me that Satan don't have anything to do with politics I'll admit that churches shouldn't have either. Till then, I ain't goin' to b'lieve a little inoculation of righteousness 'll hurt politics any.

Seems to me anybody ought to know there's a hell an' a heaven. Haven't we, all of us, lived in both of them before now?

Sometimes what we call the black sheep of the family ain't reely black. He's only got in the mire an' been covered with mud.

I don't know of anything that I'm much more grateful for than I am that the God of hate has pretty near gone out of business, leavin' the God of lovin' justice to look after the office.

Trouble and the Alarm Clock.

Trouble, Ephraim, is like an alarm clock. You know how it was when you bought the alarm clock. You had been oversleeping mornings, and you realized that you must get to the office earlier, so you told your wife, the dear girl who also is sleepy in the morning, that you would fix the matter all right. Then it was that you bought the alarm clock, set it for an unearthly hour and wound it strenuously.

At the selected time the next morning the house blew up, and you with it. At least, you thought it did for a few moments, but you soon made up your mind that it was the alarm clock engaged in pounding a gong, ringing a bell, throwing bricks through the window and shattering crockery on the floor. You were nearly scared to death, but you tried to compose yourself sufficiently to reassure the dear girl, who was pleading with you not to let somebody murder her while she was so young and beautiful. This was the first morning.

The next morning the clock was nearly as bad, but it didn't smash quite so much crockery. The next morning thereafter it dispensed with some of the bricks. After that it became calmer and less incensed, until now—you know that it is so, Ephraim—you could not get your beauty nap in the morning without the alarm clock to soothe you into deeper and more peaceful slumber. You would miss it, as a babe must miss its mother's hushaby song. The little one may desire the hushaby song, but, as for you, give you the dear old alarm clock every time.

As I said, my boy, it is much the same with trouble. When it first comes you feel that you never can endure it. Tears are in your eyes, cruel pain in your heart, and you lift your hands to the heavens in bitter and unavailing anguish. But Time passes, and his healing touch is upon you. Still the scar is there, but the gaping wound has closed. You have grown used to the alarm clock. Pitiful, and yet merciful, is it not, my boy? Let's be grateful for the mercy, and so end the lesson.

We Are the Palace Builders.

We are building a stately palace, a palace supremely fair,
And proud is its lord and master, our multi-fold millionaire.
Of marble and onyx, it seemeth with dreams of the dreamers to vie;
But list, and you surely shall hear it, a pitiful, desolate cry.
'Tis the cry of the little children
Worn old in their break of day;
"Your palaces rise to our tears and sighs;
Our lives are the price you pay."

Make room for the master of millions; sound salvos of praise for him;
Bend low in his stately presence, or rise if it be his whim,
For fair is his palace, my brothers, and proud is his masterful eye,
And his scepter of gold bejeweled—yet list to that terrible cry.

'Tis the cry from our Pauper Alley,
From those who are gaunt and grim;
"There is never a God o'er the tear-wet sod,
And Justice is dead with him."

Ay, we are the palace-builders, and ours is the millionaire,
And ours are the gloomy purlieus, the spawn that is littered there;
And ever the palace hideth its dungeons, both dark and deep,
Where wee little children perish and paupers their vigils keep.

But what if beyond the shadows,
Or o'er the uncharted blue,
Our God is guarding and heeding,
His justice at last to do?

Modern Definitions.

Bribe—A small sum of money offered for illegal services.

Hold-up—A large sum of money offered as above.

Criminal—One who commits a crime, without possessing the money to hire lawyers.

Unfortunate Prominent Citizen—One who does the same thing, but has much money for the lawyers.

Judge—The man who decides what technicalities should knock out justice.

Justice—A lady who wears a bandage to cover the black eye that Technicality gave her.

Ruefing—The act of claiming that you are a criminal when the higher courts are convinced that you are mistaken.

The Clergyman Was Popular.

The clergyman was popular,
And he was youthful, too,
As you will judge when I narrate
That seven ties of blue
The girls sent him on Christmas Day,
And also four of green,
And two of red, and nine of gray,
And one of rainbow sheen.
Then did that youthful clergyman
Shed tears and cry, "Alack!
Why didn't some one tell the girls
I wear no ties save black?"

A Little Apropos Story.

Satan and a Higher-Up who had just arrived at his long home were engaged in conversation.

"How was it," the Higher-Up inquired, at the same time coyly shrinking from a tongue of flame that was becoming too familiar—"how was it that you were elected mayor of this city?"

"Why," Satan responded, as he motioned to the coal-heavers to pile on more fuel, "I made a pledge to my constituents that appealed to them."

"What was it?"

"I promised to make this the Paris of the Hereafter."

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Editor The California Weekly.

I am a traveling man and come into contact with a great many people in the interior of the state—merchants, farmers and working men.

If our champion for equality under the law is nominated for governor by the Lincoln-Roosevelt League he would most assuredly be elected.

People in the country read and think more than people in San Francisco do and Heney is held in high esteem outside of our own city.

Our greatest men have not been bred in large cities, but have invariably been reared in the country or in small towns where life is purer and thoughts are nobler.

With the 27,000 good men who voted for Heney at the last election still laboring for him—and these men do not change very readily from good to bad—the country would roll up such a majority as would surprise the narrow-minded politician in San Francisco and thereby demonstrate to him that the state is eager to be led out of bondage.

California is ready to fight under the banner of such a patriot as Heney and the people after the election would soon realize that they were indeed freemen and not subject to the domination of a corrupt machine run in the interest of and by corporations whose only use for the people is to despoil them.

The Lincoln-Roosevelt League can play an important part in the next state election but the ticket must be clean and the leader must be a Somebody.

Yours truly,

JAMES SMITH,
1341 Sixth Avenue.

San Francisco, Nov. 27, 1909.

Mr. Heney's candidacy for the Republican nomination for Governor of California is much in the minds of all except Mr. Heney, who does not appear to be exercised about it at all. The California Weekly will be glad to receive expressions of opinion for or against the candidacy of Mr. Heney, or anyone else, and will not publish them when the writer says not. It is time to beat the bushes for the bringing out of the right man for the place. On one point we think our correspondent clearly in the right and that is that the Lincoln-Roosevelt League candidate must be a "somebody," an aggressive, courageous, positive character, and not a negative non-entity whose sole strength consists in the fact that "nobody haint got nuthin' on him." The "organization" may be able to make use of such a man. The progressives cannot.

Business Manager The California Weekly.

Dear Sir:—Enclosed is check for $2.00 in payment of year's subscription to your paper. Mr. Uhl spoke highly to me of the paper so I agreed to take it for six months. It is much better than I thought could be produced in San Francisco. The editorial work is simply great and if the high standard which you have set can only be maintained you will, in time, have a great paper with an influence that is worth while.

I certainly wish you every success.

Yours truly,

S. C. SMITH,
717 Market Street.

San Francisco, Cal., Nov. 27, 1909.

We give the above letter space in our columns merely as an object lesson to our friends, showing how they can help us. Meeting a friend a colloquy something like this takes place:

"Have you seen The California Weekly?"

"No, never heard of it. What is it like?"

"Well, it is a high class, family weekly, something on the Argonaut order, only it stands for Right Things instead of wrong, and talks straight from the shoulder. I think that all good people ought to get in behind it and push it along. Try it for three or six months. I believe you will like it well enough to wish to keep it. I'll send in your name for a sample copy if you like."

"All right, I'd like to see a copy."

A great portion of our new subscriptions come to us in essentially that way. It costs our friends nothing but a few good words, and remembering to use them, and the efforts they are making are enabling The California Weekly to sink its roots deeply into the good soil of a staying constituency. This is a hunch.

Editor The California Weekly.

Dear Sir:—In your issue for November 12th there were two communications that I felt like endorsing most heartily. The first was of the more interest to me because, like your correspondent, I have been a traveler in Mexico and I feel just as he does, that our attitude toward that country ought to be one of moral restraint—as a nation and of helpfulness to a sister republic. Consistency is certainly a jewel but it greatly surprised me to read the comment The California Weekly had to make on this communication. If you believe so inexorably in the law of evolution, why should we worry about any of these things that come to pass? If the strong arm is going to triumph anyway why do we waste our time fighting against it? And I do not see what difference it makes whether it be the case of an individual, a city, or a nation. If the Mexican war was an "unjustifiable iniquity," I do not see how it or any other event of similar nature can turn out "splendidly profitable" to the moral welfare of our people. If we are "to perpetuate and extend those institutions in which we heartily believe" it must be with the consciousness that we are right and that right only makes might.

The other communication referred to the unquestioned value of your School for Citizenship, but like the correspondent I must admit I have not found the articles readable, but I doubt if any of us keep our text-books on Civil Government by for an evening's reading. Once it was prescribed.

Yours truly,

F. M. S.

Niles, Cal., Nov. 24, 1909.

We recognize the weakness of our position in relation to dominance of race when that position is assailed by either the moralist or the legalist, and we would no more think of trying to defend it at those points than we should of trying to defend the glacial period. All that we can say is that it is so. The man or the nation of men that wastes substance, does not behave and essays the dog-in-the-manger policy sooner or later gives place to someone who will behave better and make better use of the resources at his command. The world has need of the strong arm and that Uncle Sam has not made his strength of arm felt in the island of Hayti and in Central America before now for the maintenance of opportunity and order constitutes a national delinquency. European, if not world, pressure will force upon us the relation of guardian and ward to those countries and we shall have to assume that relation or fight Europe over the Monroe doctrine. Those countries have got to prove their right to govern themselves by governing themselves, and failure to govern themselves will involve a world-denial of the right. Our personal moralities and legalities are sometimes transcended by the larger ethics of race and humanity.

If the School For Citizenship is found unreadable to one who really wants to know, it is because the writer of it has failed as a writer. If one does not care to know, or knows all about government already, the School For Citizenship is not for him anyway.

Editor The California Weekly.

Assuming that the question as to the advisability of compulsory voting has been settled in every one's mind in the affirmative, the practical question as to the manner of accomplishing the result is more difficult.

It is a well-known fact that practically every one who has enough interest to be at all qualified to vote takes the trouble to place his name on the great register. The placing of one's name on the register is about as laborious and uninteresting a duty as appearing at the polls on election day and marking a ballot. Why is it, then, that from 15 to 75 per cent. of those who take the trouble to register do not take the trouble to vote?

If the motive which actuates this general custom of registration can be ascertained, and this motive made a reason why men should vote as well as register, the custom of voting would then be as general as that of registering.

Men register for the same reason that they prepare themselves for the various emergencies or incidents which may arise in future. The careless voter registers for the same reason that he keeps a pistol in his home, stores a little unneeded money in the bank, keeps a dress suit laid away. He may not need, or use, any of these, but he wants to be prepared for a day when he may want to shoot a burglar, use a little extra cash, attend a function or exercise the right of suffrage.

Then let the election law be changed so that the qualifications of a voter include the fact that he be a voter in fact, and that he had actually voted at the last preceding election. Before he is entitled to register he should be required to answer in the affirmative the question as to whether he had voted at the last preceding election, and if those who could not so answer were required to go through a burdensome proceeding into which might be injected enough element of uncertainty so that it would be easily apparent that the surest and most economical way would be to be able to answer this question in the affirmative, the matter would be settled as far as the legal machinery can settle a matter which rests largely with the individual conscience.

The same principle applying to registration could be made to apply to subsequent voting. That is, even after registration a man would not be entitled to vote at the next succeeding election unless at subsequent elections he appears from poll list or check mark to have voted at the preceding election.

Without having given this careful study I believe any

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Autocratic in Organization Comments on, and criticisms of, the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League are being made at a lively rate. This is desirable and healthful, but raises some issues that need to be met at the start. One criticism is that the form of organization is autocratic, the president having been empowered to appoint the state committee. That arrangement is provisional only. When Lincoln-Roosevelt clubs shall have been formed over the state these clubs will have the power to change the state committeemen, and the state committeemen will have power to change the president and the executive committeemen. The machinery will be put upon a representative basis as soon as there is an organized constituency to be represented. There was at the start no other possible way to do it, and, be it remembered, the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League is not a new political party. It is Republican and, in the state primaries, will fight for control of the Republican State Committee. When that control is achieved there will be small need for any other committee than the Republican State Committee, whose character is prescribed by law.

Positive Reforms Stoutly Demanded. Another criticism of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League movement is that it is negative and not positive in its spirit, that it is opposed to corporate domination, but is not in favor of anything in particular, and has not shown wherein government under corporate domination has been a bad form of government. Is it necessary to show that a monarchy is officially corrupt in order to convince an American constituency that a monarchy is not a good thing? Is it necessary, in order to arouse the Men of California to action, not only to show them that free government has been subverted, but also that a plutocracy is damning in its effects? Have things come to such a pass that we are willing to let free government slide if only we can be assured that a government that is not worse in practice may take its place? If the spirit of democracy has no stronger hold on the hearts of the Men of California than this then are they far on their way to a deserved forfeiture of the right of self-government. To The Watchman's way of thinking the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League may well take on positive and aggressive policies, other than that of emancipating California from corporate domination, but there have been whole peoples in whom the spirit of liberty burned with such intensity that they have flown to arms in defense of their liberties with less of provocation than the Men of California have been afforded by the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company. To our way of thinking we stand for something positive when we stand for free government.

Sore Heads Or Sore Hearts? The Solano Republican affirms that the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League has within its membership a number of political soreheads, as well as a considerable sprinkling of Democrats whose presence in the League movement is not clearly accountable. There is a measure of truth in the statement that some of those who broke into the League two years ago had so long served the "organization" that their reputations had become so threadbare as to make them no longer serviceable in the "organization" camp. Mr. Herrin knows when his warriors are fit only for the boneyard. Also he has no scruples about discarding them, and the League will do well to exercise a more prudent care than it exercised two years ago in excluding patriots of this quality; but there are not so many soreheads as sore hearts in the movement. There are not so many who are disappointed in not getting office as there are who are disappointed in the type of men who are being preferred for official positions they are unfit to fill. "Organization" methods base government upon the most ignoble, not the most noble, traits in human nature; the taint of spoils-of-office touches every institution and the heart of the "organization" strength is to be found in mobilized and solidified saloon and tenderloin vote. This makes the heart sick rather than the head sore. There is a difference.

Orange County Takes the Lead. Progressive Republicans of Orange county did not wait for the Lincoln-Roosevelt reorganization to assume state proportions before getting to work on similar lines of their own volition. A few days before the Oakland conference was held Republicans of independent spirit in Orange county got together at Santa Ana and organized the Republican Reform League of Orange County. Fred West of Fullerton was elected president and Robert Speed of Old Newport secretary. Orange county has not acted too soon in this matter. It has been held as an "organization" county, and as subject to the domination of Walter Parker as any precinct in Los Angeles, and by the cohesive power of spoils, to the injury of the reputations of some personally decent men. The spirit of revolt against corporation domination is abroad in the land and no man tarred with that stick is likely to fare well before the people at the state primaries in either party.

What's the Matter With M. Estudillo? Our Candid Friend of the Call takes a fall out of Miguel Estudillo of Riverside, respected citizen and senator from the thirty-seventh state senatorial district. Estudillo is a man in whom those who know him would like to believe, although they don't, all of them. That he was elected senator by the "organization," and that Gillett and Flint did their best for him, goes without saying, but the same was true of N. W. Thompson, of the Thirty-fourth district, as straight a man as there was in the legislature. It is not always that a real bad man can be elected. If not the Southern Pacific Political Bureau will get in behind a good man and then trust to luck to be able to use him later. They appear to have done this in the cases of both Thompson and Estudillo. Mr. Hiehorn credits Estudillo with having voted right 12 times out of 16 test votes and one of these, on which Estudillo went wrong (against the admission of Bell to the Republican caucus) could hardly be regarded as a test for the reason that some "organization" men voted right on that test. Another, the infamous change of venue bill, we have reason to believe, was voted for by Estudillo under a misapprehension of its purport, as explained to him by Wolfe. This leaves only two bad votes for which there seems to be little justification. One of these was against the committee substitute for the Campbell constitutional amendment, and the other was his voting for the Wright instead of the Stetson railroad regulation bill. In these instances, both railroad measures, he undoubtedly voted wrong, but Miguel Estudillo stood up so many times, and voted right so often, that those who know him best will be inclined to attribute these false steps to his having had the wool pulled over his eyes rather than to his having taken orders in response to the railroad whistle. If Estudillo knows clearly what is right he'll do it.

Is Curry To Be It? We hear it blowing up the wind from San Jose that Johnny Mackenzie, of the Herrin push, has been passing out the word in his bailiwick that Chas. F. Curry is to receive the Herrin support for the gubernatorial nomination before the people, and that it is all settled. If that be so then Gillett's hanging fire, to please his wife, until after the first of January, is a subterfuge and its only purpose is to give Curry time to get his fences all in repair. Stranger things have happened, but nothing is ever likely to happen so strange as that Gillett and Curry should both go to the people and so divide the House of Herrin against itself. Gillett's Union League banquet send-off may be regarded as having been a feeler.

Did He Get More Than He Expected? Early in the late city campaign one Berry was crossing the bay on one of the ferries. He talked loud and pompously to two male companions of the fight he was making for Crocker, declaring that all he expected to get out of it if Crocker were elected was the naming of one member of the Board of Public Works and one member of the Police Commission. Crocker was not elected, not near elected. Query, was that the Berry whom Fickert has taken to assist him in establishing justice and, if so, was a Deputy District Attorneyship a consolation prize to reconcile this Berry to the fatality of not being able to name a member of the Board of Public Works and member of the Police Commission, or look we for another Berry?

Gone After a Man Who Knows How. James L. Gillis, librarian of the State Library, in Sacramento, has gone East upon what the politicians will regard as a wholly unnecessary errand. His mission is to find some person capable of filling creditably the position which is variously known as Legislative Reference Librarian and head of the Sociological Department of the Library. For three or four years this position was well filled by Ernest Bruncken, a young man who had been trained in the Wisconsin State Library; but Bruncken resigned to become registrar of Copyrights at Washington, and Gillis appears to be remarkably particular about the filling of the vacancy. Of course, as every politician knows, there are plenty of cheerful party workers who would be glad to have the vacant office; there are a number of half-baked lawyers with a record of more or less valuable service on the stump who would jump at the job; there are superserviceable editors who would rejoice to receive its emoluments; there are even political preachers whose not unselfish zeal might be rewarded in this way. All of these are Californians, too. Why, then, should their claims be passed by in supercilious indifference while the head of the State Library goes off to New York or Boston to discover and import an assistant who is no better qualified, except by having a professional training for the work, than are these many deserving Californians? Clearly, it is all wrong—from the politician's standpoint. With what disfavor, for instance, must Mr. Charles F. Curry view the apostacy of Librarian Gillis!

Gillis Went Up and Pulled the Ladder Up. The humor of the foregoing lies in the fact that it was not long ago that James L. Gillis, State Librarian, was even as the small politician whose claims he now looks on with so scornful an eye. For years James L. Gillis was merely a political handyman for W. F. Herrin and other boss politicians of the Southern Pacific. It was for doing this kind of work that he was appointed Librarian of the State Library, and at that time he knew as much about libraries as a ditch-digger may be expected to know about canals on Mars. Many another politician before him had been appointed State Librarian because he needed an office and there was none other which could be found for him. For a long time the Library was such an asylum for politicians that a certain State Senator was fully justified by facts when he said: "There is but one man in the Library who knows anything at all about the books."

UP AND DOWN THE STATE.

All of Siskiyou county except seven incorporated towns voted "dry" last Saturday. The result of the election put 40 saloons out of business.

The fruit shipments from California this year were the heaviest ever made in the state. Fifteen thousand one hundred carloads were shipped, as against 12,920 last year.

Henry E. Ford recently found some deeds, given to him long ago by his mother, which, it is said, give him the title to property in Martinez valued at $20,000.

The Petaluma Woman's Club is taking steps to prevent the blocking of sidewalks in that city by merchandise.

Up to last week 2,750 cars of apples had been shipped out of the Pajaro valley.

W. L. Rideout has sold the Lakeport Bee to H. F. Cross, by whom the paper henceforth will be edited.

On Thursday night of last week the Rochdale store of Modesto was robbed of money and merchandise valued at more than $250.

With about one-third of the orange crop in the vicinity of Oroville picked, 81 carloads had been shipped east.

An unknown man, apparently a German, was killed by a Northern Electric train near Terra Buena last week Wednesday.

Heavy snows have driven mountain lions into some of the valleys of Siskiyou county. One of the beasts killed two large colts near Edgewood the other day.

W. D. Pratt, owner of the Kennett View and the Coram Enterprise, died in Castella recently.

Willard Burris, an 18-year-old youth of Lindsay, was killed by an electric car in Visalia the other day.

W. O. Hart and J. F. Craemer have purchased the Orange Daily and Weekly News. They promise to run it on the "square deal" principle.

A line of the Salt Lake railroad is to be built from Riverside to Daggett, a distance of a little more than 100 miles.

A tract consisting of 3,880 acres of land, situated near Le Grand, in Merced county, recently was sold for about $75,000. It will be subdivided and placed on the market.

In Tulare county the Bertillon system of identification of criminals by their fingerprints has been officially adopted.

The citizens of the Thermalito and Dredgerville school districts, near Oroville, have voted to issue bonds for the construction of a union high school to cost about $10,000.

F. E. Unholz, of the Ontario Record, has purchased the Whittier Register, and henceforth it will be published by him.

A nugget of gold weighing fifteen ounces and valued at $180 recently was taken from the Omega mine in Sierra county.

The Imperial County Enterprise is the name of a new weekly paper which has made its appearance in Imperial. H. V. Alexander is the editor.

Andrew Carnegie having agreed to donate $10,000 for that purpose, Livermore is to have a public library.

On the 21st of this month the people of Colusa county will vote on a proposition to bond the county in the sum of $600,000 for the construction of roads.

Ten pumpkins raised in the vicinity of Orosi, Tulare county, are reported to have weighed 2,400 pounds—eight or nine pumpkins to the ton, which is "going some."

The Kingsburg Record has entered on its sixth year and congratulates itself on the five years of success and prosperity which it has known.

Land owners in the central part of Yuba county are to unite in irrigating 4,000 acres of land there.

SHALL JUDGES BE CHOSEN BY LOT?

A SUGGESTION FOR REMOVING THE JUDICIARY FROM POLITICS.

By M. E. BILLINGS.

American judicial courts are a failure. It is no use to try to disguise the matter. Our so-called courts of justice are a failure. The constant repetitions of mis-carriage of justice and worse show this. The recent conditions of legal matters in San Francisco, where over three years have passed since the wholesale corruption in that city was well known to the world; and no one has yet been punished; confirm this. Even when crimes were confessed, and the confessions testified to on trial; and, even when the criminal himself confessed, and when indicted, pleaded guilty; there was the same mis-carriage of justice. Nor is San Francisco alone to be pointed out as a locality where the guilty go free, and even defy the law. New York, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Richmond, and many other localities show about the same utter failure of legal justice.

Just as long as the courts are filled with political judges and officers; just so long will this state of things endure. It is a well-known fact that it is not the best legal talent, nor the most honorable men occupy the judicial positions. When a party elects its president, it is expected he will "return the favor" and appoint some political supporter to a life term as judge. And it makes little difference what are the qualifications of the person. Has he earned the place by aiding in the election? That is the question. So, with our elective judges in the states. Some one who has aided to place in nomination a governor, member of congress, or even lesser officers; even though his assistance has not been of the most honorable kind; he must be rewarded—he must be judge. And, when he has been elected, he will still remain a human being, and will have his preferences, political or otherwise; and at least he will be expected to favor his friends rather than his enemies. Man cannot become an automaton simply because he becomes a judge.

Some states choose their judges by having them appointed by the governor. This is open to even more objection than to elect them, even if the voters have not a particle of opportunity to choose a judge when he is elected. Political judges are a failure. So, too, the system of choosing a judge to sit in judgment upon the affairs of those whom he has long lived with, even been born amongst; and whom he has had business with; has lived with on terms of the most intimate personal kind. Nay, as a judge must be a lawyer, he may have been counsel for many, opposed to many, made friends of many, made enemies of many; at least known more or less concerning the whole lives of many. No one believes these considerations would never affect the mind of even the most honorable man. If the judge should not be the most honorable of men; then think a little.

But, says one, you say elections are a farce, appointment even more open to objection. What remedy do you propose? Having passed over forty years at the bar and on the bench, and having arrived at the age of seventy-three, and having no aspirations for either office or even for law practice; I feel that I am in some measure able to suggest a remedy for political courts. I would have judges chosen neither by election nor appointment. I would take the last safety of our liberties entirely out of politics, and out of the realm of prejudice; and this is my plan, which I have advocated for many years; and made a political judge an enemy by so doing. All lawyers are supposed to be honest, capable, and worthy men. If this is not so, it is the fault of the courts. Now let judges of the courts of nisi prius be chosen by lot. Provide that a judge must be of a certain age, must have been in active practice a certain number of years, must be mentally and physically sound, must have a financial standing of a certain amount, must be free from improper habits, must have resided in the state for a given time. Have the names of all lawyers who have all these qualifications in the state recorded at the state capital. When the time comes to choose judges, let the names of all such lawyers, who have not beforehand declined to accept such an office, be placed in the urn and the number of judges needed at nisi prius be drawn by lot from the body of the state.

This is not enough. Provide that no judge shall hold court in the county of his residence, nor in a county in which he held court the preceding year. Subject to these restrictions, the place where a judge shall hold court shall be decided by lot. Surely there would be little danger of a judge being accused of favoritism or prejudice. He would never have friends to reward nor foes to punish under such a system. Nay, a judge so chosen, so attending to the duties of his office, would not have the fear that some one, however erroneously, might charge him with favoritism or prejudice.

Now, we have chosen our courts at nisi prius. Next let us choose a judge to sit in the appellate court. He must have all the qualifications of the judges of the courts below, and more: He must have practiced law for a longer term, must have sat at nisi prius or higher court. No judge shall sit in judgment on a case which comes up from the county of his residence. He shall only sit one year in any court consecutively. Judges of appellate courts shall be changed from one court to another each year.

Judges of the supreme court shall have all the qualifications of judges of the courts below, and the further qualification of having been longer in practice; longer a judge; be of greater age. No judge of the supreme court shall sit in judgment upon a case coming from his county, and a judge of an appellate court shall be drawn by lot to sit with the supreme court in such cases, to fill the number of judges in the supreme court.

Judges of the lower courts shall not hold office for long terms of years. Judges of the higher courts shall hold for longer terms. All judges may be deposed from office upon the petition of a certain number of voters; but no judge shall be removed from office in this manner until charges have been preferred against him, and he given time to answer them, before any petition shall be signed for his removal. Judges shall be subject to removal upon a two-third vote of each house of the legislature; but not without their having the opportunity to be heard.

No charge of felony shall be tried in the county where the crime was committed, and both the state and defense shall have a change of venue from the county, or from being tried before a particular judge, upon proper showing. A judge shall refuse to sit in any case where he considers himself in any manner disqualified.

Intelligence shall not disqualify a juror. Actual bias must appear before a juror can be challenged. Neither judges nor jurors who are disqualified by reason of physical disability, or who are over a certain age, shall sit in judgment. The twelve-man jury, a relic of the unreasoning age, shall be abolished, and a jury of an odd number, three, five, seven or nine, shall compose the jury, and a majority shall render a verdict in civil cases; two-thirds in criminal cases. A defendant in a case where he is charged with a capital crime, shall have any number of jurors not exceeding nine, at his option.

Record shall be kept of all proceedings in court, both by writing, and by phonograph; and upon appeal either party shall have the right to demand that the phonographic record shall be used. And the appellate and supreme court shall, upon demand of either party, pass as well upon matters of fact as matters of law; and may render final judgment thereon, or refer the case back for retrial in the court below.

The state shall have the same right of appeal as the defendant in criminal cases; but the result shall not reverse the verdict of acquittal by the jury.

Now, I ask candid examination of this subject. If it is crude—as it may well be, being entirely new—suggest amendments. But in the interest of a better system of adjudication; in the interest of a long-suffering people, who are tired of "the law's delay, the insolence of office, and the spurns that patient merit of the unworthy takes"; let us change our foolish, unjust, criminal, unsatisfactory and tyrannical system of administering the law.

and he is the janitor." But "Jimmy" Gillis proved to be different from his predecessors; they were appointed as politicians and remained such; he was appointed as a politician and became a librarian. There is hardly a stranger story of politics in California than the way in which this arch politician reformed the Library and practically abolished politics from its purlieus. Naturally, he did not do it all at once, and he received some encouragement from the Governor and from the Board of Library Trustees; but the greater portion of the credit belongs to Gillis. He is a man of native ability, with a good turn for organization; he traveled and saw how other large libraries are conducted; he was ambitious and wanted to equal or outdo them; he had enough intelligence to see that to be at once a political machine and a library was impossible, and so he decided to sacrifice politics in order to make the State Library really a library. He has gone a long distance toward accomplishing it, and it is believed to be the only case of this sort on record; but he has lost his usefulness to Mr. Herrin, who has now selected another party leader and personal representative for Sacramento to take the place so long held by "Jimmy" Gillis.

Will They Make The Primary as Odious as Possible? There are a few organization newspapers of the ranker sort which are beginning to talk about the repeal of the direct primary law by the next legislature, and it is possible that a scheme of this kind is really being considered by the higher-ups. That they conceded the primary law very reluctantly and only as a political necessity is known and if next year they should think that it had been so far discredited in popular estimation as to make its repeal a safe proceeding, they might decide to dispose of it summarily. It is hardly probable that events will play into their hands sufficiently to bring around a situation of this kind, though it is well to bear the possibility in mind and, at the same time, to keep an eye on what these newspaper organs of the machine are saying. That the machine finds itself a good deal at a loss to know how it is going to do politics with the old opportunities for trading votes in conventions taken away is very certain. The whole art of running a Republican State Convention for the benefit of the Southern Pacific consisted in capturing or buying a few delegates from the counties most thoroughly controlled and then using them on the trading basis to bring in all the other delegations which had local candidates. And the bureau always saw to it that the outside counties were well supplied with candidates. This game can not be played when nominations are made by direct primary, and it will be hard for the machine to find another game to take its place. A mobilized and plumped red light district vote re-enforced by California's followers would seem to be its only stock in trade.

it is not inhabited by angels of the right kind—if Uncle George is not triumphantly elected on Tuesday next. Under the Los Angeles system of nomination the better element is not divided into two factions while the hosts of evil are solidified. It is a straight, square, stand-up fight they are having and more than this the reform forces have no right to demand. The returns will be watched for with interest for it is chiefly in the cities that the fight for good government must be made.

President Rowell Chester H. Rowell, president of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, spent a little time in San Francisco and in Sacramento this week taking counsel as to the constitution of the State Executive Committee of the League. The committee is not made up yet but soon will be, and when it is it will be called together to prepare for the work in hand. It is likely that San Francisco may be treated as a special entity, as, indeed, the Oakland conference partly provided for, and the state handled as another entity. There will be things doing soon after the new year at the latest.

An "Organization" Convention Probable

It is in the wind that the Republican "organization" will also hold a pre-primary convention for the purpose of presenting to Republican voters of California a state ticket. This will be a perfectly proper proceeding if they will hold such a convention frankly as an "organization" or conservative, or whatever they may call it (except Republican) convention. They may qualify the term "Republican" by any adjective they can think of, "Regular," "Herrin," "Whistle-Toot," or what not, but there must be something to designate those who affiliate with the "organization" as that kind of Republicans. If they do not employ such an adjective it will be the painful duty of the Lincoln-Roosevelt to devise one for them and if they do it will be one that will fit like the bark to a dog. And then may the Republican voters take their choice! With both wings of the party in the field with primary tickets to choose from if a good Republican state ticket does not result it will be a pity.

The offending pin was taken to her, and there was no more trouble from Arthur. Presently it was the youngster's turn to read, but instead of standing up as the other students had done he sat still and looked frightened. "Well, why don't you proceed with the reading?" exclaimed the teacher. "If you misbehave any more I shall make an example of you." SUNRISE on the desert is an event of hideous magnificence. Over the terribly silent waste there spreads the gray, then yellow fore-radiance of the dawn. But with it come no accustomed sounds of day-break, no song of birds, no waking of Nature from her night of sleep. And when the sun lifts his blazing eye above the distant rim of the horizon, his beams pierce the shadows, but not the sickening silence that pervades the region like the stillness of the tomb.

Soon the light, unchecked by any moisture in the sky, has heated the sands until they burn to the touch and to the eye seem one vast lake of molten, burnished gold, blazing with a fervor that palsies sight. All save one spot where heated earth seems to meet the heated air. There appears a pool of pleasant waters, grateful to the eye, delicious to the fancy, but in the light of knowledge as cruelly bitter as the spring of Marah. For the experienced traveler knows it is only the delusive mirage, the daylight will-o'-the-wisp, seductive, alluring, tempting him to waste his strength upon a fruitless errand that it may vanish like mocking Ariel into the spirit air and leave no trace behind. There in the distance its placid dream-waters lie in perfect view, a torment that only serves to remind him of water's value and the dearth of it around him. And when, by some mischance, it happens that his supply is scant, the vision brings to him a menacing threat of famine, then of the struggle, the swollen throat and speechless chords, the dizziness, the consuming fire, the end.

This was the vision a man and woman and their child now faced with that gasping courage born of a dreadful fear, Fernandez, the gold hunter, his wife, Carmelita, and the infant Rosa, standing terrified, lost in the midst of that trackless, treeless, vacuous wilderness of sand called the Mojave Desert. A rash attempt to cross it without guide had led them to this plight. Their cattle dead and left far behind them in the waste, their only water an earthen bottle swinging at Fernandez's belt.

Standing upon the summit of a sandy mound they met the growing dawn, straining their eyes in all directions to find some guiding clue that might direct their way. The same wide stretch of unmarked waste spread out before them that on the day before had baffled them. As husband and wife completed their search of the horizon they gazed into each other's eyes and read the mutual hopelessness of despair. The ravages of the sleepless night just past were plain upon both, and when, in mute acceptance of inexorable conditions, they started down the slope, the passing of their strength was very clear. The arrogant swagger of Fernandez's usual self-confident gait was painfully contrasted with his present slow movements. The child began to fret and Carmelita picked it up by a great effort and snuggled it close to her breast. Its mouth dropped open and it gasped for breath. She touched Fernandez on the shoulder and he turned to see her face, set in the big-eyed, wistful gaze of the mother who is suffering for her child.

"Water," she whispered hoarsely, "water for the little one."

Fernandez turned with what she construed as a look of fatherly pity, and whispered back:

"There is none."

"Last night—what has become of it?" She struggled against the death-knell word.

"We drank it all, all."

"O, my God, my God!" moaned the mother, "My little Rosa, oh, my God!"

Fernandez turned away his head to hide the look of guilt he knew his face betrayed.

"They will die, anyhow," he gasped inwardly. "Why should we all die? No. They would die anyhow."

On and on they trudged, hour after hour they dragged one weary step upon another, the sun rose higher, brighter, blazed more fiercely, till the air quivered and the whole plain before them seemed to be dancing a drunken reel. At length, beneath the awful heat, the mother sank upon the ground.

THE TRAIL OF THE MIRAGE

BY ROBERT MANSOON

"Dead, dead, dead!" she moaned. "My God! My God!"

Fernandez looked and saw the infant's staring eyes set toward the pitiless heavens in the glaze of death. He knelt beside the prostrate wife, and as he did so the water in the bottle at his side swished and gurgled. The woman's eyes flashed round to his, and from their glance he knew she knew his treachery. The timid woman in her fell before the outraged sense of motherhood, and with its fall there came the anger of a mighty wrath. She swung her haggard face full into his, and in the cracked, false notes of her choked voice, she cried:

"Murderer! Devil! May the curse of God blight you and may the legions of hell tear your perjured soul forever for this baby's sake!"

She reached fiercely for the water bottle, too quick for Fernandez's preventing clutch, jerked it from his belt, and swinging it back, struck him full and square in the face with it, crushing him into a limp, unconscious heap. In her frantic rage she cursed the senseless lump at her feet.

"May you pray for water and the angels bring you brine!"

She uncorked the bottle and poured its little store upon the ground. As she did so, the fury of her passions seemed to consume her, her throat swelled, and she dropped beside her husband.

It was hours before Fernandez roused from the stupor of unconsciousness. He struggled to his feet, and there upon the ground before him lay his wife and baby, dead, and the uncorked bottle that had been his only hope. As he faced these awful reminders of his crime, the sense of his iniquity came full upon him, and smote him with the fear a murderer feels when his victim falls. Terror shook him, and he sped to put away from sight the ghastly accusers of his conscience.

As he turned to escape the spot, he raised his eyes and saw what mixed the emotions in his soul. A cloud of dust, the distant figures of men, horses, wagons, rescue, life! God in heaven, could it be true? He raised his thick voice to cry a hallelujah, but the figures on the ground beside him seemed to rise between him and the vision and the word choked in his throat.

He looked again, and then into his face there came the savage look of a man who has begun a fierce but unequal fight with death. The level sun was almost at his back as he dashed in the direction of his saviors. The first wild burst of speed quickly exhausted his little strength, and from thence on it was a slow, dragging struggle to cover ground. His progress through the heavy sand was frightfully slow. For what seemed hours to him, he strained along. He could not shout. He tried, but only raised a whisper. Nearer and nearer the goal of his salvation he drew, until all that lay between him and the path the travelers seemed to be making was a little hollow on the other side of which rose a gently sloping mound. He feared to go down into the intervening gully, for to lose sight of the caravan, even for an instant, filled his heart with sickening dread. But go he must.

As he emerged from it upon the rising slope, the sun was just upon the horizon line.

He struggled on up, and dropped on the summit from utter exhaustion and from what he there beheld. The wagon-train had reached the base of the mound as he was toiling up, and when he gained the top it had passed him by, and from its rear there floated back to him the words and laughter of two bantering men, joking each other about the night's ride ahead of them and what luck they might expect next day in Johannesburg.

Fernandez lifted up his voice to scream to them, but the sound would not come. Again and again he tried in an agony of despair—and failed. The travelers quickly disappeared. He turned his eyes toward the setting sun, and in its blood-red ball he saw the figure of dead Carmelita standing with dead Rosa in her arms, and all around the desert plain the flashing rays dripped blood upon the sand, and tinged his skin with blood, and then the sun dropped out of sight and he was in the desert all alone.

NOT ON THE STARVATION ROUTE.

It was James J. Hill who, not long ago, with tears in his voice and anguish in his heart, announced that the people of this nation have entered upon the starvation route inasmuch as they are raising less and less of food products in proportion to population. If Mr. Hill's prophetic eye was not dim at that time both the tears and the anguish were justifiable, but a report of the agricultural department at Washington casts discredit upon his eye. According to this report, we are raising food products, not in decreased, but in increased proportion to population. In arriving at this conclusion comparison is made between the four decades from 1866 to 1905 inclusive and also with the three years 1906-7-8. The increase of production in proportion to population is quite constant and very nearly unbroken. A comparison of the 1866-75 decade with the three years ending with 1908 will give a fair idea of it: In the early decade 6.2 bushels of wheat per head of population; in the latter three years, 7.9. Other comparisons for the same two periods follow: Corn 24.6, 31.8; oats 6.9, 9.8; barley .7, 1.9; rye .5, .4; potatoes 3, 3.4. There has been a decrease in the proportion of some kinds of live stock, but not sufficient to offset the increase in grains. On the whole, it appears to be possible that Mr. Hill may have been overworking his prophetic eye.

NEXT YEAR AT OBERAMMERGAU.

The chief performers for the 1910 production of the passion play at Oberammergau have been selected. Anton Lang will again take the part of Christus, Alfred Bierlind that of John, Andreas Lang will represent Peter, Ottilla Zwing will be Mary, Maria Mary, Mary Magdalene. Peter Rendl will represent Joseph of Arimathea; William Lang, Nicodemus; Gregory Breitsaint, Caiaphas; Sebastian Lang, Annas; Rupert Breitsamter, Nathaniel; Johann Zwiink, Judas; Sebastian Bauer, Pilate; Hans Mayr, Herod. Gregory Lechner will recite the prologue and Wilhelm Rutz will represent the Chief Rabbi. The director of the Passion Play is Ludwig Lang.

SECRET OF LITERATURE.

Arthur Machen, writing in T. P.'s Weekly, London, describes the secret of literature as follows:

Literature is the expression of ecstasy; it is the discovery that nothing is common or unclean; it is the revelation of the latent magic and wonder which underlie all things; which, indeed, cause things to be! To the uninitiated and unenlightened eye life seems a pattern of dull and opaque surfaces; art beholds all things as shining translucent, marvelous.

UNABLE TO PROCEED.

"Our stenographer had to go home again after she arrived at the office today."

"What was the matter? Sick?"

"Nope."

"Sickness in the family?"

"Nope."

"What then?"

"She had forgotten her gum."

SHORT TALKS ON DOMESTIC SCIENCE

By MARY ROBINSON THOMAS.

A dietetic's duty and privilege of catering is very often an unenviable position, simply because, sick or well, stomachs are hard to please, for abnormal tastes are often found. Among the well and among the sick they predominate and must be guided into right channels. No mean judgment is needed by the attending physician and dietitian to settle whimsical notions. Careful feeding of properly prepared food hastens the recovery from the most insistent disease. Without antagonizing the medical profession and with due regard for their wonderful work, it is safe to say, if physicians gave as much thought to preventing as they have to curing diseases the country would need fewer hospitals and the land would abound in homes filled with happy, healthy people. If this is admitted, as all sensible people must admit it, a dietitian's place is a very important one, whether in a hospital, school or home. When recognized as the one responsible for the building up of human life, not only animal, but mental and moral life, who can be elevated to a higher standard than she? She can greatly aid in the weaving of a most beautiful and noble fabric. Can any of nature's gifts rival the glory of human life in perfect health, and how rarely it exists. Prenatal care undoubtedly gives the would-be skilled dietitian the proper entrance to her future career, as naturally she should be a living example of good health. Good health promotes an amiable disposition and these are the prime requisites for an ideal dietitian. Her brain will be alert and her education should be general and as broad as time and energy allow. Above all she must practice what she preaches and prove her theories if she would have followers and the benefited call her blessed. A general course in domestic science, a special course in dietetic lecture work and invalid cookery and a thorough knowledge of chemistry of foods are essentials, besides, at least, a high school education. It would be wise to take up kitchen architecture so that more real common sense would be revealed in its construction and that part of an institution or home could be shown with more pride and more comfort could be derived from it than from the more befurrowed and almost obsolete parlor. A well-equipped diet kitchen should contain every modern sanitary convenience. The dietitian should be capable of planning such a kitchen or remodeling one, so that the work may be expeditiously and easily done. If a patient is kept surgically clean part of the time, why not all of the time for best results, and so, I plead for more and better diet kitchens throughout the country. Poisons always lurking about foods which are improperly housed and cared for, enter the system quite as readily by the mouth as by a wound and so a diet kitchen can not be too clean. Usually it is in the diet kitchen that nurses receive their first lessons in scrubbing. A dietitian's responsibilities are great, her hours are long and her patience should be never ending. For this she should receive sufficient remuneration; but now she is on a par with the head cook in the house kitchen whose work in comparison is but that of a machine.

All will agree that to become proficient in just one branch is a life's work, and physicians in the near future will be quite willing to leave the subject of diet entirely in the hands of a capable, painstaking dietitian providing the latter can be thoroughly acquainted with each disease and a daily report of each case made to her. Rarely is the true station of the dietitian recognized. Cook and dietitian are synonymous in many minds—now, a dietitian is a cook plus and a cook is a dietitian minus—that is, a dietitian knows the process and principle of cooking while a cook knows the process only.

FEDERAL CORPORATION TAX.

A rising tide of discussion of the new corporation tax law is flowing through the trade papers and more serious magazines throughout the country, indicating the naturally large interest amongst business men regarding the act which will soon begin to affect all corporations.

The question of the constitutionality of the law is raised. Has the federal government the power to tax the operation of a corporation licensed by a state and transacting business wholly within that state? The excise tax on the manufacture of spirituous liquors and tobacco products is the precedent most obviously apt in reply. It is probable, furthermore, that the law will be tested in the courts of last resort before the business men of the country will be fully satisfied as to its binding qualities. Few corporations, however, are likely to neglect to make the required return to the collector of internal revenue, in the face of the penalties involved in such neglect.

The greatest apprehension felt by corporations generally is with regard to the so-called "inquisitorial" power vested in the revenue service, enabling it to examine the books of any corporation upon reasonable suspicion of fraud in the returns, and empowering the president to make public its findings in his discretion.

The origin of this clause is easily discerned. State laws for the regulation of corporations have notoriously failed because the interstate character of the larger concerns has enabled them to juggle assets and to appeal to public sympathy on the ground of harassing inequalities of legislation in the different states. State taxation of corporations has been equally inadequate. The public demand that the larger corporations obey the laws and pay their taxes has led to a demand for a governmental power of equal territorial scope and greater resources of authority to enforce the people's will. Hence the corporation tax and the investigation and publicity clauses.

The tax is defended upon the ground that it leaves to the states the taxation of the local, physical property of corporations, and confers jurisdiction upon the federal government to tax only the more elusive and fluid assets and the intangible assets that have hitherto escaped and seemed likely always to escape state taxation.

The tax is defended economically because it does not tax capital while it is at work, but only taxes the fruits of capital after it has been used; and furthermore, taxes only the net amount of those fruits, not their gross amount.

From these major considerations the discussion branches into endless inquiries and objections regarding minor details of the law. One incidental, practical phase is of interest. The collector of internal revenue in San Francisco finds the greatest difficulty in locating many corporations which have registered a particular locality as their "principal place of business," while actually operating mainly elsewhere. Some of these corporations are practically defunct, others are only a vague memory. Undoubtedly a valuable result of the operation of the law will be to clear up the physical and legal status of many corporations.

THOSE LONDON ADDRESSES.

The London correspondent of the New York Sun has at last elucidated for American readers the meaning of the mysterious initials that must follow all London addresses, as follows:

"There are only certain parts of London in which one can live and be recognized. It is divided into districts, the most important of which bears the address London, W.

"The next district in importance is S. W. (Southwest). This includes Chelsea, where the artists congregate, and South Kensington, where upper middle class fashionable folks live.

"N. W. (Northwest) includes Hampstead, St. John's Wood, Belsize Park (one of the prettiest and healthiest parts of London), where wealthy city men reside, and the many large residences there can boast beautiful gardens and lawns, such as are unobtainable in any other part of London.

"The next district, and one of the most closely populated, is W. C. (West Central). It is a world of boarding houses, and being the most convenient part of London for railway stations, places of amusement and sight-seeing generally it is peopled with the most cosmopolitan set to be found anywhere in the world."

MEMENTOES OF DICKENS.

A large collection of Dickens' mementoes were recently exhibited in London, says the New York Sun. They were exhibited by Mr. and Mrs. Henry Dickens at a bazaar to assist the Charitable and Needlework Guild. Mrs. F. H. Dickens, Mrs. Kate Perugini, the novelist's daughter; Miss Georgina Hogarth, his sister-in-law, and some of his granddaughters were at different stalls.

The novelist's court suit, still in excellent condition, was shown, together with a table where most of his writing was done in the late '50s, the manuscripts of "The Cricket on the Hearth" and two big quaint early Victorian chairs from the Dickens home at Fumival's Inn.

Dickens' walking stick, his key basket, two medicine chests which he took with him on his travels, the shorthand notes which he used in teaching his sixth son, and china and glass which belonged to him were to be seen by admirers of the novelist. A feature of the collection was the copy Queen Victoria gave the great writer of her book "Our Life in the Highlands." It is said that she told him it was "from the humblest beginner to the greatest master." The book has an inscription written by the Queen on the flyleaf.

By Robert J. Burdette.

Waits the long train in the station lights,
Steadily shine the stars o'erhead;
A sword of flame, the headlight smites
The rails of steel into silver thread;
The platform is cleared by the "All aboard!"
Stationmen loiter a space to hear
The brakeman echo the parting word—
From step to step—sharp—positive—clear—
"Right!"
"All right!"
"All right here!"

Black clouds blot out the star-shine fair,
The train roars into the driving rain;
Lightnings darken the headlight's glare,
Whirlwinds grapple the bridge again;
Gorges foam with the torrent's wrath,
Mountains tremble with rage and fear;
One minute a signal bars the path—
Then into the storm with the cry of cheer—
"Right!"
"All right!"
"All right here!"

Day coach and smoker—mail and express—
That challenge rings through the starting train;
Back in the Pullman's coziness
The sleepers hear it—and sleep again.
Let the storm rage! The day will beam!
Vigilance watches by rail and wheel;
Duty and courage, and steel and steam,
Blend in the brakeman's cheery peal—
"Right!"
"All right!"
"All right here!"

Swings the old world through the wrong and the right,
Storms of December and sweetness of June;
Terror of darkness and gladness of light,
Wrack of the tempest and calm of the moon;
Here, where our hearth fire tenderly gleams,
There, by the farther star, steady and clear,
The mighty One smiles at our terrors and dreams,
Hailing the days of each oncoming year—
"Right!"
"All right!"
"All right here!"

PERSONALIA

Pupin, who is the inventor of the wireless telephone, worked his way through Columbia College. He is said to have received $800,000 for his invention.

Miss Alice Fischer traveled all the way from New York to Cheyenne, Wyo., to cast her vote in the recent elections. The trip cost in the neighborhood of $200.

In a speech lately President Fallieres of France expressed the intentionally guarded but noteworthy hope that he would live to see "equality realized between the sexes."

The town marshal of Crete, Neb., recently inserted this brief card in the newspapers of several nearby towns: "Wanted—Seventeen hoboos for stone crushing. None but bona fide hoboos need apply." Not a "bo" has been seen in Crete since the ad. appeared.

The ex-court painter of the ex-Sultan of Turkey is an Italian, one Fausto Zonaro. He claims $45,000 for having immortalized on canvas several feats of the Turkish army, claiming that his services were worth five times those of the Sultan's bandmaster, who got $9,000.

One man, Maximilian Morgenthau, now possesses by purchase the entire modern town of Woodmere, L. I., having paid about $3,000,000 for its 400 acres and all the property of the land association which built it. It is on the Long Island railroad between Jamaica bay and Woodmere bay.

Mrs. Ada Smith Lang was recently nominated by the Socialist party for the Maryland Legislature, but was declared ineligible by the Board of Supervisors, who refused to put her name on the ballot. Judge Stockton ruled that the board had not the power to decide the case, the House of Delegates being the sole judge of the eligibility of its members, and he held that Mrs. Lang's name must be put on the ballot.

Rev. Newell Dwight Hillis, the successor to Henry Ward Beecher's pastorate in Brooklyn, says that "women are getting more of the education of today, and before long, if the men continue to go into business and get their recreation in the evening with a little ball driven about over a table with a cue, while the women follow intellectual pursuits, the latter will be the only educated persons in the country."

Mrs. Philip Snowden of London, who has just arrived in this country to give her aid for the second time to the equal suffrage agitators, declares that she has no faith in the militant methods of the English suffragettes. "The weakness of the militants," declared Mrs. Snowden, "lies in the fact that the majority of English women are not behind the suffrage movement. That is why I believe in a campaign of education."

The Toronto Globe notes the passing of a great writer from active work: "Nothing in Mr. Goldwin Smith's long and distinguished career as a journalist became him better than the manner of his retirement from his favorite avocation. He penned no farewell message to his fellow journalists; they needed none. There is only the simple announcement in the Toronto Weekly Sun that 'old age requires him to retire,' and the equally curt intimation that therefore anonymous articles are no longer to be ascribed to him."

These are some of the mementoes that President Taft brought back to Washington from his tour of the states: A Navajo blanket, a saddle from Gregory, Tex.; gold nuggets of California; Indian pottery from Arizona; a burnt wood picture of himself; oil paintings of historic scenes and of the St. Louis harbor; copper trinkets from Butte; golf clubs from California and Texas; a gold bell that was used in the ceremony of turning on the water of the Gunnison irrigation tunnel; badges from everywhere, and keys of a score of cities.

SHEAR WIT

Uncle Ezra says: "They's two kinds uv people in the world, them you know the day fore 'lection, an' them ez don't know you the day arter."—Boston Herald.

"Oh, no," said the impecunious author, "I don't mind my poor, bare garret. Homer, you know, wrote his masterpieces up under the roof." "Where's your authority for that?" "He certainly wrote them in the Attic."—Boston Transcript.

"Please, Mr. Bishop, may I ask you a question?" "Certainly, certainly, sir," replied the Bishop, good naturedly, as he fumbled the folds of his official robes. "It's about them," said the boy, eyeing the Bishop's robes. "Is they all you have on, or has you pants under 'em?"—Philadelphia Times.

Adlai E. Stevenson in his book of reminiscences writes: "Seldom have more significant words been uttered than those of John Randolph of Roanoke when told that a certain man had been denouncing him. 'Denouncing me?' replied Randolph with astonishment. 'That is strange: I never did him a favor!'"

A certain member of the staff of the Illustrated London News was a man who was distinctly uncleanly in his habits. The editor once remarked to Douglas Jerrold that he could not imagine why the man's hands were so dirty. "I can't say," replied Jerrold, "unless it is that he has a habit of rubbing them over his face."

"I suppose you will soon be looking forward to the coming of Santa Claus," said the old-fashioned man. "No," answered the painfully precocious child. "It's too early to begin to figure. They kept me on my good behavior for ten weeks last year, and all I got was a suit of clothes that was coming to me anyhow."—Washington Star.

One policeman stood on the corner of Blank avenue and Dash street last night. To him appeared a flustered Scotchman, speaking these words: "Are ye a police officer? Then listen! My good wife runs a boarding house i' th' next square. We have sixteen boarders and I keep a dog. I give y' me word that of a Saturday night, th' dog is th' most respectable o' th' lot. Wad ye mind keepin' yer eye on us?"—Cleveland Leader.

A member of the Civic Club, which is a most worthy organization, was riding in a Thirteenth street car the other evening when a brute of a man expectorated on the floor. Thereupon the Civic Club member arose and walked back to the conductor to protest, saying: "Do you permit spitting in this car?" The conductor tipped his hat and said: "Not generally, ma'am; but if you want to spit go ahead. I'll not object in a case of emergency."—Philadelphia Times.

A young couple of Liberty were walking past a dry goods store when the wife stopped to admire some of the dresses. After a moment she returned to where she had left her husband, and, grasping an arm, complained: "You never want to stop and look at anything that interests me. You don't care for me any more. You haven't kissed me for three weeks." "It's not my fault, but my misfortune," replied the man, politely. It was not her husband.—Kansas City Star.

A Brooklyn reader of the New York Times asks this pertinent question about spirit-rapping: "What I wish to know is—why always tables? I refer to Mme Paladino's friends, the spirits, of course. They seem to have so little originality; fifty years ago they thumped on tables and lifted them up, and today this is the only article of furniture they care to recognize. Yet there are others quite as appealing to the imagination. It would make a variety at least to slam the door, pull out the bureau drawers, unlock the bookcase, or make a chair give you its paw. But no; always the table. Can you throw any light on the subject?"

("Little Talks"—Concluded.)

Los Angeles, Cal., Nov. 24, 1909.

The foregoing suggestion, offered by the District Attorney of Los Angeles, serves to show that the difficulties in the way of compulsory voting are not insurmountable. The compulsion will not have to depend upon its severity for its efficacy, but rather upon its automatic certainty. It should be self-acting. The non-voters should be compelled to show cause why their names should not be stricken from the Great Register and that cause, set forth on oath, should be sufficient to warrant a court, or board of election commissioners, in restoring the name to the voting list. If the cause be held insufficient then the voter might be deprived of the suffrage for a term of years and public record made of the facts, a record of which no man would be warranted in feeling proud. The problem can be worked out and if such men as District Attorney Fredericks will address themselves to it and prepare the needful legislation for it, California may easily lead off in one of the most important political reforms of our time. Why not form a Compulsory Voter's League to get together and work the problem out and then work it up? Who will join it? The California Weekly will undertake the enrollment of names and needful correspondence.

In the Matter of the Petition of THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY, to ascertain and establish its standing as a newspaper of general circulation. No. Dept.

PETITION
Now comes THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY, a newspaper of general circulation, as that term is defined in Section 4460 of the Political Code of the State of California, and established, printed and published in the City and County of San Francisco, in said State, by A. J. PILLSBURY, its editor and manager, and sets forth the following facts, and avers, to-wit:

That the said newspaper is, and for upwards of one year next preceding the making and filing of this petition, has been, a newspaper published for the dissemination of local news and intelligence of a general character, and during all of said time has had, and now has, a bona fide subscription list of paid subscribers, and that said newspaper has been established, printed and published at regular intervals, to-wit, once a week, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, for upwards of one year preceding the date of this petition;

That said CALIFORNIA WEEKLY is not devoted to the interests or published for the entertainment or instruction of a particular class, profession, trade, calling, race or denomination, or for any number of such classes, professions, trades, callings, races or denominations, or with the avowed or any purpose to entertain or instruct such classes.

Wherefore petitioner prays that upon due notice and proceedings had for that purpose, the court will render a decision and judgment ascertaining and establishing the standing of petitioner, the said CALIFORNIA WEEKLY, as a newspaper of general circulation, as that term is defined in Section 4460 of the Political Code of the State of California.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The State's Miscellaneous Revenues.

After that early period during which the state raised its revenues largely by license taxes, stamp taxes and similar devices, there came a long series of years when nearly all the money it collected came from the ad valorem property tax. The latter is still the main source of receipts into the treasury, but the other sources, in the aggregate, almost equal in importance the property tax.

A dozen years ago, when the net revenues of California totaled about $7,000,000, the property tax produced three-quarters of that amount. Today, with revenues of between fifteen and sixteen millions, the proportion derived from property tax is not much over one-half of the whole.

The poll tax, which aids in supporting the common schools, produces upward of six hundred thousand dollars a year; the inheritance tax runs from seven hundred to nine hundred thousand; the corporation license tax brings in about six hundred and fifty thousand; office fees of the Secretary of State produce two hundred thousand; insurance taxes are good for three hundred thousand; sales of State lands usually run over a hundred thousand; sales of school books to a hundred and fifty thousand; the proceeds of prison industries amount to three hundred thousand; interest on bond investments to two or three hundred thousand; interest on deposits of State moneys in the banks (the newest of the State's sources of revenue) can be counted on for seventy-five thousand dollars or more; and besides these there are a great variety of receipts which amount to a large sum in the aggregate.

The largest of all of the State's various sorts of earnings has not been mentioned—the receipts from rent of wharves and other collections by the State Harbor Commission of San Francisco, which have increased to about a million and a quarter of dollars per year. These latter receipts, however, never go into the general expenditures of the state government, all above costs of maintenance being put into improvements on the San Francisco water front.

Indeed, a considerable portion of all the miscellaneous, or as we may call them, indirect, revenues of the State do not go into the State's general fund, but into special funds and are disbursed for special purposes. For example, the six State hospitals all collect more or less money for board of patients, etc., the least amount for any one hospital being about $10,000, and from this up to nearly $40,000 per year for the largest hospital. Each hospital has what is known as a contingent fund, in which its receipts are deposited, and they are not used for any other purpose than the benefit of that particular hospital; ordinarily the contingent funds are not drawn upon for support or salaries, but for buildings and other improvements.

So, too, the Fish and Game Commission receives the benefit of all of its collections from sales of hunting licenses and fish licenses, fines for violation of the game laws, etc.; the hunting license, which is a new thing, produces over a hundred thousand dollars a year.

While these collections, which go into special funds, do not serve directly to lessen the amount of money collected by taxation for the general fund, they do so indirectly, because otherwise more money for these various institutions and boards would have to be appropriated, and that would mean more taxes to be levied.

Until recently miscellaneous sources of revenue have been neglected in State finance, the feeling prevailing that the ad valorem property tax was the only important, or only proper, source of income for the State. But with the great increase which has taken place in expenditures, the tax rate would now be very high but for the inheritance tax, corporation tax, insurance tax and other revenue producers. Still further development of the indirect taxes, and of institution earnings, is possible and will be secured in future if a thrifty policy shall prevail in state finance.

Kaiser's Palace Nearing Completion.

The Kaiser's new palace, which is being constructed at Posen, and which, of course, is but one of the several which he occupies at various times, is nearing completion. How magnificently regal in all of its features it will be is sufficiently indicated by its cost, which will be somewhere between $5,000,000 and $7,000,000. It is announced that the monarch will spend but a few days of each year in this palace. In the meantime, as announced in this paper last week, 36,000 little children of the Kaiser's realm habitually go breakfastless to school because there is no food in their homes. "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my little ones."

Commutation of Saloon Sentence.

THERE ARE CONDITIONS under which a calamity may become a godsend, as when one under sentence to death has that sentence commuted to imprisonment for life. It is so with the saloon men of Fresno. Their business was under a death sentence. That sentence was commuted by Mayor Rowell into a life job of being good which, to that interest, is equivalent to durance vile. Fresno has taken a step forward after having taken two steps backward. Perhaps that is as far forward as Fresno can be counted on to stay put. Our liquor creed is this: Liquor is going to be sold. It is better that it should be sold under the law than outside it. The best places to sell it are in restaurants with meals and in liquor stores, not to be drunk on the premises. Fresno set that model before the state, but has substituted for it a model saloon license system. The gain over what was aforesaid is great. The loss over what we had hoped for is considerable, but, gains and losses offset against each other, Fresno still heads the license cities of California and deserves commendation from all who stand for Right Things. However, we expect the saloons of Fresno to behave so badly that they will all have to have their heads chopped off yet.

Morse Gets It.

CHARLES W. MORSE IS OFF for prison. He is a nice man. Everybody who knows him likes him, and Uncle Sam has been implored by the very elect of New York to let up on him and dismiss him with a reprimand. To be sure he cinched the poor of New York on their ice bills, with the result that babies by the hundred found their way into free graves and sick folks suffered in hot tenement houses for a cup of cool water, but, then, that was business and a nice man may do business without regard to consequences so he does it according to the rules. Morse set a string of banks on end, like so many bricks, with the result that when one went down the whole row went, too, but that also was business not inconsistent with being a nice man. But he broke the rules of banking, and must go to prison for fifteen years for the least among the offenses he has committed against the well-being of society. Verily the law is a blunt instrument.

The Score Made at Los Angeles.

IT WILL BE HARD TO OVERESTIMATE the good effects likely to result from the victory of the good government forces over the party programmers in Los Angeles. The object lesson should not be lost on San Francisco. The essential difference between the elections held here and there was that, here, the forces that stood for Right Things were divided and disheartened. There they were unified and encouraged. Party politics has no place in municipal affairs. Congratulations to Los Angeles for having eliminated that unwholesome feature from its civic life! Especially gratifying, too, is the fact that the old school board was re-elected. So far as influence is concerned, Harrison Gray Otis appears to have joined the down-and-out club. He should have been a charter member.

The Yees and Yicks.

FROM THE STANDPOINT OF ALTRUISM the vendatta now raging about the bay between the gentle, brown Yees and the almond-eyed Yicks is to be regretted. That method of establishing justice is of the old dispensation, when only an eye was a proper recompense for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, a life for a life, but on the score of efficiency the system leaves little to be desired. It is prompt. It causes the whole Chinese population to sit up and take notice, whereas our American efforts to redress wrong are attended with apathy. Incidentally the vendetta system reduces our population of undesirables.

The White Slaves of the Sea.

THE GETTING TOGETHER of the shipping interests of the world, for the apparent purpose of preventing the upward tendencies of sea-faring men, may well challenge the attention of those interested in the rehabilitation of the American merchant marine. A chief cause of the degradation of our marine has been the degradation of the sailors of other nations. In their low estate has been found a coign of vantage in competing with American-manned ships. How would it do to subsidize American seamen as well as, or instead of, American ship owners?

The Crocker Cancer Fund.

IT OUGHT NOT TO BE NECESSARY for research work, in any field of vital endeavor, to have to wait on bequests for the means for probing nature to the depths, but those who have more millions than can be taken with them when they cross the bar can do no better thing than to finance scientific researches into the secrets of nature's malignant moods. But why was it necessary for Mr. George Crocker to wait until he had himself died of cancer before setting his wealth to work in this good cause? When one gives only what he cannot keep the quality of philanthropy is lacking.

Congratulations to Virgilia.

MISS VIRGILIA BOGUE must have been born under a fortunate star. She not only carried off the honors of the Portola festival at San Francisco, but she captured one of those things that many an American heiress has chased all over Europe after, a scion of nobility. And she has been doubly fortunate in the fact that her catch has the merit, perhaps unequaled in his class, of having made a first-class motorman. Of such a husband there is something to hope even though he comes from a long line of titled ancestors. Again, congratulations to Virgilia.

Charles M. Hays.

THERE WAS A RAILROAD MAN of whom much was to be hoped! His stay in California was short and his Pacific Coast end inglorious. He started off by trying to take the Southern Pacific company out of politics when it did not want to be "took," with the result that he took himself out of California and out of the employ of the Southern Pacific company. Charles M. Hays has just been elected president of the Grand Trunk. California's loss was Canada's gain.

Get Out the Dead Wood.

THERE IS NO QUESTION that civic pensions are coming. The departmental offices at Washington, and elsewhere, must somehow be relieved of their human dead wood. The type of mind that seeks a safe retreat in the public service is not buoyant. It is unlikely to make adequate provision for old age, and the conscience of the nation will never stand for throwing its possessor out into the street when he becomes inefficient. The public service is always dead enough at its liveliest, and unless that service can be relieved of its ancients more rapidly than nature relieves it the government at Washington will mark time.

THE PRESIDENT TO THE PEOPLE.

The strong points in the President's message were left out. Perhaps it is good policy for him to single-shot them at Congress and people later on. Neither the public nor the congressional mind can concern itself with more than one thing at a time and, with regard to a broader conservation policy, waterway development and anti-trust issues, if the President has plans matured for constructive legislation, it may be wise not to mix them up with a general survey of the state of the nation.

The message, aside from what isn't in it, is unobjectionable. It is sound, safe, sane, conservative, judicial, comprehensive, reassuring. It appeals to the mentalities of men rather than to their imaginations. It will not fire the heart or set the temples throbbing. Unless his special messages shall prove otherwise, the President is giving us a rest.

His declarations concerning Nicaragua squint at a positive policy too long delayed. His assertion of our special position with reference to the Central American zone has large possibilities in it, if Congress shall be like minded, and his reference to our moral obligations to Central America and to civilization may be made to cover any readjustments Congress sees fit to undertake in Nicaragua, Honduras or elsewhere in that zone.

The President is not wholly happy either in his accounting for some of the ills we bear or in the remedies proposed for their removal. His reference to the $63,000,000 subsidy paid to the periodicals published in this country, through the maintenance of inadequate postage rates, is a case in point. That subsidy is paid to the railroads which transport the mails and receive eight times what they receive from the express companies for the performance of an essentially similar service. Put carrying the mails on a parity with carrying expressage, as to transportation cost, and there will be no postal deficiency to be complained of.

The President's explanation of the rise in the cost of living is likewise inadequate. It is true that the depreciation of gold is causing an appreciation of the price level the world over, but that does not disprove the efficacy of The Cinch in artificially raising the cost of living still higher by virtue of a tariff wall higher than it ought to be. The consumers of America are victims of the dual tragedy of the depreciation of gold and the unbroken power of monopolies to practice extortion.

The President is right in affirming that the tariff schedules should not be revised except upon exact knowledge of the cost of production at home and abroad, but his tariff board, with only $75,000 a year at its disposal, will be unable during his term of office to explore the markets of the world and gain the information requisite. That board should be given an unlimited credit and scores of expert helpers at home and abroad. The President is sending a boy to mill.

The message lacks vitality. It does not ring. It is not surcharged with purpose. It is an interesting and instructive commentary on things in general, but it does not speak to the American people that they go forward. Perchance the special messages to come may have more of dynamic power in them. We so hope.

AN INADEQUATE PREPARATION.

Mr. Abraham Ruef, chastened if not humbled, proposes to devote the rest of his life to prison reform and to the reformation of our penal jurisprudence. The intent is laudable. Great iniquities are perpetrated in the name of justice and our jails and prisons are relics of barbarism.

But has Mr. Ruef's apprenticeship been adequate to entitle him to a diploma as an expert prison reformer? He has spent some months in the common jail of the city and county of San Francisco. While there he has had opportunity to see something of the grist turned into the pen by the inferior courts of this city, courts made more inferior than they otherwise would have been through the pernicious political activity of Ruef himself, and that of his fellow conspirators against the peace and dignity of the state of California. When low courts are filled with low men, in order to cultivate reciprocity between the criminal poor and the criminal rich, the finality cannot be less than shocking.

It should not be forgotten that Mr. Ruef has not been in prison. He has not even had the opportunity, which so much effort has been expended in striving to afford him, of taking a grammar course, so to speak, at the seaside resort known as San Quentin, where Mr. Griffith Griffiths had a not unprofitable sojourn of a scanty two years as a partial recompense for having unsuccessfully undertaken to murder his wife. Even that experience was inadequate, inasmuch as San Quentin is not in any proper sense a prison. A few years at Folsom would have been more to Mr. Ruef's purpose. It is something like a real prison. It is to be regretted that Mr. Ruef's opportunities for equipping himself for prison reform work have been so inadequate.

How much more to the purpose it would be, too, if Mr. Ruef's praiseworthy efforts to temper the law to the crushed spirit could be seconded by some dozen or more persons of high capacity who, until recently, seemed likely to be able to judge of prison life from an interior view! There is no estimating what men of such splendid abilities might have accomplished for the amelioration of the condition of their brethren in crime if California could have succeeded in matriculating them in her institutional life. They would have found many in stripes much more worthy of sympathy and forgiveness than they themselves are or are ever likely to become.

In our abhorrence of the evil effects of prison life upon character, some of the mellowing effects of bolts and bars may have been overlooked. Mr. William Bradbury is reported to have experienced religion during his brief incarceration and to have suffered the softening of his granite personality. This was well worth the effort the state made on his behalf.

The jails and prisons of California have, without doubt, been a disgrace to California, and this unfortunate condition has largely come about through the mistaken policy of sending only low-type criminals to prison while leaving the high-type criminals, criminals of intellectual discernment and aesthetic tastes, to peep through the bars only from the outside. If California can contrive somehow to send her first class criminals to prison, the state will soon have first class prisons. The character of the patronage will determine the quality of the accommodations. Not least among disappointments attendant upon the result of the graft prosecutions is that what at one time gave promise of doing so much for the prisons of California now seems likely to do so little.

MR. HENEY RESIGNEDLY RESIGNS.

In October, 1906, Mr. Robert Duke, a deputy district attorney in the office of William H. Langdon, resigned his office, and Mr. Francis J. Heney was appointed to fill the place. The warrants for the salary of Mr. Heney, as such deputy, were regularly issued to him and he as regularly endorsed them to Mr. Robert Duke, who drew the money and appropriated it to his own benefit from that day to this, the while serving the graft prosecutions as necessity required in the police courts of this city.

Mr. Heney has served the public for more than three years without one dollar of compensation for himself from either public or private sources. The inability of the public mind to grasp the significance of this service, the tendency to feel that somehow it cannot be true, testifies to the rarity of unselfishness in championing great public causes.

For it was a great cause to which Messrs. Heney and Spreckels gave their services, their means, their time and thought—the equal establishment of justice. Without it government becomes a mockery and the degradation of the citizenry is only a question of time. No nation arose, and by and by passed away, whose history runs not to that effect.

Mr. Heney is an exceptional character. The standards by which other men are judged somehow do not fit his case. His methods are his own and his habits of mind and speech are his own as certainly as his physiognomy. It is not the prerogative of this paper to judge Mr. Heney further than to say that he has made a great fight, the greatest fight of the kind in a century of American history, and the fame of it will last as long, anyhow, as the taint of perfidy will attach to the reputations of those whom he has convicted at the bar of public opinion, although he has failed to convict them at the bar of justice. That will be long enough to satisfy any desire for fame he may have the weakness to entertain.

Mr. Heney's three years' service as a volunteer in the cause of justice has not resulted in failure. It has not achieved all that was hoped for from it, but it has not failed. It has served to let the light into dark places in our municipal and national life. It has proven to the world that the big scoundrel and the little scoundrel differ only in degree, not in kind; and it has shown how inadequate American jurisprudence is for reaching and punishing crimes of organized greed. He, as no one else, has put it up to us to put our temple of justice in order, and it will be done. He has made grafting odious and not all the brazen bluffing of the socially select or the financially powerful can bring back to men involved their lost reputations. Not all the lime of Santa Cruz can brew whitewash enough to cover their tarnished reputations.

Mr. Heney fought as long as there was a fighting chance and when there was not he resignedly resigned. He will prove to be an epoch-marking man.

The Public Welfare Fund.

The movement toward centralizing, and co-operatively financing, movements for social and political betterment in this city is a movement in the right direction. It is to the political health of the city what the Associated Charities is to true philanthropy—an orderly way of doing things in place of a haphazard method not unlikely to do as much evil as good.

It is not good to have a multiplicity of organizations aiming at essentially similar ends. At the bottom of many of them will be found one or more sponge-like absorbents of the generosity of the multitude. Efforts will be misapplied or efficiency sacrificed in the necessity of securing the sinews of modern political and social warfare.

As stated in these columns last week, so we reiterate it here, the success of the Public Welfare Fund will be dependent upon the character of the men who are to handle that fund. On the board of eleven trustees there should not be one weak, one unknown, or one questionable name. That board will have to say "no" many times to where it can say "yes" once and any wavering, uncertain, injudicious personalities in that trusteeship may easily prove the undoing of the whole movement. There are so many men of resolution, sound judgment and familiarity with public affairs in San Francisco that no mistake need be made.

To Make Majority Rule Effective.

The Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League has been organized for the purpose of gathering into an effective working body the majority of the Republicans of California, which majority has long been ineffective through lack of organization.—Extract from platform adopted at Oakland November 22, 1909.

There never has been a time when an overwhelming majority of the Republicans of California would not have been opposed to the domination of their party by the Southern Pacific company and allied interests, had such majority been alive to the fact of domination. That has been a chief difficulty in the way of party emancipation. So adroitly are the wires of control worked that only those near the heart of things are aware of what goes on behind the scenes. Nevertheless it is a fact, and for many years has been, that the Republican political machine has been the private property of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company. That was and is a shame and a disgrace. It is time to put an end to it.

The power which may be acquired through the domination of a successful political party can scarcely be overestimated. The cost of it to a great railroad system is nothing to be compared with the advantages to be gained and the obligations to be shirked. Such control has both a monetary and a strategic value, and that is why railroads do not go out of politics unless kicked out and barred out. The Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League cherishes the hope of being able to perform that dual service for the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau.

For twenty years California has been governed by not exceeding twenty men, and these twenty men have either been on the payroll of the Southern Pacific company or have been kept feeding at the public crib as a reward for their subservient services. They have lain awake nights thinking how to thwart the public will and their efforts have been successful.

It is estimated that the state patronage now amounts to a round-million dollars a year and with Herrin, Hatton, Burke and Parker as dispensers of that patronage the treasury of the Southern Pacific is greatly relieved of the cost of maintaining political supremacy within the Republican party. It is to that entrenched force that the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League has dared to offer battle, and it does it with an empty treasury, no hired mercenaries and no leaders who can set aside their daily vocations that they may give themselves wholly to the service of their cause.

On the face of it the contest would appear to be hopeless, and hopeless it would be were it not that a majority of the party wants to be free and independent of corporate control. All the league lacks of making a winning fight before the people is the proper organization of the people, and to that task it will address its best efforts. In this work it needs the help of all good citizens.

The Square-Deal Yardstick.

Harris Weinstock, in his paper on labor conditions read before the Commonwealth Club, affirmed that the square deal is the yardstick by which the rights of labor and of capital are to be measured and, in effect, that public sentiment is to do the measuring. If this be true then public sentiment must be put in possession of all the facts in each case and some good means must be found for performing that service. Statements given to the press from neither side are to be trusted.

If public sentiment is to act as arbiter in labor disputes the public must not alone be in possession of the essential facts but it must also have a clear concept of what constitutes right and what wrong in the relations which labor and capital sustain toward each other and, as certainly, the relations which union laborers and non-union should sustain to each other. The whole controversy must be so interpreted to the public that when the public assumes to judge it may judge a righteous judgment.

This is a service which Rev. Charles R. Brown, of Oakland, has undertaken to perform, in the pulpit, on the rostrum, in the council halls of labor and through the columns of The California Weekly. We commend his series of articles to our brethren of the press with full leave to republish as widely as they wish. A more frank and sympathetic treatment of the issue will not be found anywhere in the literature of our time.

The old order changeth. It is hard for an autocrat to yield any part of his autocracy, and the employer has hitherto been an autocrat. He has hired whom he would, upon such terms as suited himself, discharged when he cared to for any cause or for no cause and, within his sphere of influence, whether narrow or broad, has been monarch of all that he surveyed. He will be such no longer.

On the other hand every new found liberty is abused. When the negroes were emancipated they made themselves insufferable. When immigrants come to us from the autocratic governments of Europe they become offensively self assertive. When the labor unions found themselves in a position to dictate terms to their employers they did it from high horses and with an austerity of manner seldom exceeded by their former masters, as the employers for centuries had been accepted as being.

The new order changeth, too. The application of the square-deal yardstick to the relations between labor and capital presupposes equality of status in the contracting parties. Equal before the law, and in public estimation, representatives of capital sit down with representatives of labor to arrange the details of a partnership that shall be fair to both sides and not unfair to the consuming masses, for the public interest is involved in every such contract and the rights of the public are no more to be lost sight of than the rights of employers and employees.

Whatever makes for a better and clearer all-around understanding between employer, employee and the consuming and arbitrating public makes for industrial peace and to that end The California Weekly will ever strive.

The California Weekly takes pleasure in announcing the publication next week of an able and stimulating article, by Mr. William Kent, on "Privilege and Interference." A brief notice of this article appears elsewhere in these pages.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

There is in this world one universal object of affection, Mother Nature. Everybody loves her, or professes to, some with an intelligent interest, with a discriminating discernment, with a painstaking particularity; but, in most cases, that love is manifested as a gulp, as a thirsty ditch-digger might toss off a schooner of beer. With most of us the things that creep, that bloom in obscure places, belong to the unseen world and are as if they were not, unless they bite, which some of them sometimes do, and so make their presence known. Those without the microscopic sense see nature only in the large, in the sweep of landscape, in the purple lights that lie along the horizon, the storm that tumbles through the air, but however we make shift to see nature, we all of us, to the last man and woman, testify that we love her.

Do we really? Is not the greater part of our pretended love mere repetition of platitudes we have heard repeated all the way up from childhood? How much of our time do we lavish upon this object of our affections? How long since the reader of this really looked upon a landscape and drank it in? How long since he really looked into the eyes of the stars? How many can tell whether last night was star-lit or not? When did the reader last look upon a tree silhouetted against the horizon? If we really loved nature would we not, naturally enough, set apart some portion of each day to manifesting some proof of our affection?

And what real claim has nature upon us for our love? Was it not nature that shook down a portion of our city and, as a resultant, burned up the rest? Do we not have to take out an insurance against nature every time we send a cargo to sea? Is it not nature that devastates the Middle West and the South with tornadoes, scorches the desert with blistering heat, starves half the birds every winter, puts deadly virus at the roots of the fangs of serpents, breeds mosquitos to carry pestilence from man to man, fills the earth and the air with germs of tetanus, plague, tuberculosis? Is not nature after us with dart and javelin every waking and sleeping hour? Our aches and pains, and the ruthless tearing from our arms of those we most love, do we not owe all these to nature? By what right, then, does nature demand our homage, our intelligent interest, our love, anything at all other than our fear?

Time was when men knew nature only to fear her. If they worshiped her it was because of fear and not of love, because of a vain hope that nature might be propitiated and so induced not to slay with flood and famine, the lightning's blast or the whirlwind's pitiless sweep. How came it that the attitudes of men changed from fear to love? Is it because we have learned that it is out of nature's hand that we must feed, in her environment that we must live and move? Is it because we have learned that we, also, are a part of nature, not separable from it?

Perhaps there may be a deeper reason still, that we have learned to look up through nature to the God of Nature. Perhaps it may be because we have learned to take our place in nature as a part of it, and to hope and trust that the power that works through nature works for the ultimate somehow good. Claiming no exemptions, dispensations or special providences in our favor, we trust more implicitly, perhaps, than ever the men of old, because we have reduced nature to a nature of law rather than of caprice, and have learned that, as we come to know these laws, we are able to forfend against those that make for destruction and take hold on those that make for life. Certain it is that as we learn more of nature we fear her less and love her more and realize better than in former days that nature's God is our God, that we and the things about us are members one of another and neither aliens nor enemies.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Another Use for Timber.

The making of flour from sawdust is the latest suggestion concerning a valuable use that may be made of our decreasing timber supply, and it adds another to the arguments in favor of conserving that supply. The suggestion comes to the Forest Service from the United States consul at Christiana, Norway, and nobody need be agitated by the thought that we, perhaps, may be fed on sublimated sawdust, for the flour under consideration is not of the edible kind. The sawdust first is ground very fine, when it is worth $12 to $13 a ton. It is used for various purposes, one of which is the making of dynamite of a somewhat inferior, but nevertheless useful, grade. Mixed with linseed oil, it meets the requirements of a medium grade of linoleum. One of its chief uses, however, it is expected, will be found in the manufacture of xylite, an artificial flooring which is impervious to water, practically non-combustible, as light as wood and nearly as durable as stone. Some of the German war vessels now are floored with it. Already Norway exports thousands of tons of this sawdust flour annually, Germany is not far behind her, and the United States may as well fall into line, thus utilizing that which now is practically a waste product.

Cost of Seeing a Football Game.

The New York Sun, turning from the spectacular features of the Yale-Harvard football game, has devoted a little time to investigation of what it cost the great, enthusiastic public to see it, and it foots up a sum scarcely less spectacular than the game itself. Summarized, the figures run as follows: Tickets to the grounds, somewhat more than $75,000; transportation to the scene of action from New York city, $140,000, from other cities, $60,000, a total of $200,000; payments to hotels, for cab hire, etc., at least $400,000; for flowers, $10,000; flags, $30,000. Then there was new clothing bought for the occasion, automobile hire; in short, the Sun estimates the entire cost to the public at not less than $1,000,000. A very neat sum for two or three hours of amusement, and when one considers what could be done with such a sum, the hungry that could be fed, the homeless that could be housed—ah, well, we have to have our fun, you know, and why be sensitively particular?

Hands a Lemon to Noah.

In the course of a lecture recently delivered before the Royal Geographical Society, in London, Sir William Willcocks handed a lemon of the most acid variety to our old friend Noah. Probably the ghost of our revered ancestor did not mind it much, but there is no question about the quality of the fruit. Sir William has been appointed by the new Turkish government to survey the Tigris-Euphrates river system and suggest means for rehabilitating the adjacent country. As a conclusion based upon his investigations, he now announces that if Noah had devised a means for turning the excess waters of the Euphrates into the Pison he would not have been compelled to go sailing about the country with a menagerie when there were no spectators to make it financially profitable; in brief, that historical high tide would have been avoided. Sir William says that, with modern science to assist, 9,000,000 acres of the best land in Mesopotamia may be irrigated, and the Garden of Eden be reconstructed, possibly with the exception of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, mankind having grown past the need of that fruit to teach it things. Sir William's suggestion that a railway should be constructed from Bagdad to the Mediterranean indicates, too, that modern science will be able to put some finishing touches and improvements on the old, old garden.

Emigration From the States to Canada.

Time was when Uncle Sam was "rich enough to give us all a farm." He is not less rich now, but his land is so nearly parceled out to his rapidly increasing family that some of his nephews and nieces find it necessary to go without. Under these circumstances it is not strange that the eyes of many citizens of this country have been turned to the rich, unoccupied lands of Western Canada. Thither many of them are going, the majority of them eventually to become naturalized Canadians. It is estimated that since this movement on Canada began over a half million people have gone there from this country. The movement is constantly increasing, too. During August, September and October of last year there were 9,844 such emigrants; during the same months this year the emigration numbered 13,781, an increase of 40 per cent. Last month the emigration numbered 5,250, as against 3,179 during the same month last year, the increase being about 65 per cent. This emigration, of course, is far more than offset by the immigration to this country, but it is doubtful if the average immigrant is the equal in energy and enterprise of these men who are pushing into the great northwest, there to build their homes and found their fortunes.

The Gyroscope Practically Applied.

Now that men have begun to make practical application of the gyroscope to their inventions, the field for its use is rapidly widening. Recently, in this department, was published an account of the application of this principle to the monorail road. Since then it has been successfully applied to the automobile to prevent skidding. The gyroscope was attached to the car by a swinging-frame device, and a severe test was made. Asphalt streets were covered with a coating of mud and soft soap, and over such a course, around sharp corners and sudden turns, the automobile, with its gyroscope attachment, was swiftly driven. There was neither skidding nor suggestion of it. There is talk, too, of substituting the gyroscope for the mariner's compass. It would not be affected by electrical phenomena, and, once started spinning in a north and south plane, it would not deviate while its speed was maintained. The gyroscope, long a spinning toy, is about to assist the world to spin its wheels of business.

Some Comparative Mortality Figures.

The British Registrar-General's returns of births and deaths in the United Kingdom rather militate against the popular impression that small towns are decidedly more healthful than are large cities. It shows that the death rate in the former is 113 to the 10,000, while that of the big cities, including London, is but 118, a comparatively slight difference. Another interesting feature of the returns is found in the fact that London's excess of births over deaths is greater than that of any other important city of the world, its excess amounting to 13.1 in the thousand. Nearest to this is New York, with 11.5. Berlin's excess of births over deaths is 6.8 to the thousand, Brussels' is 6.2, Vienna's 6.1. In Paris the excess of births over deaths is but 3.1, while in St. Petersburg the death rate actually exceeds the birth rate by .1 in the thousand of population. In infant mortality London shows better conditions than any city except Paris, its mortality to the thousand being 109, while that of Paris is 104. New York follows, with a death rate of 169 to the thousand infants. London may be rather damp and foggy at times, but, on the whole, it appears to be a fairly healthful place in which to live.

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHELF.

The Book of Job.

Not for its lesson in patience—Job was about as impatient as any man in his circumstances would naturally be—but for the splendor of its rhetoric and for its lofty and bold conception of the dignity of man, we treasure the Book of Job on our shelf. This, one of the earliest dramas in any literature, inclines more strongly to dialogue than to action, but few dramas have a more powerful or moving episode than that in which the Almighty enters the scene in a whirlwind; and no religion or philosophy has taught a more exalted ideal of the worth of man than is implied in Jehovah's challenge to Job to "gird up, now, thy loins like a man; for I will demand of thee, and answer thou me"; man disputing, unabashed, the justice of the Omnipotent's rule to His face.

Where is eloquence more sustained, more sublime, than in the long speech of the Almighty, in which he requires of Job the answers to the questions of His power and omniscience? And where is rhetoric and poetry at a higher reach than in those lines where He asks, "Hast thou given the horse strength? Hast thou clothed his neck with thunder? Canst thou make him afraid as a grasshopper? The glory of his nostrils is terrible. . . . He swalloweth the ground with fierceness and rage; neither believeth he that it is the sound of the trumpet. He saith among the trumpets, Ha, ha; and he smelleth the battle afar off, the thunder of the captains, and the shouting."

McCLURE ON MAGAZINE SUBJECTS.

In an entertaining lecture delivered in New York two weeks ago by S. S. McClure, the editor of McClure's Magazine, he stated his belief that there are five fundamental problems of our modern civilization which it is the duty of the magazines to consider and help to solve. The first of these was the conservation of natural resources. In Alaska, he said, it was known that there were several billions of dollars worth of easily accessible mineral wealth. Should that enormous wealth of natural resources gravitate into the hands of two interests commonly spoken of as the copper and the oil interests or should they be preserved to the benefit of the whole people?

The next problem which the speaker thought should engage the attention of the magazines, a problem which he said was to his mind the most difficult which had ever been presented to a people in human history, was how wisely to enact laws dealing with those great financial and industrial bodies which control the means, tools and machinery of production and transportation.

The third problem, as the speaker saw it, was that of municipal government. He thought that the municipalities of the United States lagged far behind other countries, notably far behind Germany, in solving their problems. Here, he said, our municipalities are conducted by two groups of men widely separated socially and intellectually, but one in their exploitation of municipal government for their own profit. The socially lower group backed by the higher obtains control of municipal government and exploits it for personal profit.

The fourth problem was that of immigration:

"Yearly hundreds of thousands of immigrants come into this country who are of such a low breed that they will degrade the average of the breed in this country. For the first time in history an inferior is driving out or down a superior people. This seems to me a problem deserving of serious examination by serious men."

The fifth and last great problem the magazine editor discussed was that of universal peace, or the abolition of war.

TO A WIFE.

By Edwin Chase.

(For The California Weekly.)

IV. Divine and Human.

Sometimes I see thou art to me,
A being all Divine,
And I to thee a devotee,
Must worship at thy shrine.
But I love best, yes, love thee best,
A sweet and darling woman,
When on my breast thou art at rest,
All human, human, human.

PRECOCIOUS GENIUSES.

Cesare Lombroso, in his book on "The Man of Genius," gave the following account of precocious authors and scientists:

Dante, when nine years of age, wrote a sonnet to Beatrice; Tasso wrote verses at ten. Pascal and Comte were great thinkers at the age of thirteen. Fournier at fifteen, Niebuhr at seven, Jonathan Edwards at twelve, Michelangelo at nineteen, Gassendi (the "Little Doctor") at four, Bossuet at twelve, and Voltaire at thirteen. Pico de la Mirandola knew Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, and Arabic in his childhood; Goethe wrote a story in seven languages when he was scarcely ten; Wieland knew Latin at seven, meditated an epic poem at thirteen, and at sixteen published his poem, "Die Vollkommene Welt." Lopez de la Vega composed his first verses at twelve, Calderon at thirteen, Kotzebue was trying to write comedies at seven, and at eighteen his first tragedy was acted. Schiller was only nineteen when his epoch-making "Rauben" appeared. Victor Hugo composed "Irtamene" at fifteen, and at twenty had already published "Hans d' Ilande," "Bug-Jargal," and the first volume of "Odes et Ballades"; Lamennais at sixteen directed the "Paroles d'un Croisant." Meyerbeer at five played excellently on the piano. Claude Joseph Vernet drew very well at four, and at twenty was already a celebrated painter. At thirteen Wren invented an astronomical instrument, and offered it to his father with a Latin dedication.

Californian Poets' Corner

ON KEATS.

By Lorenzo Sosso.

Edmund Clarence Stedman said of this poem by a well-known San Franciscan that if he had known of it when he published his American Anthology he would certainly have included it. There are other literary people nearer home than Stedman who are blind to the fact that in Lorenzo Sosso, California possesses a poet of a high order of merit and one not appreciated in proportion to his deserts.

Fame that doth never quite recede with time,
Glory that lives
Through marvel of a music made sublime

By what it gives—
All these he yearned and strove for. Though surpassed

In power to do,
Vaster his Song's horizon spread, more vast
His vision, too.

But soon he faltered even where he trod,
Nor worshiped long
Apollo: in divinity a god,

A god of Song.
Then like a fadeless flower low he lay
Amidst the weeds;
Pale in the purple sunrise of the day
That broke his reeds.

And we who hear yet, as in some conch-shell
Seas heard remote,
Melodious song as sweet as hydromel
Burst from his throat;
Wonder an oak towering in pride of place
Ages should crown,
While some fair violet in its modest grace
A day treads down.

THE MECHANICS OF FICTION.

A contemporary mourns to find that Robert Louis Stevenson, Dickens, and others—even Kipling—fail to make their American characters speak "Americanese" correctly. Our contemporary is gracious enough to say that both Stevenson and Dickens have painted one or two American characters to the life, however, in other essentials, and we are gracious enough to believe that our contemporary has overlooked Kipling's story of "The Captive," in which he has painted a character essentially American, who also does talk Americanese to the life.

Our contemporary's plaint, however, reminded us that modern fictionists and, especially, modern critics of fiction, set an absurd store by accuracy of "local color," as they please to call it, and by certain mechanical consistencies of form in fiction. These precise moderns remind us of habitudes of fashionable houses, where a bewildering array of table furniture confronts the dinner guest—forks for every use; knives and spoons in equal profusion and variety of pattern; and three glasses for as many kinds of wine. The rural guest—we speak from painful knowledge—faces this embarrassment of conveniences with a bewildered confusion truly pitiful when he realizes that his worldliness is on trial and will stand or fall as he succeeds or fails to choose the proper instrument for its proper use.

So our authors write, and our critics judge, most modern fiction. Our plot may be inane, or improbable, or wildly grotesque, but we must be sure that the hero never calls a bolt a screw, nor dresses as an English gentleman when he is described as a Roman senator, even though Shakespeare be authority for the fearful faux pas. If we write of Egypt, we must have spent all of a week there, absorbing a villainous jargon which we must casually sprinkle through our narrative to show that we know our ground. And so on, throughout our books.

This is all very well if it does not blind us to the eternal, internal verities of human character and conduct. The world has long since forgiven Shakespeare for his Roman senators who wore watches that were not invented until centuries later, because he made these senators imperishable pictures of men, with emotions and actions such as men exemplify in the experience of every generation and of every individual. Shakespeare did not waste time in holding up a mirror to Nature to get a reflection of the pattern of the shirts his characters wore, but to get a reflection of that Nature which shines darkly behind the "windows of the soul," where the passions of love and hate, of envy and ambition, work out the moral destinies of men.

Local color will fade, manners of speech will alter, dress is a pigment of an hour, nations rise and fall, but the human heart is eternally the same. That is the vital concern of serious literature.

CHARLES LAMB AND "MR. H."

Charles Lamb was one playwright who did not lay the blame for the failure of his play upon an unappreciative public. His farce, "Mr. H.," so offended his own critical judgment when he saw it actually produced that he "hissed and hooted as loudly as any of his neighbors."

Writing to Wordsworth the following day he said: "A hundred hisses—(damn the word I write it like kisses—how different!)—a hundred hisses outweigh a thousand claps. The former come more directly from the heart. Well, it's withdrawn and there is an end."

Kate Douglas Wiggin has added to her reputation by writing a play of uncommon appeal. The first performance of "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm," at Springfield, Mass., played upon the emotions of the audience very much in the same way as "The Music Master."

A NEW HOPE FOR THE HOMELESS

THE WORK UNDERTAKEN BY THE NATIVE SONS AND DAUGHTERS.

The Native Sons of the Golden West and the Native Daughters of the Golden West have launched a statewide movement to bring the homeless child into the childless home. This movement may easily become the solution of the cruel problem of dependent childhood in California. It will certainly give a new impetus to the orders that have undertaken it, for it lifts them at once from the restriction of social enjoyment and of charitable purpose towards their own membership, exclusively, to a noble ambition to serve the most helpless and needy of their fellow beings.

Several years ago, a committee was appointed to investigate all the charitable organizations of San Francisco, to ferret out the fakes and to determine which were worthy of public support. These latter were recommended to the public, and business men generally at once withdrew their support from all so-called charities to whose character the committee refused to certify. The effect was to drive from San Francisco a large number of bogus charity workers. For example, a flourishing "old men's home" proved to be a ten-cent lodging house, run on a strictly commercial basis, and badly run, at that; but its promoter had for years obtained public subscriptions for its maintenance.

The Abuses of Dependent Childhood.

But the commonest form of bogus charity was found to be the exploitation of dependent children. It was proved that one notorious child broker—an alleged minister of the gospel who still operates in Stockton and Santa Cruz—had sold white children nine or ten years old into virtual slavery amongst the Chinese for thirty dollars apiece. Numerous cases were investigated that showed that children had been legally adopted by white people merely to obtain cheap domestic servants under the guise of an act of charity. Details too villainous to print were discovered in certain instances. Human nature so despicable is hard to conceive; but the helplessness and inarticulateness of the children is the safeguard upon which such villains rely.

One member of the committee which made these investigations was Mr. Fairfax Wheelan. Some time after they had been completed, he was asked to help sell tickets to an entertainment at Dreamland Rink for the benefit of the Children's Agency. The Children's Agency was one outgrowth of the investigations; it was the representative of about a dozen charitable organizations, in the especial function of finding homes for dependent children.

Mr. Wheelan was appealed to for aid, on this particular occasion, in arousing the co-operation of the Native Sons of the Golden West. He agreed, and succeeded in disposing of a large block of tickets to his fellow members of that order.

A True Memorial of Pioneers.

But the thought occurred to him that the work of the Children's Agency was properly the work of the Native Sons and Daughters. These orders prided themselves upon the accident of their birth beneath fortunate skies; they made membership a badge of knightliness; they revered and endeavored to preserve the names and landmarks of the California pioneers. Should, then, what was to them the pride of birthplace be for these helpless children a curse of birthplace? Should they revere the dead memorials of dead pioneers while the living flesh and blood of those pioneers' descendants cried in vain for ministrations? Should the knightly qualities they prized be devoted wholly to deeds of fraternal helpfulness selfishly limited to members of the order? Or should these mechanisms of fraternity, founded by years of labor, expand to an altruistic field of usefulness, of practical memorial to the memory of the pioneers, to a philanthropy that should give them a new claim to the admiration and loyalty of natives?

The idea possessed Mr. Wheelan. He urged it upon the leaders in the Native Sons. They fell in with it enthusiastically. He worked for election as a delegate to the grand parlor at the Yosemite in 1908. There he secured the appointment of a committee authorized to confer with the Native Daughters regarding their co-operation and to devise a plan for carrying his idea into effect. This committee reported at the grand parlor held last spring at Marysville, and laid the following proposal before the parlor:

Report of Home-Finding Committee.

That a central committee be formed, for placing homeless children, to consist of the grand president, grand first vice president, and past grand president of each of the two orders, and, further, of one representative from the Catholic Charities, to be appointed by the archbishop of California, one representative to be appointed by the Protestant charities that were caring for children and co-operating with the Children's Agency of San Francisco, one representative appointed by the Pacific Hebrew Orphan Asylums, and one representative appointed by the Associated Charities of California.

This central committee to have power to establish local committees and to establish uniform methods of handling homeless children throughout the state; to receive reports and suggestions from all parlors of the Native Sons and of the Native Daughters, and all affiliated charities, in connection with its work; to have the exclusive determination of the disposition of children placed in its care; and to be supported by voluntary contributions and by the proceeds of an entertainment to be given on a fixed day of every year, known as "California's Day for the Homeless Child," by every parlor of each order.

Local Committees.

The plan further provided for the appointment of a committee of three by every parlor of each order, with the duty of ascertaining the number of homeless children and available homes within its local jurisdiction; of making a report of these facts to the local parlor and to the central committee; of investigating and reporting upon complaints regarding the care of children; and to take charge of the annual entertainment for the maintenance fund.

This report was unanimously adopted by the Native Sons at Marysville, and later by the Native Daughters in grand parlor at Niles.

Personnel of Central Committee.

The Central Committee, appointed in pursuance of its provisions, consists of Grand President Joseph R. Knowland, Past Grand President Charles M. Belshaw, and Grand First Vice President Daniel A. Ryan, of the Native Sons; Grand President Mrs. Emma G. Lillie of Lodi, Past Grand President Mrs. Anna L. Monroe of Eureka, and Grand First Vice President Mrs. Mamie G. Peyton of Stockton, of the Native Daughters; Rev. Father J. B. Hannigan, appointed by the archbishop of California; Mr. Charles A. Murdock, of San Francisco, appointed by the Protestant charities; Mr. Lucius Solomons, appointed by the Pacific Hebrew Orphan Asylums; and Mr. Fairfax Wheelan, appointed by the Associated Charities of California.

First "Day for the Homeless Child."

This committee named December 2 as the day for this year's entertainment, though the permanent date of "California's Day for the Homeless Child" will probably be chosen from one of the summer or fall months. The returns from the entertainments held by the parlors throughout the state have not yet come in, but early reports indicate that they will average about $100 apiece, so that something over $20,000 will soon be in hand for the beginnings of the work.

Will Utilize Children's Agency

The Central Committee will take over the entire force of the Children's Agency, consisting of Miss McCarthy and Mrs. Fay, who are trained investigators, and a small office force. In the future, all children received by the various charities represented on the committee, and all requests for children received by them, will be turned over to the Central Committee for disposition.

The advantages to the children and to the Native Sons and Daughters will be mutual. The children will be better treated, because the statewide organization of the natives will secure a wider range of selection of homes, and because a child placed in any community will feel the sympathy and helpfulness of a nearby body of disinterested and influential friends who will periodically investigate its condition and see that it is properly treated. The Native Sons and Daughters will benefit by a broadening of their sympathies and by the addition of a new impulse toward taking up membership which will appeal powerfully to non-members.

Possibilities for Expansion.

The broad scope and possibilities of the work under the management of the state orders appear from the fact that the Native Sons have 186 parlors, scattered throughout the state, with an aggregate membership of 20,000; and the Native Daughters have 125 parlors, with more than 6,500 members. The opportunity of such organizations, co-operating upon a charitable enterprise, is hard to overestimate.

Another possibility is this: The example of the Native Sons and Daughters may easily lead other fraternal orders to join in this work; the infection could then spread to other states, so that ultimately, in every state, the "Day for the Homeless Child" should become a fixed and annual institution.

Only those who, by study and experience, know the inefficiency of "institutional life" in supplanting the influences of a home in the rearing of homeless children, can fully appreciate the godsend to orphans that an adequate and honest home-finding society is. To relieve childhood of the hard mechanism, the cold formalism, the loveless routine of life in the ordinary orphanage, and to replace these things with the personal interest, the tender associations, and the familiar affection of home ties, is to perform one of the most humane and noblest acts of charity. Individuals benefit, and society profits, together. The Native Sons and the Native Daughters have undertaken a labor of love. They have embraced a noble opportunity for humanitarian service. Success to them, and the co-operation of all right minded men!

PEOPLE AND THINGS.

Herbert Gladstone, the son of the celebrated Victorian statesman, is about to retire from British parliamentary life in order to become governor-general of South Africa. His son, William G. C. Gladstone, of Hawarden, is a young man just out of Oxford who aspires to enter the House of Commons at the coming elections.

Queen Helena of Italy has signified her intention of becoming a member of the International Congress of Mothers. She wishes to join in the work for the welfare of the children of the world and will send a special envoy to the next meeting of the organization, which is to be held in Denver next year.

English cabinet officers have large personal staffs. Lloyd-George, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, has seven private secretaries. The Prime Minister employs four, Sir Edward Grey at the Foreign Office has three, in addition to a precis writer. Herbert Gladstone, Lord Morley and Winston Churchill also have three each, while John Burns has two.

Capt. Annie Beckley of the Salvation Army is about to sail to Java to do missionary and nursing service in a leper colony. She is just 20 and in perfect health, but she is glad to give her life to this work of helping the lepers and is not afraid that she will get the disease.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

The One White Path.

A happy party started for the Heaven of content,

Consulting all the signboards as upon their way they went.

"Ho," urged the Baptist signboard, "if your station you would make,

You must not fail to take my road, and journey by the lake."

"Hey, hallelujah!"—Methodist—"reject my pathway not,

Or you will find all other roads lead to a climate hot."

"Deus vobiscum,"—Catholic—"that is, if on my path,

For other roads are miry sloughs that lead to ceaseless wrath."

Ah, many were the signboards strewn wherever souls might stray,

And each of them concluded thus: "For Heaven, turn this way."

Then were those happy journeyers perplexed and filled with woe,

And straight they prayed for guidance in the path that they should go,

And as they prayed, lo, in their midst an angel presence stood,

Serene and beautiful as one who loveth but the good.

"What is it, little ones?" His voice was like an anthem low.

"Show us, immortal one," they cried, "the way that we should go,

For all the boards of all the creeds do point so many ways,

And we would find our Father's house and join his song of praise.

This pointeth here, that pointeth there; how may we surely know,

When each is graven, 'Turn this way,' the path that we should go?"

Ah, sweetly pitiful the face the angel on them turned,

Well knowing that their eyes were dim, nor saw His light that burned.

Then low he spoke: "Long, long ago, in far-off Palestine,

One lived, and walked the earthly way that leads to the divine.

The Man of Sorrows, patiently the crown of thorns he wore,

Still crying 'One another love' and 'love' forevermore.

The many creeds wind in and out, or devious or straight;

Perchance they all may lead at last unto the narrow gate,

But would you find your Father's house and know the peace above,

The one white path that He proclaimed is patient, tender love."

The Prodigal Son and His Brother.

The Prodigal Son, Elnathan, was a very reprehensible character, as, of course, we all know. When he was young he used to do things to Deacon Hazaleel's watermelon patch, and he fought with the neighbor's boys, and put a bent pin on the teacher's chair in school, and—Oh, yes, he was very reprehensible! And when he grew up he went to his father, got a check on the First National from him, cashed it, went into a far country, and had a hilarious time. Yes, he had a hilarious time, but, oh, what a headache!

It was different with his elder brother, for he was a real nice boy. He was so extremely nice that he never fought, never played hookey, and when his bad brother did wrong his parents and his teacher always could rely on his running to them and telling them all about it. So he grew up to be a respectable and honored citizen, occupying a pew in church regularly and never doing a wrong thing unless he was certain he would not be caught at it. And when his sinful brother took a Pullman and went away to have a good time and accumulate that headache, he said to himself: "Well, here's my chance to stay right here and make myself solid with the old man. He can't hang on much longer, and his estate would look well coming in my direction."

But when the Prodigal Son got tired of the breakfast foods that the swine did eat, took the brakebeam route and went home, oh, you should have seen the grouch that the elder brother displayed when he came in from feeding the calves. "Here!" he said to himself, "this never will do. If I don't look out this worthless scrub will get on the soft side of the old man and be remembered in his will." And he put up a roar that was heard from Dan to Beersheba and made the neighbors think the Philistines were on the warpath again. He had about as much natural fraternal affection as my typewriting machine would have.

But the old man was all right. He had a fatted calf and two turkeys killed, and sent out to the grocer's for canned plum pudding, and to the confectioner's for ice cream, and, oh, I tell you they had a celebration for your life, all except the elder brother, who was sulking out behind the woodshed. And my sympathies all are with the old man. He didn't indorse his younger son's folly, any more than I do, but long ago he had recognized that under this garb of recklessness was the stuff of which, by God's grace, a MAN may be built, and he had found mightily little of the sort in his elder son.

So here's to the younger son whom we love even while he errs, because he is loveable, and may he always come safely home unto his Father's house.

The Opinions of Rufus.

Parsons are good men, but they're middlin' human. I don't know as I ever heered of one that had a multimillionaire in his church preachin' a sermon 'bout the camel, the needle's eye an' the rich man.

I s'pose the progress of the race must be showed by the fact that while the Nazarene couldn't find but one excuse for divorce, nowadays we can find dozens an' dozens of them.

Es I understand it, a university diploma is a kind of a guarantee of education, but not of brains.

I b'lieve they's some good in every man, but, gener'ly speakin', I'm consider'ble like you—don't have time to find it.

I can remember when they was no tramps an' no multimillionaires. Do you reckon it's anyways strange that they come in together?

I've never doubted Mr. Rockefeller's word that he an' the Almighty are specially good friends, but, now that his Standard Oil corporation has been declared illegal an' iniquitous, I'm wonderin' if the Almighty won't feel he orto be more particular 'bout the friends he makes.

I haven't been much encouraged to git up early by the remark that the early bird catches the worms. I never was fond of them, anyway.

Es fer es my observation goes, the writin' on a gravestone is less likely to be epitaph than epitaffy.

I infer that either the daily papers is mistaken or else Mr. Carnegie orto give more of his hero medals to champion prize-fighters.

They say Solomon was the wisest of men, an' I should think he would have had to be in order to git along toler'bly well with the family that he 'cumulated.

Thoughtful Man On Ruef's Release.

"'Twas pitiful about Abe Ruef," the Thoughtful Man observed. "There he was, confined in a loathsome dungeon which was no' conveniently near to his garage, and from which he could escape only occasionally when he felt like it, and then with an obnoxious guard not far away. Month after month, on his divan in this loathsome cell, he sat and chewed the bitter cud of reflection that his co-laborer in the grafting fold, my friend Calhoun, was enjoying his liberty and the plaudits of a grateful, strap-hanging public. Under these cruel circumstances, what more inevitable than that he must fade and pine away? Some months he lost as much as a pound in weight, and he did not always make it up the next month; every once in a while he failed to do so. This being the harrowing condition, the doctors were called in, no doubt that they would get their fees being entertained. By invitation, I was present at the conclave.

"Ouch!" says Mr. Ruef, 'I can't stand it.'

"Stand what?" a doctor inquired.

"Stand pat," he replied.

"He's right," the doctors agreed. 'Don't you remember that he didn't after he publicly confessed his guilt?'

"So one of the physicians took his pulse and his temperature.

"His pulse is seventy-two, and regular, but abnormal," he reported.

"The other doctors shuddered as one shudderer.

"His temperature is 98.6, but abnormal,' he further reported.

"Again the shuddering act was repeated, for even physicians have human emotions.

"Can we save him?" a youthful doctor inquired.

"We can, and we must," was the universal response.

"But what is the matter with him?" the same doctor, being very youthful, inquired.

"It's a clear case," the chief diagnostician replied. "That which is indicated is decomposition of the conscience about the edges and at the center, with complete decomposition between these points. The only remedy in such cases is to set the patient at large and permit him to practice on the public."

"Moreover," another doctor replied, 'tis our duty to assist the patient in his determination to reform and purify our jails, and what could purify any jail more than to have him leave it? Yes, our duty is clear."

"So they collected their fees and made their report, the noble Ruef once more is a free and happy man, and the nausea which afflicts Justice may be due to sea-sickness."

"But," said I, "do you not think that other occupants of cells may pine and languish just as he did?"

"Sure," the Thoughtful Man replied, "but their initials are not Abraham Ruef."

A Tribute to Dad.

"Mother" having heretofore received about all tributes that have been penned to any member of the family, a Kansas man has risen in his grief and indignation and offered a prize for a poem in which justice shall be done to pa. Well, there is no harm in trying.

Who is it, when the kid is bad,
Crawls out of bed, in nightie clad,
And up and down the floor, begad!
Doth walk, though walking's not his fad?
'Tis dad,
Poor dad!

Who is it, looking old and gray,
Toils like a beaver every day,
Yet smiles to feel that ma and Mac
Are recherche and quite au fait?
'Tis dad,
Poor dad!

Who is it sees the children grow
With love he lacks the art to show.
Perforce content with overflow
Of loves that to their mothers go?
'Tis dad,
Poor dad!

Who is it of his bairnies vain,
And yet can't make the feeling plain,
And therefore sobs this sob of pain,
This doleful, soulful, sad refrain?
'Tis dad,
Poor dad!

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Editor The California Weekly,
San Francisco, Cal.

Dear Sir:—Am much interested in the discussion on compulsory voting now progressing in The California Weekly. As to a penalty for same I make the following suggestions:

That every citizen who neglects the exercise of his suffrage shall be required to pay, in addition to his regular tax levy, a sum equal to 5 per cent. of the same, or, in any case, not less than two dollars.

There shall be attached to each ballot two voter's certificates, different in character. As he is given his ballot these certificates are torn off, the voter's name inscribed thereon and each certificate signed by the judges or inspectors of election. The voter shall be given one certificate and the other retained by the county. Should the voter lose the certificate between election and assessment time he can secure a duplicate by application to the clerk of the county in which he cast his vote.

The register of voters shall also register all those citizens who are debarred from voting by reasons as provided by the law, such as non-residence, etc., and give to each a "disability certificate," which shall contain the sworn statement of the reason of disability. Anyone sick and unable to appear before the register shall be required to secure a physical disability certificate signed by, say, three responsible citizens.

On non-property holders the $2.00 would be collected just as our polltax is collected.

I have put the minimum tax at two dollars for this reason: So far as I have been informed, in those places where votes are bought and sold, two dollars is about the average price paid by vote-brokers, so we may reasonably presume that two dollars would be the least sum which the state could afford to charge a citizen for the neglect of this duty.

Sincerely yours,

RAY P. BRUBAKER.

Shandon, Cal., Dec. 1, 1909.

No doubt the problem might be worked out as Mr. Brubaker suggests, but The California Weekly does not like the idea of any fine being imposed in this kind of offense against the public welfare. A 5 per cent. addition to one's burden of taxation, for having failed to vote, would be a severe mulct to a rich man whose vote might be of no more value than that of the poorest man in the community, while a two dollar fine imposed upon a poor man might prove a severe burden. The penalty should be the same for rich and poor because the offense is the same in the cases of both rich and poor. Both are citizens and both owe like duties to citizenship. In both cases failure to exercise the privilege of suffrage should finally result in loss of the privilege. Mr. Brubaker's way of dealing with negligent citizenship might be better than our present method of not dealing with it at all, but cannot something less complicated, and more equitable, be suggested? The penalty need not be severe in order to be effective, but it should be as nearly automatic as possible and the fact of negligence should be made so public as to cause shame. By keeping at the subject the right solution will somehow be threshed out.

Editor The California Weekly.

It is refreshing in these days of graft and political corruption to see a paper boldly stand up for what it believes to be righteousness and truth without fear or favor, as The California Weekly appears to be doing, and long may its muscles remain firm and strong to swing its hammer on the hydra-headed monster of political and civic fraud and corruption, and may the handle never break until it is no longer needed for use.

In your issue of November 26th, I observed your article under the head "Where Abides Civic Righteousness?" and while I agree with much contained therein I cannot help feeling some of the statements were scarcely fair, if not quite misleading. You stated that before you were a list of one hundred men prominent in the fight for righteousness in civic affairs, and of these as far as you knew only five, or six, are "pre-eminently religious," and publicly known to be such. Here I may ask how large a percentage of church membership would come under the head of being "publicly known to be pre-eminently religious"? And how many pre-eminently religious men may not be publicly known as such? How many of the remaining ninety-four, or five, of the hundred are church members, or attendants and therefore directly under church influences? And beyond that, how many of the remainder, if any remain, owe their conceptions and convictions of right and wrong directly, or indirectly, to the church, or to church influences? The fact is that nearly all the higher ideals of life are, or have been, molded by such influences direct or indirect, present or past.

The church may not stand at the street-corners and shout civic righteousness to the passers by until their nerves are shattered and ears deafened; but quietly, yet surely, like the seed growing in the night, her influence for good is being wrought into the lives and characters of men, some of whom, perhaps, may seldom darken her doors. You ask "Where are the men who are religious that they are not more generally enlisted on the side of better politics, better measures, and better men?" In reply let me ask The California Weekly to point out one, yes! just one man eminently religious, a member of an evangelical church, who is not on the side not only of civic righteousness but of other forms of righteousness as well, and in what other calling or profession can the same challenge be given? Of course black sheep gain entrance to every fold, the church not excepted; but church members who are bad are not bad because they are church members, as seems often to be the inference, but they would be bad anywhere.

Of course some well-intentioned church members may be mis-informed, or make mistakes. They are not all so wise and infallible as the editors of weekly papers; but it is hardly fair to place a man's natural limitations as a fault against him for which he is personally responsible. Church members have natural limitations like other mortals, and are not all capable of becoming prominent in political and civic affairs, however much they may try; but when it comes to standing, and voting on the side of right as they see it, show me any body of men with a better record.

The duties of the church are not limited to civic righteousness as interpreted by The California Weekly, and the energies of her limited number of capable men are necessarily expended in many fields, which, in part, accounts for your statement concerning the number per hundred represented on your list. Again, the church and The California Weekly may not always see alike on all points and questions, but this is not solid proof that the church is wrong at every point of difference.

The saloon is strongly political because its very existence depends on this, and there is nothing one-quarter so important to it as politics, and little else to distract its attention, or employ its energies; nor is it over-scrupulous as to the manner in which it gets, and holds, its power. As soon as the church enters seriously into politics a howl goes up fit to rend the skies on a clear day concerning the frightful danger of a union of church and state, and many are foolish enough to be alarmed at the noise. I am glad to find The California Weekly feels differently. With you, I believe the political influence of the church could, and should, be increased, and that it would be a benefit to the state; but that her comparatively obscure position in politics and the advancement of civic righteousness is a sign of lack of interest, or that she does not stand on the side of the advancement of public purity except in very small measure, as seems implied in your article, I deny.

Wishing your paper prosperity and every success in the battle for right and truth and civic reform.

Respectfully yours,

ERNEST A. SHAPLAND.

Courtland, Cal.

There is a deal of truth in the points urged by our correspondent and The California Weekly would not underestimate the indirect influence of the church upon politics and upon our civic and industrial life in all its forms, yet the political efficiency of the church fellowship is lamentably low, an influence that is seriously needed for the purification and elevation of the political atmosphere. That the church fellowships "stand" on the right side is true. What the California Weekly wants is for it to "fight" on the right side, fight hard and with good tact. It is not enough to vote. The work that counts in politics is done long before voting begins. The burden of work upon the church fellowship, in other beneficent lines, is indeed onerous, but the duties of citizenship are by no means to be overlooked. Nineteen hundred years ago there was a reason for ignoring civic regeneration, in that Rome would have chopped off the heads of Christ and all his disciples had they done otherwise than they did, but now there is still a large measure of civic liberty. At that time there was none. We do not want the church in politics for the church, but we do want the church fellowship in politics, more effectively than it has been, for the common good of all.

Editor The California Weekly.

I enclose my subscription for another year. I hope your venture has been successful. I regard your paper as the most useful one published in the state. I have not yet found a sentiment in it that was not my own. You have marked out a long campaign, but if you have sufficient grace and grit, you may expect to conquer in the end. Referring to your editorial "Where Abides Civic Righteousness?" in this number, I quite agree with you that the church is not anything like up to the proper standard. But some of us are trying to raise the standard. My own notion is that a minister is under obligations to take a hand in public affairs. If he cannot use the gifts he has for the promotion of good morals, and civic righteousness, he will serve the world better by stepping out of a profession that, more than any other, has to do with morals. The preacher whose mouth is shut about saloons, race tracks and graft, and the other social evils is of little use in the world. If man will make things pure, God will make them peaceable. The first is our job. We will not get our wages until we earn them.

Go ahead with your strong talk, and may you win your fight.

Fraternally yours,

GEORGE W. STONE.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Not to Bury Caesar, But Dominick Beban Things are shaping up for a pretty fight the coming year in the twenty-fourth senatorial district, which comprises the forty-third and forty-fourth assembly districts. Marc Anthony is the incumbent, but he voted right so many times during the last session of the legislature that all the powers of political darkness are leagued against him. And, to his credit, be it said, he knew that they would be before he voted right and grittily took his chances. He is not a reformer. Judged by the Hichborn test measures, he voted right seven times and wrong eight, being absent once. It is to be doubted if any man who would vote right more than half the time could be elected from the twenty-fourth district, but Anthony came as near to doing it as he could and still have a chance for his political life. Against him is Dominick J. Beban, a McCarthy pet, whose legislative record, on the Hichborn test, stands ten bad and one absent out of a possible eleven. Geo. M. Perrine is another candidate for the mantle of Marc Anthony. His record in the assembly was not so bad. Judged by the Hichborn test, he stood up four times, fell down five, and was absent twice. Gus Hartman, the irrepressible, irresponsible and inconsequential gusty Gus, has moved over into the twenty-fourth district. He had not a hope left in his own, and carried with him the credentials of having voted wrong, by the Hichborn test, the whole sixteen times without a lapse into reputability, or even an absence. For general, all around unfitness, Beban and Hartman are neck and neck. For fitness, Anthony and Perrine are not so far apart, but inasmuch as Anthony is in he should be allowed to stay in.

Another Real Good Senatorial Fight The twenty-second senatorial district in San Francisco, composed of the thirty-ninth and fortieth assembly districts, is so good a district that good people have a right to expect good legislative timber from that district. There is no reason why the San Francisco delegation in the California legislature should prove a perennial disgrace to humanity, as it has, in the main, in years past. There are enough good men in San Francisco to secure a majority of good men in the legislative delegation if all men would perform their political duty to their city and the state. E. J. Callan represented the thirty-ninth assembly district in the last legislature and came out of the session with a perfectly straight record. There was not a flaw in it from end to end. Milton L. Schmitt represented the fortieth district. Judged by the Hichborn eleven test votes in the assembly, Schmitt was right twice, wrong six times and absent three, and this is the same Schmitt who sought to get the civic activities of Prof. Geo. H. Boke, head of the League of Justice and connected with the law department of the State University, investigated by a committee of the legislature. These are the two men who are likely to try conclusions for senatorial honors in the twenty-second senatorial district. If Callan is not nominated and elected by an overwhelming majority, the district will be disgraced. The issue depends upon interest and activity of good citizenship. Good votes are there in sufficient number. All that will be needed to give Callan the office is to get out the votes of the good men, the men who want to see right things prevail.

Some Vagrant Bits Of Political Gossip Assemblyman Henry N. Beatty has aspirations, The Watchman hears, to represent the eighteenth senatorial district in the next legislature. Beatty gained the confidence of good men in the last legislature. Judged by the Hichborn test, he stood right six times, went wrong three times and scored three absences; not a bad record, considering the interests that predominate in his district.

If San Francisco sent as good men to the legislature all the time as Henry N. Beatty, the state would have no kick coming against San Francisco.

Warren M. John wants the postoffice at San Luis Obispo, and Congressman Smith and the people of San Luis Obispo want him to have it, but the Republican "organization" does not. Senator Perkins can side step the issue gracefully, if he wishes to, by leaving it to Smith, and he will probably wish to. If any one thing more than another could make our senior senator want to smash the "organization" in both eyes with both fists, it is the coldness with which that bunch is calculating on his lack of longevity being likely to furnish a fine plum for one of their kind of men. As for The Watchman, he ardently hopes that Senator Perkins may live out his full term, if for no other reason than to fool those fellows.

If Senator Charles W. Bell should conclude to enter the lists for secretary of state, a matter not fully determined in his own mind, as The Watchman understands, it is likely that Assemblyman H. G. Cattell, of the sixty-seventh district, may enter the race for senator in Bell's district, the thirty-sixth. This would be a good arrangement all around. Bell would make a good secretary of state, and Cattell a good state senator. Judged by Hichborn's test votes, Cattell made eleven straight hits and not one miss. Nobody beat that record.

A Remarkable Coincidence It leaks out that the dismissal of William T. Randall, late superintendent of Preston School of Industry, was coincident with the loss of the job of superintendent of Dingee's Slatington quarries by Trustee Dunton of the Preston School, so that he could step right into the job of superintending the school without appreciable loss of time. Was this coincidence of its own happening or was it facilitated in the interests of Dunton? The Watchman is not sure that Randall was not in some measure blameworthy, and he recognizes the fact that Dunton has long taken an interest in the school, having been a trustee of it since the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, but The Watchman is mistaken if Dunton is the type of man to head an educational institution. That institution needs at its head an educator, and not a person whose activities have mainly had to do with men and mules.

Another Candidate Out For Secretary of State There will be no lack of candidates for secretary of state, although there is not likely to be any surplussage of timber fit to be used. No man who is not big enough to make a passable governor will prove big enough to make a good secretary of state. The latest name suggested (seemingly by himself) for the position is that of Frank H. Mouser, formerly of Santa Ana, but now of Los Angeles. There is a feeling down that way that this office ought to come south to seek the man, and so it ought if the governorship should go north, but hardly otherwise. The Watchman does not know of Mr. Mouser's capacities and therefore will venture no opinion concerning them, merely pointing out the fact that the office needs a middle aged man of good business habits, sanity of mind, soundness of judgment and incorruptible integrity. It is no place for a "nice young fellow" just starting in life.

Up to the People, Not to Frank Flint If one may be guided by press comment, candidacies for United States senate are standing hat in hand before the shadow of Frank Flint's "to be or not to be," saying: "After you." Wherefore? Had Senator Frank Flint been selected in the first instance by The People to represent The People deference to his wishes might be appropriate enough, but as The People had nothing to do with his election and as he has had mighty little to do with representing The People of California at Washington, the case stands differently. He should be beaten, as he very likely can be if the right man can be induced to make the fight against him. The issue is: People or Railroad, which? Any child should be able to understand it.

Not as Good as Hoped, Nor as Bad as Feared It is the history of new institutions that they disappoint both their advocates and their opponents, turning out neither as good as the former hoped nor as bad as the latter expected. Also, they exhibit in use sides and angles which surprise everybody. This is certainly going to be the way with the direct primary, and already both friends and enemies are finding out things about it which in the merely theoretical consideration of its merits which preceded its adoption they did not contemplate. Those friendly enthusiasts who asserted that, with the power of the organized boss minimized by direct popular nominations, it would be easy to induce the best men to be candidates for state offices, are doubtless destined to find out that a large amount of hard work will be called for to accomplish that result; but, on the other hand, the former critics of the measure, who predicted that it would lead to such a multiplicity of candidates that there would be confusion worse confounded, are going to be proved very much in error unless present indications are falsified by later events. In other words, reformers who may have hoped that with an open field, and no favor from bosses to be reckoned with, good candidates would volunteer readily, and also the politicians who said that so many reformers would volunteer that they would defeat themselves and leave the machine an easy winner, are both, apparently, to be disappointed.

The Right Man To Be Developed It is true that in the San Francisco election there were many candidates in the aggregate, but a relatively small number were self-nominated candidates in the sense that they put themselves on the ballot by petition without the mediation of a convention or combination of some kind. Under the old convention plan no small part of the work of leaders, organizers and bosses consisted in developing candidacies, that is, making candidacies grow where none would grow without this process of intensive cultivation, and, indeed, skill in this work was the perfection of political arts, because so the people could be led without knowing that they were led. A Tammany leader in New York or a Herrin in California would oftentimes nurse a candidacy for years before bringing it into the full bloom of nomination for a high office. Promising young men likely to be useful have always been looked out for under the boss plan of doing politics, and such men have been permitted and encouraged to make "good records" in minor offices or during first terms in the legislature, solely for the purpose of working them into positions where they could afterwards make bad records in the interests of their backers. It is not necessary to pursue this branch of the subject; the only point in it is to establish the fact that under no popular plan is development of suitable candidates for office quite an automatic process; openings for usefulness in the public service may have a tendency to draw towards them by a kind of political suction, but the lightest driftwood moves fastest, and the most suitable material must be given some sort of shove if it is going to get to the opening first. This is something which it behooves the reformers not to forget. They will need the knowledge next year.

Get a Reputation, Then Bank on It Assuming that the reformers, as represented by the Lincoln-Roosevelters, and the Good Government people, too, if they wish to be considered in the field, know all this, it is still a fact that they have a difficult task before them to secure the right kind of candidates for a great many offices. Only in certain instances, and it is to be feared in not a great many, will the right men select themselves and volunteer for the service. They will have to be looked for and brought out, in some cases dragged out, kicking and struggling as they go. And they must not merely be good men, but men whose merits are so well known that they will have a first rate chance for election. The kind of availability which consists in a man being known for what he is will count for even more—probably a great deal more—under the new order of things than it did in convention days, since then an unknown man, picked out and endorsed by an authorized nominating body, stamped with the stamp of party regularity, made a pretty fair substitute for a popular favorite; but it will be different with the old system of sponsoring removed. When the people themselves are directed to do the nominating it is to be expected that they will manifest a marked preference for men whom they know as compared with those whom they do not know. Now, it is a fact of which some persons have probably not thought, that the number of men known throughout the length and breadth of California is remarkably small. It is a difficulty which promises to arise even with regard to the great offices of governor and United States senator, and much more when it comes to fitting candidates into less conspicuous offices. The trouble will not unlikely be most acute of all when it comes to picking nominees for those district offices, such as Railroad Commissioners and members of the Board of Equalization, which are of state importance.

Respectability A Cloak for Sin

One of the marked facts concerning the "organization" in California is the extent to which it has been able to subject to its influences, if not entirely to assimilate, the human material which ought naturally to have been the best. Able, trained and effective public servants, now filling state and local positions, are known and rightly known, as "organization men," because, while they do their duty from day to day—do it thoroughly and honestly—they went into office under organization influence and still regard it as dominant. The personal character of these men is often good, and their official conduct is also good, but by their acquiescence in machine methods they give the machine the strongest support it has—the support of a respectability greater than its own. This is the hard condition of things which has made the course of reform so difficult in the past, and which is going to retard it in future; but with the right aim and sufficient perseverance it can be accomplished; only it is a question of time—perhaps a good deal of time. Rome was not built, nor is California to be regenerated, in a day. Just at present the question is what should, or perhaps what must, be the attitude of the regenerators towards the class of respectable organization men whom we have described. It is already apparent that the raising of this question, which is an inevitable one, excites some difference of opinion in the ranks of the Lincoln-Roosevelt contingent.

A Matter of Difficulty

On the one side are the ardent reformers, who hold that everybody who is not openly against the Southern Pacific "organization" in politics is for it, and who would have none but uncompromising opponents of the "organization" on the Lincoln-Roosevelt ticket to be put up to be voted for at the primary. The argument for this procedure is conclusive if no account is to be taken of the difficulty of finding qualified men who will consent to be candidates, or of the probability of success in getting them nominated. But there are those who think, with Roosevelt, that to be effective is one of the duties of reformers, and that one of the first requisites is to look facts in the face. "One of the facts," it is argued, "is that there are in the legislature, in the courts and in state offices a number of men who were nominated at least with the acquiescence of the

THE MODERN LABOR UNION

I. THE UNDERLYING PRINCIPLE.

By CHARLES R. BROWN.

[I was asked by The California Weekly to prepare a series of four articles on "The Modern Labor Union"—the sub-topics being, The Underlying Principle, The Opposition to Unionism, The Advance in Peaceful Negotiation, The Economic Failure of Unregulated Selfishness. The whole question is one on which intelligent and honest men differ widely in judgment—I should be glad, therefore, if any reader would read all the articles before passing judgment on the argument here advanced.—Chas. R. Brown.]

It would be difficult to name any other organization at the present time which can show such earnest advocates on the one hand, and such determined opponents on the other, each side possessed of large, and touching that particular subject perhaps measurably equal, amounts of intelligence and candor, as can the Labor Union. You find when you talk with him that the average business man has his mind all made up on this question of unions. He knows what he believes and why he believes it, and is not easily moved from that conviction. And you will find also that the ordinary working man, who earns his living at his trade by working with his hands, is equally convinced. Any field where honest and intelligent men, called upon to face the same general set of facts, issue from their consideration of them with such diverse convictions as to what is wise and just, offers certainly a fruitful opportunity for serious inquiry. In this series of articles I wish carefully to consider a few of the main principles in Unionism, some of the methods actually in vogue among the unions and briefly to consider also some of the effects of this close-knit organization of labor in many trades, upon the third and the larger party in interest, the general public.

What Is a "Labor Union"?

It might be well to have before our minds at the outset a clear and exact definition of the modern Labor Union. Here is the definition given by John Mitchell, one of the most intelligent and one of the most influential labor leaders in this country. He stands at the head of the United Mine Workers of America, which numbers over three hundred thousand members, and, by virtue of his position, as well as by his personal qualities, has a right to speak as an authority. "A Trade Union," says Mr. Mitchell, "in its usual form, is an association of workmen who have agreed among themselves not to bargain individually with their employer or employers, but to agree to the terms of a collective or joint contract between the employer and the union. The ideal of trade unionism is to combine in one organization all the men employed or capable of being employed at a given trade, and to demand and secure for each and all of them a definite standard of wages, hours and conditions of work."

We have here a clear, frank and definite statement of the essential principle of trade unionism. The various concomitants of the labor union, the disposition to limit the number of apprentices, the sick or strike or death benefits which may be paid to members, the purpose of the union to influence legislation which may be favorable to the cause of labor, all these are left to one side for the time and the essential principle of "collective bargaining" to replace the practice of allowing each worker to make such an individual arrangement as he may with his employer, is here rightly brought to the fore. The very backbone of unionism is to be found in that principle of collective bargaining.

"Collective Bargaining" Inevitable.

It may be said at the outset that, all sentiment aside, the principle of collective bargaining is not only defensible on economic grounds, it is inevitable under modern industrial conditions. When primitive conditions prevailed in industry, when the employer was an individual employing only a few men and working with them, perhaps on the same job, then the practice of individual bargaining worked no very serious harm. But with the introduction of steam, of complicated machinery and of the whole factory system, the entire situation was altered. The real employers now may be the stockholders of a corporation, who never know nor see from one end of the year to the other those "hands" who are toiling to earn the dividends which are the main object of desire on the part of those who really own the enterprise. The individual worker standing alone in the presence of such a corporation, which employs men and women by the hundred, by the thousand or by the tens of thousands, as the case may be, finds himself altogether helpless. It is a matter of indifference to the manager or to the superintendent of such a corporation whether John Smith as an individual is satisfied with his wages, his hours and the general conditions of his employment or not—if he does not like his job, he may step aside and get out and make room for some other man who can instantly be employed to take his place. But when John Smith is organized with a thousand or with ten thousand of his fellow workers, and when the representative of all of these men voices, as he does, the attitude of the main part, and commonly the very best part, of the available labor in that particular industry, then the expressions of the workers in regard to the wages, the hours or the conditions of employment become significant and they will receive careful consideration.

We can see at a glance, then, that collective bargaining is necessary for the protection of the individual worker against those unscrupulous employers who, finding themselves in a position to take advantage of the pressing necessities of working men, are sometimes ready to act unjustly in the matter of wages or of hours. And collective bargaining is no less needed to protect the entire group of workers where the individual finds himself. The man who, because he is single and has no family to support, is willing to work at less than a living wage; or the man who, by reason of exceptional strength, is able and willing to show unusual endurance and therefore willing to accept unjust hours or conditions of employment, becomes by that very act the enemy of his whole class. He is, to the extent of his individual influence and example, in the first instance, helping to reduce wages below the standard necessary for the proper maintenance of a worker and his family, or he is, in the second instance, helping to make the conditions of that line of employment too severe for average strength. For the protection of the individual, therefore, and also for the larger wellbeing of the entire class of workers where that individual finds himself, the principle of collective bargaining is demanded.

Also Protection to the Employer.

The principle of collective bargaining is also a protection to the large-minded, well disposed employer of labor against the sharks and the cut-throats he may have to compete with. He is not placed at a disadvantage in the markets of the world by some unscrupulous competitor who desires to pay his men less than a living wage or to work them beyond normal human endurance. Such an unscrupulous employer, where labor is well organized, cannot get men to work for him on such conditions. Where the principles of union labor are operative, every employer knows exactly what his competitor's labor is costing him; he knows when he pays a living wage that his own business is not being placed at a disadvantage through some secret cutting of wages by some sharper across the way. And thus the whole trade, employers and employees alike, is protected and delivered from the peril of having the wage scale brought down to the level suggested by the most unscrupulous employer in that particular industry.

The principle of collective bargaining tends also to develop the spirit and practice of brotherhood among men. The feeling of solidarity of interest quickens that sense of brotherhood in a common cause. "We are all members one of another," they say in the Unions, not always in so many words—they are not always ready and apt in quoting scripture—but through the general methods which have come to prevail. If one member suffer we all suffer with him, and if one member prosper, it is because some measure looking toward the general prosperity of his entire group has been prospered.

Origin of Labor's Solidarity.

There has been a distinct increase of this spirit within the last twenty-five years, due to this fact—the workmen today all but universally feel that they belong to a class out of which they are not likely to rise. When the resources of this new country were so largely unappropriated, when wide areas of public land were continually being thrown open for settlement upon the payment of a merely nominal sum per acre, and when conditions of industry were so simple that an energetic and thrifty employee might reasonably look toward the ownership and management of a business of his own, the more aspiring men of the working class were being continually drawn off into the employing class; and the sight of these successful migrations from class to class had its influence even upon the many who were less abundantly endowed with ability to rise.

But with the great main resources of the country brought now under private or corporate control to an extent which renders the economic opportunity of an individual without means, or with only small means, a much narrower one today than that enjoyed by such a man forty or fifty years ago; and with business being conducted on the scale prevalent in these days, such an advance in one's industrial station has become such a remote chance as to have but slight influence on the working class. The tools are too expensive now for an individual working man to acquire them, for the tools are the elaborate machines driven in swift and costly fashion by steam or by electricity in some gigantic concern which itself is but a single item in a still more widely organized enterprise. The working men are, therefore, accepting the fact that they are to remain in the class where they find themselves and this deepens the sense of social solidarity among the working people.

The men are, in consequence, more ready today to stand together until by a combination of effort they shall all gain the utmost of their rights, with the consequent wellbeing, in a common movement of brotherhood. The working man who is intent now upon leaving the ranks of organized labor in order to secure for himself individually some personal and private heaven of comfort at Battle Creek, Michigan, through the kindly offices of Mr. Post, or at Dayton, Ohio, by the grace of the handsome purposes of the National Cash Register Company, or in some other situation which has become famous for its opposition to union labor and for its professedly philanthropic attitude toward the men it does attract to its industries—that working man is looked upon as a coward and a quitter, as a traitor to his own class. The more commanding ideal in labor circles is to stay by and aid one's fellows in the common struggle until the larger wellbeing shall be realized for all hands. You will hear working men on the floors of the trade halls say again and again, "I cannot advance, and you cannot advance, except as we all advance together."

An Inconsistency of Employers.

If the principle of collective bargaining is, under modern conditions, an economic necessity, then the refusal of certain employers to deal with the representatives of the Union is not grounded in either reason or justice. When they say, as they sometimes do, "We will meet our own men individually, but we will not have any dealings with these walking delegates or business agents whom they send," such statements might seem at first to have a certain show of justice in them. But it is only a seeming show. When a thousand men undertake to establish and equip a street railway system, or a cotton manufactory or an iron foundry, they find at once that a thousand men cannot get together and manage a business. They therefore proceed to elect a few men as directors, and these men in turn, finding it impossible to give their united consideration to all the details of the business, immediately choose a manager. And when this manager, himself the flesh and blood embodiment of the very principle of collective bargaining, refuses to bargain collectively with the employees of that concern through their appointed representative, saying, "I cannot deal with your business agent or other representative—I will only meet our own men individually," he at once makes himself ridiculous. The committee of employees or the business representatives of the unions might as well say to him, "We cannot deal with you, Mr. Manager; we can only deal with the stockholders, that is, with our real employers, individually." As the late Mr. Carroll D. Wright clearly pointed out, this answer is just as logical and just as ethical as is the refusal of the manager to treat with the men through their representative.

The Necessity for the Agent.

There is a further reason in favor of having this collective bargaining done through a representative of the union rather than by a committee of the employees themselves. The man who heads such a committee to wait upon the employer, with a list of grievances or with a demand for increased wages or for reduced hours, is likely to be regarded by those in control of the business as an agitator, as an uneasy and troublesome soul, bent on spreading discontent among the men. The fact that he has consented to become their voice is liable to saddle him with the entire responsibility for this unrest. And when any employee is thus looked upon as an agitator, he is the more apt to lose his job when any men are to be let out or when any sort of excuse for making a change may arise. It is better in every way to have the desires of the men voiced and defended by a representative of their union, himself not an employee in that particular concern. If such a representative falls into disfavor with the management, it does not mean that he may in consequence speedily lose his job.

The claim that such collective bargaining is quite unnecessary, because respectable employers can be trusted to deal equitably with their own men, when these men show themselves industrious, competent and reliable, is not by any means borne out by the facts. We have not as yet reached that desirable stage of moral development, where each man may be trusted to look not only upon his own interests, but also and with equal concern upon the interests of others who are bound up with him in a certain enterprise. The safeguarding of dangerous machinery had to be brought about through the compulsion of law; the wholesome restrictions to be thrown about the employment of immature children; the placing of protective platforms on street cars in winter for the motor men; the establishment of conditions looking toward the sanitary and moral welfare of women employees, and a score of other valuable results, have only been secured as pressure has been brought to bear upon employers through the organized demands of the workers. The reluctance induced by self-interest must be recognized and must be overcome by some intelligent and organized presentation of the other parties in interest.

machine, who have absolutely made good in the performance of their duties. What we are aiming to give the state is honest and effective service, and where officers are actually giving that kind of service, how can you with any consistency proscribe them merely because assisted by the machine in their election? They have not been the tools of the machine, and the machine would never have stood for them had it not been necessary for it to conciliate sentiment by supporting some good men." The representatives of this view go on to say that it will be a broader and more popular policy to endorse for re-election officers who have made the right kind of records without having taken "organization" program, than to turn them down. It is furthermore said that the main purpose in adopting the direct primary was to get rid of machines, slates and air-tight combinations in politics, and that the worst mistake the reformers could make would be to give the people the idea that they are getting up that kind of a combination, even in the interest of reform.

Draw the Line At Subserviency Undoubtedly there are some cases where the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League should not put up candidates against men who were elected to office through Southern Pacific permission if not procurement and, undoubtedly, too, the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican pre-primary convention will do the sensible thing when that bridge is reached. The League made the mistake two years ago of fighting a few such men and got soundly licked for its blunder; but it made a worse mistake when it failed to fight a few men who ought to have been fought, even in the face of the prospects of getting licked again. If the league can't beat a scoundrel it can try. If it don't need to beat a good man it don't need to try. The League can do a worse thing than get soundly whipped; it can prove itself cowardly. It can do a better thing than to win, as it did in two or three assembly fights in Oakland, only to have its candidates fall down as soon as they are stood up. But let no man apply who has proven subservient and a program taker. Draw the line there.

IT'S a queer thing 'bout twins," said old man Jurgen. "Not," he continued, "that I mean to contend that it's remarkable that they should arrive simultanyus, though some parents has urged that one twin at a time is a sufficient visitation of Providence to them that has to pervide for it."

We were seated on the porch of an Upper Lake hotel, the day was clear and warm, the atmosphere seemed laden with a haze of dreams, our dinner had been fairly good, and it was easy to see that the old gentleman had fallen into a reflective and conversational mood. I felt that the mood might be worth cultivation, passed him a cigar, and asked him why he thought it was "a queer thing about twins."

"It's their resemblances," the old man replied. "Course you've noticed them when they're so much alike that when you look at one you don't know whether it's him or is the other one that isn't there?"

I said I had noticed the phenomenon. The interruption did not check the old gentleman's flow of language; it bubbled on:

"There was Bill Lister, used to live over on Goose crick. Mrs. Lister and him had twins—girls, they was. Alike! Well, sir, their ma and pa couldn't tell 'em apart, and it allers hurt their feelin's to feel that they prob'ly spanked the wrong precious little cherib when the other one had been into mischief. They named them Florabel an' Annabel, an' before they got to goin' to school the other youngsters nicknamed them both Bell, so they'd be sure to call the right one. Their pa an' ma objected at first, but after a while they see it was best, for it doubled their ma's chances of gittin' an answer when she stood at the door and called, 'Beh-yell!' in the way mas do. Mis Lister used to say it hurt her feelin's to feel she prob'ly was whippin' the wrong one when one of the little dears had been in mischief, an' I don't blame her, but, shucks! what could she do?"

"You can see it must have been tryin', but the Listers didn't know what trouble was till the Cogginse come to live in their neighborhood when Bell an' her sister, Bell, was 'bout grown up. The Cogginse had twins, too—twin boys or young men—an' they was as like as the girls was. In a misleadin' moment the Cogginse had named them Robert an' Herbert, an' seein, as nobody every knew whether Robert was Herbert, or Herbert was Robert, or neither was either, they naturally took to callin' both of them Bert, so's to be sure not to make a mistake.

"Everything would have been all right now, in a hazy kind of way, if both Berts and both Bells hadn't fallen in love with each other, an' they couldn't git themselves unmixed. I don't s'pose there ever was anything more affectin' than to see them young creechers, their hearts burnin' with love, but not knowin' for certain who it was for. They could feel Cupid's arrer ranklin' in their hearts, but, do their best, they couldn't tell where it come from. Youthful love always is jealous, too, and as they couldn't tell when they see the other brother or sister with the other sister or brother, whether it was the other brother or sister or their only own sister or brother, you can see 'twas vexin'.

"At last they concluded they'd take their chances and git married. The morning of the wedding was a beautiful one, and everything looked auspicious. The four young people met beforehand and made a desprit attempt to pick out their loved ones, but in the middle of it somebody called the two Bells out of the room, and that mixed them up so that they had to start over again. They kept on arguin' 'bout which loved which till the preacher sent word he was waitin', and then, not wantin' to hold the crowd, they drew cuts under an agreement that the two longest cuts should go together and the two shortest should take what's left.

"I never in my life saw anything sweeter than that wedding. It was affectin' to see them two fair young girls standin' there and lookin' lovin'ly and trustin'ly on them that, for the first time, they had a cinch was their own. I'm middlin' old and crusty, but it touched my heart to see it. And it was almost ekally affectin' to see them fine, stalwart men gazin' affectionately on their charmin' prospective brides and once again tryin' to find a distinguishin' mark.

"The preacher wanted to marry them as Robert an' Herbert and Florabel an' Annabel, but, havin' been called Bert or Bell ever since they was a foot high, when they was too young to know what their names was, they was afraid of illegalizin' the marriage by gittin' married under their brother's or sister's names, so he had to give up that they was right, and they was married as Berts and Bells.

"Somebody ought to have foreseen the sad event that occurred; somebody ought to have had the presence of mind to have prevented it, but they didn't. As soon as the double weddin' had occurred everybody rushed forrard to congratulate the brides an' grooms. Alas, in the pleasin' excitement of the joyous occasion the brides got separated from their grooms, and when they tried to pick them out again they couldn't. One of the brides said she was married to the groom that stood on the right hand side, and the other bride admitted 'twas so, but the grooms had been in that daze that afflicts men when they're bein' married, and so that didn't help any.

"I never saw a weddin' occasion more consternated than that was. It was suggested that the preacher should marry them again, and at first it seemed a good idee, but the preacher checked it. He said, seein' as they didn't know who they had married, he couldn't take chances on helpin' them to commit bigamy. He said his conscience wouldn't permit him to do it, much as he'd like to help the young people.

"It seemed then as if everything was all off with the double weddin', and the preacher said he'd go away an' pray for his young friends that they might be led aright in their hour of trouble and trial. Then the newly married an' all the rest of us left the church, the brides weepin' bitterly an' the grooms tryin' to remember which side they stood on when they was married. At length one of the Berts spoke up, an' says, 'The parson said he'd pray for us to be led right, didn't he?' an' they all admitted that he did. 'And we've got confidence in him, ain't we?' he says, and they replied that they had. 'Then,' he says, 'in order to help that leadin' let's shut our eyes, all of us, an' start anyway round the room, an' the first girls we boys touch is the ones we've been led to.' They had consider'ble faith in the preacher, and so they did it, although they didn't deny that they felt some misgivin's.

"After that things moved along pretty smoothly. They got two little cottages side by side an' lived happily in them, the boys, of course, havin' to keep sober so they wouldn't git mixed about the cottages. Sometimes, the girls said, the thought that they might reely be married to the other Bert rankled some, but they put their trust in the preacher an' refused to believe that his prayers didn't hit the mark.

"It's nothin' unusual for twins to have twins, and so nobody was s'prised when each couple had a twin boy an' a twin girl after a while. Cute? You never saw anything cuter. And you couldn't tell 'em apart till after their pas and mas begun to dress them like boys and girls; then you could tell by their clothes which was a boy and which was a girl, and you couldn't tell anything more'n that.

"But before that a tragic happenin' took place that shrouded our neighborhood with a gloom it's never fully got over. One beautiful summer day when the four little kids was just big enough to toddle round as sweet as could be their pas and mas took 'em and went for a little picnic in the woods. Well, sir, they never knew exactly how it happened, but in some way them pledges of their affection strayed a little ways off and—got mixed! The fond parents soon found 'em, but it was too late. They couldn't unmix them. With tears in their eyes and anguish in their hearts, they tried an' tried, but it was in vain. They were mixed, and that was all there was to it.

"Slowly and broken-heartedly, they took the little, toddling procession to the same preacher that married them, and asked him to pray that their eyes might be opened so that they could select their own. He did it, and they made their guess, but they ain't ever felt exactly certain. They had a good deal of confidence in the preacher, but how could they help havin' their nachral human doubts? I've allers conceded that it must be pretty tough to love your darlin' children an' at the same time not know but they belong in another family, but they did the best they could under the distressin' circumstances.

"Them children now are grown an' have children of their own, and sometimes them later little ones look up into the faces of their pas and mas and pleadin'ly say, 'Won't you tell us whether we have six granpas an' granmas, or only four?' and it is mournful to see them tryin' to pick out which is granpas an' granmas, which is pas an' mas, and which is uncles an' aunts. I s'pose there never was such a mixed up family since Eve first called Cain in an' told him it was time for bed.

"Well, when the next generashun of children after them I've told you about came they also was twins, and as soon as they could talk they used to lift up their appealin' voices to their pas an' mas and say, 'Oh, won't you please tell us which really are our—'"

I interrupted old man Jurgen almost sternly. "See here," I said, "before you go any further with this mixed family history, you expect me to believe that it is true, don't you?"

"Do you reckon I'd have told it if it wasn't?" the old man almost savagely inquired.

"Why, no; certainly not," said I. "By the way, are there any people around here who know the Listers, the Cogginse, and their families?"

"They used to be," said old man Jurgen, "but they've all moved away now."

held January 7th and 8th, in San Francisco, should be as well attended as possible, considering the prevailing paucity in the membership of that party in this state. California needs a good, able bodied Democratic party, but it needs to be as good as able bodied, and it is hard for Democrats to stay good. For instance, no sooner will the January conference begin to gather than a line of cleavage will begin to develop. There will be those who will wish to do politics in the light of the contest for power which is to go forward between the Lincoln-Roosevelt League and the Herrin programmers, and there will be those who will wish, then and there, to split the party from end to end, on exactly the line that the Lincoln-Roosevelters have drawn—emancipation from corporation control. The conservative element will wish not to antagonize their Democratic brother, William F. Herrin, in order that they may be in a position to receive the whole Republican push vote at the general election, in the event that the Lincoln-Roosevelt League succeeds in nominating its ticket at the primaries. That way lies the continuous comatose condition of the Democratic party in California, but if the Bell element can win in that party, and the Lincoln-Roosevelt in the Republican, the emancipation of California from corporation domination will not be far from realization. Therefore, gentlemen, give us a good, straight-out, free and independent Democratic party in California and so afford yourself the luxury of a hope in the hereafter.

SIGNATURES BY THE YARD

THE JOB AHEAD OF STATE PRIMARY CANDIDATES.

The new direct primary law makes the work of putting a state primary ticket in the field a tremendous physical task. The gathering of signatures to candidates' petitions for the first election under the law in San Francisco illustrated this fact. For instance, the Municipal League of Independent Republican clubs had about twenty-six candidates. About 2,300 signatures were secured for each candidate's petition, or about 60,000 signatures in all. And even in these densely populated and easily accessible city precincts it required three weeks of incessant labor to prepare the petitions for filing.

Some of the Difficulties.

Incidental difficulties must be remembered. The League bound its petitions into books, and its agents asked each signer to sign the whole set at once. This is the simplest method, but imagine the feelings of a man who is requested to sign his name twenty-six times at a sitting! Furthermore, nearly every citizen wants to split his ticket somewhere, either out of friendship for a certain opposition candidate or out of distrust of one of his own party's candidates. Hence, every book of petitions does not represent a complete set of signed petitions, and an extra number must be signed to allow for this margin.

Another point is this: A man will sign a candidate's petition and forget that he did it. Another man with the same candidate's petition asks him later to sign. He does so, innocently enough, but his second signature is thrown out by the law. Such duplications must be allowed for.

An Amusing Possibility.

A more amusing difficulty is this: In the closing days of the primary campaign, some candidates paid fifty cents apiece for signatures, with the result that enterprising voters signed the same candidate's petition eight times when presented by different canvassers, netting $4 of easily earned coin, but putting the candidate in danger of losing his right to appear on the ballot if the registrar were careful and his managers careless. In fact, one observer declares that, had the petitions in the late San Francisco campaign been checked (a physical impossibility for the Registrar), fully half the "regular" Republican candidates at the primary election would have lost their places on the primary ballot.

This observer concludes that not less than 5 per cent of all signatures must be figured off as worthless in all cases, as being subject to disqualification for one cause or another. The Municipal League's petitions, as filed, ran 91 per cent clean, but those of the other factions of all the parties ran much lower, some as low as 30 per cent.

The State Problem Larger.

With these difficulties in mind, the state problem looms much larger. The percentages of signatures required are less than in the city, but the population is much more scattered and harder to get at in the state at large. Furthermore, the management of the campaign for signatures in a city are all within reach of their lieutenants, whereas, in the state campaign, the central body must operate through managers in counties widely separated and through local lieutenants even more scattered. It follows, therefore, that fully twice as much time—and probably more than that—should be allowed for gathering the same number of signatures for state officers' petitions as was allowed for the city tickets.

Signing by the Dozen.

The faithful partizan has his hands full if he means to sign his party candidates' petitions for the primaries next year. The state executive officers to be elected next year number ten: Governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary of state, controller, treasurer, attorney-general, surveyor-general, clerk of the supreme court, superintendent of public instruction, and superintendent of state printing.

In addition to these, a state railroad commissioner is to be chosen from each of the three railroad districts; a member of the state board of equalization from each of the four equalization districts; a justice of the district court of appeals from each of the three appellate districts, and a congressman from each of the eight congressional districts.

Still further in addition, half of the members of the state senate, and all the members of the assembly, are to be elected. This means that one senator in each of twenty senatorial districts, and one assemblyman in each of the eighty assembly districts are to be chosen.

And, finally, two justices of the supreme court of California are to be elected.

These figures mean that the faithful Republican, say, must sign petitions for ten state executive officers, one railroad commissioner, one member of the board of equalization, one appellate judge, one congressman, one state senator, one assemblyman, and two supreme court justices, or eighteen petitions in all.

Thirty Signatures Per "Signer."

But this is not all. County officers are to be chosen in every county at the same time. This adds petitions for a county clerk, sheriff, tax collector, treasurer, recorder, auditor, district attorney, assessor, superintendent of schools, coroner, public administrator, and surveyor—twelve in all; and, in some counties, one or more superior judges, besides. These make the grand total of petitions to be signed thirty or more. In other words, the party managers should begin early the pursuit of the patient but harassed party signer.

Now for the actual bulk of the individual petitions of Republican candidates. For state officers the law requires signatures in number to 1 per cent of the last party vote in at least ten counties, these signatures to be, in the aggregate, not less than 1 per cent of the last party vote in the state. The second proviso radically qualifies the first. If only the ten counties were required, 1 per cent of the Taft vote in Alpine, Mono, Mariposa, Trinity, Del Norte, Lassen, Inyo, Madera, Sierra and Glenn counties would be sufficient. These counties polled only 4,442 votes for Taft, which would make the necessary signatures for state petitions only 45 apiece. But the aggregate state vote for Taft was 214,398, so that not less than 2,144 signatures will be necessary, and these scattered through not less than ten counties.

District Officers' Petitions.

The law provides other conditions for the other officers. For representatives in congress, or for any officer chosen from two or more counties, signatures to the number of 2 per cent of the last party vote must be secured in at least one-sixth of the election precincts in each county, and these signatures must amount, in the aggregate, to not less than 2 per cent of the last party vote in the two or more counties.

This section applies also, by inference, to members of the board of equalization, railroad commissioners, and justices of the district court of appeals.

City or County Officers' Petitions.

The law provides still another ratio for county officers, or officers chosen by a city and county, or by a subdivision of a county. These officers' petitions must contain signatures amounting at least to 3 per cent of the last party vote in at least one-fourth of the precincts, and amounting, in the aggregate, to at least 3 per cent of the party vote of the entire county or subdivision thereof.

This, in brief, is the burden the party managers must undertake, to get candidates' names on the primary election ballot. It is a huge job, and attention to its difficulties should be given at once by the state and local officers of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League.

"PRIVILEGE AND INTERFERENCE."

Last Wednesday evening, Mr. William Kent addressed the Men's League of the First Congregational Church of Oakland, on "Privilege and Interference." The two hundred and fifty members of the League heard a stimulating criticism of accepted economic theories in the light of modern practice and experience.

Mr. Kent reviewed the "laissez-faire" theory of economics, with its hard and fast dicta that the "law of supply and demand" is a perfect and complete safeguard against economic oppression, that "freedom of contract" is a sacred thing, and that "competition will regulate prices"; and showed stubborn facts that mitigate the truth of these doctrines.

He also discussed some phases of Socialistic theory, and then probed the present conservative idea with reference to the anti-social nature of waste, and showed that interference with privilege is, and has always been, a prerequisite to the economic advance of mankind.

The substance of Mr. Kent's address will be printed in The California Weekly next week.

SHORT TALKS ON DOMESTIC SCIENCE

By Mary Robinson Thomas.

The woman who feels it beneath her to go to the kitchen and prepare an acceptable meal needs broadening. A woman of intellect is needed there, just as a man of intellect is needed in offices, banks and other positions. "Can it be said that the wage-earner is doing any nobler work than the wage spender. They are both providers." A thorough knowledge of culinary science and art is essentially woman's world, but because of her sex she is not always a born cook, but she must have the training as men are trained for various lines of work, and not expected to be able lawyers or doctors or skillful mechanics. Woman may have other talents, and it is absurd that she should scour pans and scrub floors when someone less talented could do this work and she thereby find time to broaden her life and others'. There should be no more drudgery or monotony connected with this work than with any other work, and scientifically followed, each new discovery or success deepens the interest.

The satisfaction and delight pictured in a dear one's face, especially if ill, when the appetite is gratified, is sufficient recompense and when the sincere praise comes, too, the provider of the meal is joyfully conscious that her time has been profitably spent.

If the ordinary girl is taught to do the ordinary things of every day life well, how quickly this line of work will assume, and rightfully, the high place it deserves. If the girls are to be capable dietitians for homes or institutions, the proper equipment and training must be given them. Haphazard methods and crude tools rarely produce a finished work in any line.

This line of work is comparatively new throughout the United States, and especially so on this coast; but all indications point towards a rapid advance in this, as in all domestic science.

From Mark Twain's "Following the Equator": "Men ought to feel a sort of respect for their mothers, wives and sisters by this time. The women deserve a change of attitude like that, for they have wrought well. In forty-seven years they have swept an imposingly large number of unfair laws from the statute books of America. In that brief time these serfs have set themselves free—essentially. Men could not have done so much for themselves in that time without bloodshed; at least they never have."

"The women have accomplished a peaceful revolution and a very beneficent one, and yet that has not convinced the average man that they are intelligent, and have courage and energy and perseverance and fortitude. It takes much to convince the average man of anything, and perhaps nothing can ever make him realize that he is the average woman's inferior, yet in several important details the evidences seem to show that that is what he is. Man has ruled the human race from the beginning, but he should remember that up to the middle of the century it was a dull world, and ignorant and stupid. This is woman's opportunity. She has had none before. I wonder where man will be in another forty-seven years."

hand in public affairs, but there should be no civic noncombatants in the pews. The people who begin a fight with prayer are the ones who make headway against evil conditions, whether political, economic, judicial, administrative or social; and there are many who do not see how conditions are much to be bettered until a church becomes as politically efficient as a saloon. As that efficiency grows we should have stronger churches and fewer saloons.

PUBLIC WELFARE FUND

The Public Welfare Fund of San Francisco was launched last Tuesday evening at a meeting in the Mills building, San Francisco. The idea of such a fund originated with Mr. Meyer Lissner, of Los Angeles, who formed a fund of this character last fall in the southern city. Its purpose is to provide a single and permanent method of collecting money for reform movements, the fund to be disbursed by men of unquestionable integrity and proven political judgment as emergencies in civic life arise.

The meeting in San Francisco was called together by Isidor Jacobs and Milton T. U'Ren, of the Good Government League. A tentative list of members of the General Committee of Fifty and of the Board of Trustees (eleven members) was offered for consideration before final action to be taken next Tuesday evening. A committee consisting of Rolla V. Watt, Thomas S. Williams and Isidor Jacobs was appointed to revise this list and to secure promises that all who may be elected will serve.

Membership is limited to subscribers, who shall pay not less than $1 a month or $10 a year to the fund. The officers of the fund are to be a General Committee of Fifty, elected by the members on the fourth Tuesday in January of every even-numbered year; and a Board of Trustees of eleven members, to be elected by the General Committee. Approximately half of the members of the Board of Trustees are to be elected every two years.

The functions of the Board of Trustees are described by the by-laws to be as follows:

"The Board of Trustees shall have the power to grant financial aid to all movements and purposes that, in the judgment of said Trustees, tend to the betterment of civic and political conditions, upon written application made therefor and signed by at least five members of three months' good standing. No grant of financial aid shall be made without the affirmative vote of at least six trustees.

"No appeal shall be allowed from any act of the trustees granting financial aid. But if any application for financial aid be rejected by the trustees, said application may be renewed before the General Committee upon written demand signed by at least twenty-five members. Upon the affirmative vote of at least thirty members of the General Committee, the trustees shall be compelled, if in possession of sufficient funds, to grant the aid in the amount directed by such vote of the General Committee.

"Except as in these by-laws expressly limited, the trustees are to have absolute control, without review, and with power to expend and otherwise use the funds as they may in their judgment deem wisest. Neither the Board of Trustees nor the General Committee, as an organization, shall participate in the management of any movement."

NEW FRESNO LIQUOR LAW.

The city trustees of Fresno unanimously passed a stringent saloon ordinance last Monday night. This ordinance replaces the one recently vetoed by Mayor Rowell as being inequitable and non-enforceable. The new law, which is nearly as long as the president's message to congress, provides for elaborate regulations of the liquor business and summary penalties for their infraction.

The ordinance makes the following classification of the liquor selling business:

Retail liquor saloons paying a quarterly license of $200 (now $150).

Wholesale liquor stores, $75 a quarter (doubled).

Class A, restaurant serving beer and wine at bona fide meals, $50 a quarter.

Class B, restaurant selling the above and also liquors, $100 a quarter. These licenses are in addition to the regular restaurant business license.

Clubs, $25 a quarter.

Licenses hereafter will be for a quarter on a permit for one year.

Saloons, restaurants selling liquor, and clubs are closed for liquor business at midnight, opening at 6 a. m. daily, and closed all day Sunday for the sale of liquors.

No drinking is permissible in a drug store.

The permit and license is forfeitable, revocable and to be canceled at any time on charges preferred and heard.

The free lunch counter is abolished as a saloon institution, and club petitions for a license must show that no gambling is permitted on the premises, and that only club members and invited guests are permitted to be served with liquor at the club bar.

Not more than forty-nine saloon permits are permitted to be issued in one year, including renewals, transfers, etc., and the number of saloons to be reduced to forty as a maximum number.

PETITION.

Now comes THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY, a newspaper of general circulation, as that term is defined in Section 4460 of the Political Code of the State of California, and established, printed and published in the City and County of San Francisco, in said State, by A. J. PILLSBURY, its editor and manager, and sets forth the following facts, and avers, to-wit:

That the said newspaper is, and for upwards of one year next preceding the making and filing of this petition, has been, a newspaper published for the dissemination of local news and intelligence of a general character, and during all of said time has had, and now has, a bona fide subscription list of paid subscribers, and that said newspaper has been established, printed and published at regular intervals, to-wit, once a week, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, for upwards of one year preceding the date of this petition;

That said CALIFORNIA WEEKLY is not devoted to the interests or published for the entertainment or instruction of a particular class, profession, trade, calling, race or denomination, or for any number of such classes, professions, trades, callings, races or denominations, or with the avowed or any purpose to entertain or instruct such classes.

Wherefore petitioner prays that upon due notice and proceedings had for that purpose, the court will render a decision and judgment ascertaining and establishing the standing of petitioner, the said CALIFORNIA WEEKLY, as a newspaper of general circulation, as that term is defined in Section 4460 of the Political Code of the State of California.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

How Your Property Gets Taxed.

On the first Monday in each March all your earthly possessions are taxable. The thing that you acquire the day after, and sell the day before the first Monday of the next March, you do not pay taxes on at all, but somebody else must or the public treasury is defrauded to that extent.

It is the duty of somebody to know what your property is reasonably worth. The law says that it shall be assessed at its full value, full value being the price at which one would accept it in the payment of a solvent debt; but, in practice, the law is nowhere pretended to be obeyed, and the officers of the law, the assessors, and boards of equalization themselves, with deliberation, refuse to assess property at its full value. The aim has been to assess it, the state over, at about 60 per cent of its value. How it is assessed, at full value or less, matters little so that it be assessed as other people's property of like character is assessed. The greater the total assessment, the less the tax rate; and the lower the tax rate, the more favorable tax conditions seem to be; but the sum total to be paid does not differ either way.

Assessors are elected by the people to assess the property of the people, and the work ought to be fairly and equitably done. Sometimes it is. Often it is not. Special interests sometimes combine and conspire to elect assessors who will favor such interests or bear down heavily upon other interests adverse to the special favorites. Then, too, judgment is fallible, and, with the best intentions, inequalities exist and injustice is inflicted.

To obviate this difficulty as far as possible, boards of equalization are provided. In each county the boards of supervisors sit to consider complaints of property being assessed too high or too low. In each city the board of trustees so sits to consider city assessments. As persons do not themselves complain of their property being assessed too low, these boards of equalization go over the entire assessments to see if any valuations are too low, but they rarely trouble themselves to see if valuations are too high. The individual property owner must see to that. If the board of equalization find property assessed too low they cite the owner to show cause why his assessment should not be raised, and they raise it or let it alone, as may appear to them just, after hearing all that the owner has to say.

Many owners of property, usually the small owners, are careless about inspecting the tax rolls after they are made up, and if their property be assessed too high they do not find it out until taxpaying time, when it is too late to remedy the defect. Prudent owners will attend to this in season, for many blunders are made by assessors and their deputies. Some of them have no sense of value, and others are careless. The writer of this, the past year, had his home assessed to the man who built it, but who had not a dollar's worth of interest in it, notwithstanding the fact that the owner gave in the property in his own name in due season. It is well to look after such things closely to prevent errors that might prove serious.

The law requires each property owner to make out a correct list of all the property he owns, swear to its correctness, and deposit it with the assessor. If the assessor comes around to help make out the lists, as well as do the assessing, it is because he is willing to be obliging.

The constitution exempts from taxation household effects to the value of $100, if the property owner will make out a list of the articles he wishes to have exempt. This is done with the view of taking the burden off the very poor, the widow with her sewing machine and scanty household effects, for instance, that she may not have to bear any part of the cost of maintaining local or state government; but even then one does not wholly escape that burden. Taxes constitute one of the expenses of doing business and, as such an expense, are figured into the cost of practically every article of commerce that goes into one's living, so that the consumer pays some part of the tax whether he owns property or not.

Property, under the law, includes not only houses and lands, money, cattle, horses and automobiles, but debts due from solvent persons, whether secured by mortgage or not. The real property, the houses and lands, are easily found, but the assessment of personal property, other than livestock, is little better than a farce. Many men have dishonestly dodged their personal property tax, or a large portion of it, so long that they do not feel it to be dishonest to dodge it, and California now discloses little more of personal property wealth than the tax rolls showed to exist thirty years ago, when California was hardly more than half as rich as it now is. This is one of the many public wrongs that somehow need righting.

Stone In, Irish Out.

THE NEWS THAT JOHN P. IRISH is to be dropped out of the position of naval officer at San Francisco, and that George Stone is to be substituted, will be received by our best citizenship with total unconcern. Both gentlemen have deserved well at the hands of the associated villainies of this state. They have served them with a generous disregard for their own fame. The offense of Stone is palliated by his want of ability. That of Irish is accentuated by the possession of an ability and an eloquence that gave him need to be thrall to no man and no interest. If the people of California could have believed in him there is no honor they would not have conferred upon him. It is unlikely that he will be forgotten when down and out. The splendid services he rendered the grafters through the columns of the Oakland Tribune during the late unpleasantness entitle him to further largess at their munificent hands. The President only is to be commiserated.

The Return of Detweiler.

REPORT HAS IT THAT A. K. DETWEILER, one of our bunch of grafters, has ventured to return to the haunts of men. It is well. We shall soon hear of his participating in public banquets without shame, as so well befits an unconvicted felon. Doubtless we shall learn, too, that he has been confined in some sanitarium under the care of a nerve specialist. The soul of Detweiler is delicate. Had it not been for his fierce, ungovernable modesty he doubtless would have faced the music with Calhoun and the others, but that man Heney is such a rude, uncouth person that the situation might at times have become embarrassing "doncherknow?" Therefore it was sweetest and best to go into seclusion until the squall blew over. Heaven be praised, there is, too, a hell for the reception of malefactors who beat the law, and we have it upon the word of an old colored woman who knew as much about it as anybody—"When de sinner gits dar he don't burn up like no cob; he lasts, he lasts."

The Morgan Billions.

THIS IS THE WAY that conservative, reliable, safe and sane journal, the Springfield Republican, in round numbers, estimates the extent of the J. Pierpont Morgan associated interests: Two great insurance companies, $1,000,000,000; six national banks, $600,000,000; the United States Steel and other industrial corporations, $2,000,000,000; seven trust companies, $328,000,000; the Morgan system of railroads, $2,500,000,000. Total financial power of the Morgan group of interests, $6,000,000,000. This now matches the Standard Oil group, but there is reciprocity and not ill-will between them, for how could it be otherwise considering the exemplary Christian gentlemen who head the two parallel interests? It was well said by the pious Baer that, "It has pleased the Lord to confide great interests to the custody of eminent Christian gentlemen." So it has, so it has, and yet it is not impossible that the Devil may be better pleased than the Lord.

Leopold.

FEARS ARE ENTERTAINED THAT, in spite of all his sufferings and the use of the knife, King Leopold of Belgium may recover. His white subjects at home are giving way to no transports of grief and his sable subjects in the Congo, whom he has ravaged like a Pittsburg iron master, are hearing the news of his illness with resignation. Stormy old Petrel! He fought his legitimate children out of his sight, however he may have treated the others, and his barbarities disgraced a nation. But he is enormously rich. He sold everything that a reputable man would most cherish and bought money with it which he must leave, if not now, then by and by, to crawl like a snail out of its shell into the presence of his Maker, of no more consequence, we may believe, than the poorest cannibal of the Congo whom the "chattering missionaries" tell us he exploited like the master of a sweatshop. What can such a life have profited him?

The Bandit.

ONE LONE MAN WITH A PISTOL has San Francisco half terrorized. He has given the sensational dailies a great bit of news to play up and right well are they doing it; but they have missed the moral of it all, which is this: What would be the state of helplessness of any civilized community if one man in a hundred, yes, one in a thousand, were a blood-hungry bandit? With one in the thousand, prudent, cautious, determined, silent, no human life would be safe, all business houses would be forced to close before dusk, few persons would venture out after night and no one would be admitted into any door until he had answered satisfactorily to the call "Who's there?" To what are we indebted for this comparative immunity from criminality? To the police? They could not stop it if there were two of them on every side of every city block. No, rather to that best and most effective police power the world has known, that for nineteen centuries, in a thousand ways, has taught the children of men to cease to do evil and learn to do well, do we owe what of safety we have. But for that service a man's poverty would be his only security, and there are millions to-day living with no other security than their poverty.

Hearst as a Hero.

WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST will not down. Any man with 150,000 votes at his back in any city or state can do business with, or be granted the hospitality of, those who sit in the seats of the mighty. A week or so ago Mr. Hearst was the guest of honor at a banquet tendered by some of the financial and political elect of New York, and a few days later he was made the guest of honor of a bigger banquet attended by men not so high or so important, yet not to be overlooked. "Uncle" George Hearst used to say of William Randolph that whatever he did one could count on its being something surprising. If, after having swung around the circle of the indecencies of private, journalistic and political life, he should now undertake to be decent, honest and straightforward that would be the most surprising freak of all.

Next Week.

NEXT WEEK THE "BACKBONE" article in The California Weekly will be the second in the series on "The Modern Labor Union," written by Rev. Charles R. Brown of Oakland. His subject will be, "The Opposition to Unionism," frankly treated, nothing extenuated for which there is no extenuation, nothing concealed that should be said in order to be frank and fair. Recent events at Pittsburg foreshadow an increased interest in the labor problem. Events are not unlikely to take place which will bring the issue home to many. Every mind should be prepared to judge sanely and soundly of the events as they come. Nothing can better contribute to this preparation of the mind than carefully to read and ponder over these articles by Doctor Brown. Will the reader kindly tell his friends about them?

LEADERSHIP AND THE LEAGUE.

The Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League aims to free the Republican party from domination by corrupting corporations, political bosses and the criminal classes manipulated by political bureaus.—Extract from platform at meetings held at the Oakland Coliseum, November 2nd.

There are twenty-six words in the foregoing declaration but they are sufficient to outline three labors of Hercules, labors which must be performed in every dominant political party or the destruction of free institutions is only a question of generations if not of decades. Events move with swift feet in this fast time of ours.

There are thousands of corporations in California that are not corrupting, and some of them are public service corporations. Against these the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League wages no warfare. The Southern Pacific company is the chief offender and with it are allied such corporations as the United Railroads, the Spring Valley Water company, and such other corporations as want things they should not have. It is the policy of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company to make it to the interest of all such corporations to come to that bureau for advantage and protection, and practically all the villainies of the state will be found herded into that corral.

While it is the public service corporation that has debauched our political life, it is the promoter, the high financier, who has debauched the public service corporations. He is the "Indian" who is making all the trouble. The performance of a public-service by a corporation is as legitimate, healthful and proper as keeping a store. Whoever performs that service is entitled to a reasonable return upon a reasonable valuation of the investment and no more. That does not satisfy the promoter. What he wants is to secure so large a revenue for the performance of that service as to double, treble or quadruple the selling price of the securities representing the investment. To attain this end, and then sell out, he is willing to debauch every public official with whom he may come in contact. He is an enemy of the state and he it is who orders, or organizes, every corporate political bureau that exists.

The second purpose is to emancipate the Republican party from domination by political bosses and, for bossism, substitute leadership. The boss is the creation of the promoter because the promoter furnishes a market for his wares. Without such a market bossism would scarcely repay the cost of it. The follower of the boss takes his orders from the boss. The follower of a leader takes the programme of the leader because he has had a voice in selecting the leader and in forming his programme. The boss is autocratic, the leader republican; the boss is corporative, the leader co-operative; the boss operates from the top down, the leader from the bottom upward; the boss implies a plutocratic despotism, the leader self government among a free people.

The third high purpose is the emancipation of the Republican party from domination by the criminal classes. Who constitute criminal classes? They are the debauchers and the debauched. Some of them are great, greedy vampires. Some of them are cringing, crawling, pediculus vestimenti. All are parasites. They live off the public, not by serving the people but by capitalizing their necessities or their weaknesses. Their lairs are to be found in the cheap boarding houses, the saloons and the redlight districts. They have no political or other principles. They can change their party affiliations as easily as they can change their shirts, and more frequently if necessary. They are bound together by the cohesive power of graft and of immunity from prosecution for plying their unlawful trades. This body of voters is big enough in any city, when solidified, to hold the balance of power when the better element can be divided into two hostile camps on a question of party or policy. Without it the boss would be out of a job and the public-service promoter would not be able to buy what he wants. The "push" is the root of the political cancer.

How this element is to be eradicated from our political life it is not easy to say. Make living in and around houses of ill-fame a felony punishable with forfeiture of the electoral franchise, that would be a step in the right direction. The cities of Europe eliminate what we call the floating vote with fine effect. This element can be largely eliminated from our political life, and it must be. When the will to eliminate it becomes determined a way will be found.

THE BATTLE OF PITTSBURG.

The great Homestead strike of 1892 was a mistake. It was worse than a mistake, it was an immoral if not criminal aggression of organized labor, intoxicated with its newly found power, upon the rights of capital. The challenge thrown down by labor was accepted by capital, the fight was to the finish, the labor unions were defeated and cast out and, for seventeen years, the victors have been pressing their advantage harder and harder until Pittsburg has come to be, to American civilization, what the Valle Nacional is to the civilization of Mexico—an abomination of desolation. Great was the sin of organized labor in the Pittsburg district in 1892, and terrible has been the punishment endured.

The Pittsburg industrial district is at once the highest example of the beneficent effects of the American protective system, as applied to infant industries after they have grown to colossal proportions, and the most perfect example of the policy of the wolf as applied to unorganized and unled sheep, sheared so close that every nip of the shears cuts to the quick. The principle of the division of labor has been carried so far in that district that skilled trades have been reduced to single elemental operations that any blockhead can perform after having been shown once, and the civilized world has been ransacked to find the cheapest blockheads born of woman to do work that was once done by skilled artisans.

The Pittsburg survey, recently made by disinterested experts from many cities, brought to light a state of facts that cannot be questioned and that mark the depths of the dollar's inhumanity to man. In no other community has the American so small a part in the personnel of American labor, and nowhere else has labor of any kind so little of advantage gained from a protective system, professedly adopted for the benefit of labor. The laborer has no more part or lot in that protection than he would have if protection were wiped off the statute books.

Nowhere else, outside the heniquen plantations of Yucatan, are flesh and blood so driven to the limit of endurance as there. Not all the philanthropies of Carnegie will ever atone for the exacting demands which he insisted upon from those who piled up his millions while he trotted the globe at his ease. What he did has been so improved on since then that stalwart youths are wrung as dry as hay in less than a score of years and then thrown out without being mercifully put to death, as in the cases of mules so used up as to be of no further service. The destruction of life is atrocious and the compensations granted for injuries are pittance and seldom granted at all. In fine, the labor situation at Pittsburg stands condemned, with scarcely one touch of human sympathy to show that the employing corporations have not ghouls instead of men for stockholders.

That the labor organizations of the country have declared war upon the Pittsburg system is good news. It had to come. Pittsburg has demonstrated that where labor is unorganized and capital is without compunction, where the law of supply includes the habitable earth, and the law of demand an output restricted to the needs of a starved market sheltered behind a tariff wall, the degradation of labor follows swiftly and surely. In the great strike of 1892 the conscience of the country was against the strikers and they lost. This time an aroused public conscience will be on the side of the movement to organize the laborers of the Pittsburg district and they should win. It is not unlikely that the "Battle of Pittsburg" will prove to be one of the decisive battles in human history.

The Appointment of Judge Lurton.

The President has sent to the senate for confirmation the name of Judge Horace H. Lurton of Tennessee to fill the vacancy on the Supreme bench caused by the death of the late Judge Peckham. No one else is in possession of the facts as the President must be and The California Weekly is willing to trust the President to do the wisest thing under the circumstances. It is a field of executive endeavor, in which the President is peculiarly capable of being his own judge without the advice and co-operation of political managers or United States Senators. And yet one could wish that he had found a younger man for the place. Judge Lurton is sixty-five and a decade will make him an old man. That bench has too much decadent timber in it now and greatly needs younger and more virile blood. Besides, the Scripps papers affirm that, until lately, it has been the custom of Judge Lurton not only to ride on free railroad passes but in private cars; that he has outdone Judge Grosscup as a recipient of favors from corporate litigants in his court. Perhaps, like Judge Grosscup, he did not know it was wrong until his critics called his attention to it, and, perhaps, too, the allegation may not be true. Let the matter be sifted. Judicial obligation to powerful litigants should be made odious.

Missed the Chance of His Life.

Judge Peter S. Grosscup has joined the "insurgents." If he cannot turn his back on the Republican party he will at least turn his back upon that faction of it that stands for those "twin wrongs," our present tariff and our present corporation policy. We doubt the hilarity of the insurgents because of this accession to their ranks, unless the judge came crawling into camp clad in sackcloth and smeared with ashes. He has been a corporation judge if ever the federal judiciary contained one, and his reversal of the $29,000,000 case turned back the hands of the clock of progress half way. Judge Landis had brought the greatest law defying corporation of them all face to face with the alternative of obeying the law or suffering confiscation, and it is to that they will have to be brought before they will obey the law. Judge Grosscup missed the chance of his life. Nevertheless his apostasy from Aldrichism, untimely though it is, will not be wholly devoid of beneficial influences. He is right now, however wrong he may have been in the Standard Oil case.

The Sierra Club.

No one except the Sierra Club has a right to speak for the Sierra Club, and a proper course will be for that club to hold a three-days' convention for the purpose of hearing all sides of the Hetch-Hetchy controversy and then taking action with full knowledge of all the facts. That club is made up of intelligent men and women. This paper has the faith to believe that a righteous conclusion will be reached if what the industrial workers call a "long jaw" can be held, the points on which an agreement can be reached are worked out one by one and those upon which no agreement can be reached are narrowed down to their lowest terms. Doubtless there are sentimentalists in the club, and sentiment is not a bad thing. Would to heaven that there were more of it in all our commercial and industrial activities! But sentiment will yield to reason if reason has the better of the argument after the evidence is all in. Let the Sierra Club be gotten together here in San Francisco for a "long jaw" over the Hetch-Hetchy water proposition.

Sorry For San Diego.

The California Weekly is sorry for San Diego, but San Francisco is the biggest and that settles it. Perhaps it ought not, but it will. Besides, to get up a big enough Panama-Pacific exposition to challenge the attention and patronage of the world—well, San Diego is not big enough and strong enough for that either. We are not justifying San Francisco in reaching out and taking for its own use the occasion and the day, after San Diego had spoken for them, but the logic of the situation is with San Francisco because it is the biggest, and is big enough, while San Diego is not. All that remains to be said therefore is that The California Weekly is sorry for San Diego's disappointment and desires to express the belief that San Diego will see the day when it will be glad that it did not undertake to tote that elephant.

Afraid It Will Be Hurt.

Our thanks to the Los Angeles Graphic for its solicitude lest The California Weekly be "hurt" because of its stand in favor of ship subsidy. The California Weekly is not afraid of being "hurt" for anything it says. Getting hurt goes with the job of independent journalism, just as it does with football and crack-the-whip. The game would not be worth the candle if it were otherwise. Besides, The California Weekly is not overmuch pleased with the ship subsidy idea. It does not want to resort to that method if there is any other way of rehabilitating an American merchant marine that will culminate in half our American commerce being carried in American-built ships owned by American capital and manned by American seamen, but it is fearful that there is no other way. Bring on your better way, Brother Graphic, and if you can show that it will produce that result you can count on The California Weekly standing for it. But bear this in mind: The American flag flying over a foreign built ship and manned by Chinese coolies will not meet the requirements, even though the ship be owned, and profitably operated, by American capital. Every time we say "subsidy" we have to expectorate because the word leaves a bad taste in the mouth.

Mexico's Good Offices Not Needed.

In the matter of straightening out Nicaragua and establishing stable government there the good offices of Mexico are not needed. Uncle Sam can attend to that task without assistance, thank you. Besides, two cooks, one a Yankee and the other a Mexican, would spoil any broth. The ingredient of red pepper is not needed. The saving grace of common salt (sense) will afford all the seasoning required. We shall need to do for Nicaragua what we have done for Cuba, establish a stable government, set an example in sanitation, open public schools, build roads, let the light into dark places wherever places are dark and, when we go away leaving the house in order, post a notice that if we come back we come to stay, everything depending on how the Nicaraguans behave. We do not wish to have Mexico participate in this function, for two reasons. One is that the Mexicans will not be able to appreciate the American policy as applied to Cuba, Porto Rico and the Philippines because not built that way. The other is that it is only a question of time when the same service will have to be performed, on a grander scale, for Mexico.

Put the Man First.

Most of the things that we have been taught to believe to be so are not so or are only qualifiedly so. Those who doubt the truth of this will find much to convince them of its truth in our "backbone" article for the week, written by Mr. William Kent. He has gone through the pet doctrines of the professional economists with a rapier and has left them disfigured if not disemboweled, much to the gratification of those who put manhood above unnatural natural laws, and natural laws become unnatural whenever they inflict injustice and hardship.

The fault with the economists is that they have put production, supply and demand, laissez faire, the right of private contract, competition and combination, buying in the cheapest market and selling in the dearest, the wage fund, etc., above human happiness, human fraternity, love and friendship. They have been dealing with human relations as though they were calculating eclipses. They have left out of the equation the "ifs" that are forever cropping up in human affairs, notwithstanding the fact that whatever is true of human relations is true only until an "if" intervenes to make the true untrue, when, in the expressive vernacular of our time (which The California Weekly employs to its hurt) it is "all off" with the economic law.

These alleged economic laws are tendencies. If any one of them, competition, combination, supply-and-demand, right of contract, paternalism, co-operation, let-alone, or what not, were permitted to go to its logical conclusion it would ruin the world. The doctrinaire is an interesting and learned personality, but with all his wisdom we can no more be assured of what a community or nation will do under a given state of facts than though we were dealing with "insane persons, idiots, women and Indians not taxed." Man is a free, and irresponsible, moral agent.

So-called economic laws are good servants, but bad masters, to be held to until they begin to produce hardship, when they must be mitigated or resisted. Mr. Kent handles his subject in a style so lucid that his article cannot fail of being profitable for a second as well as a first reading.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

How many people does the reader know? How much does he care for those he does not know? How much is he concerned for those out of his class, his set, his kind of people? Are all the rest as trees walking?

That is the way that people appeared to the young man that was born blind whom Jesus cured. They seemed as trees walking, and all he knew about his cure was that whereas before he had been blind afterward he saw. To what extent are we all of us blind and how few of us ever have our eyes touched that we may afterward see beyond the narrow range of our set, our class, our little coterie?

Of all things in life there is nothing more cruel than class. Carried to its logical conclusion it terminates in caste, the very quintessence of man's inhumanity to man, a subtle and refined malignancy that tortures like a scourge of hot fires.

Yet what is there in nature more insistent and persistent than class? Humanity hunts in packs, "For the strength of the pack is the wolf and the strength of the wolf is the pack." There is no sadder sight to greet our eyes than that of the growing differentiation of American society and American life into stratifications, more or less at war with each other. They are forming packs every day in the week, packs of men who do Big Business, packs of men who must earn each day their daily bread, packs of employers, packs of working women, political packs, packs of earners, packs of spenders, professional packs that stand for the professional advantage of their packs, and shall we also include packs of worshippers who would exclude from the love of God, and that peace which passeth understanding, all that do not accept leadership from that pack, being unable to see any good thing in any other? "For the strength of the pack is the wolf and the strength of the wolf is the pack."

We are, first of all, animals, surcharged with the instincts of animals. We preserve ourselves as animals preserve themselves, and we prey upon the members of other packs as animals do and, if one of our own pack, from any cause, falls out of it we hate him, and prey upon him, with a ferocity we exhibit to no one else. What of the rich man who "goes back on his class?" What of the laborer who leaves his union to become a "scab"? For one's pack each member will brave any danger. There have been no finer heroisms than have been displayed in labor controversies by members of the toiling pack for the strength of the pack, and members of the employing pack have dared as bravely rather than flinch an inch or yield an ell of advantage claimed by their pack; but how animal it all was, and how blind to the truth that there is a side to human nature that is not of the wolf wolfish, but of the divine?

We have been blind from our birth to those larger humanities that are not of the pack, that have not their strength in the strength of the wolf. Somehow he who touched the eyes of the blind has been able so far to make them see men only as trees walking, impersonal things, things that in passing reflect their images on the retina of the eye, and then pass off leaving no impression behind. Doubtless this young man saw more clearly after his eyes became used to the glare of the sunlight, after the quality of perspective entered into his vision and, doubtless, too, men will by and by so get their concept of humanity adjusted that they will be able to see the human family in the large, the whole human interest as a common interest. When that time comes sets, classes, castes and, not unlikely, even nations, may lose their pack-like formations and become members one-of-another in an all-embracing fraternity.

The elemental trouble with human affairs seems to be that mankind still belongs to the animal kingdom and not to the kingdom of God. We see each other as trees walking.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

A Great Year for Farmers.

Secretary Wilson of the United States Department of Agriculture has announced that 1909 has been "the most prosperous of all years" for the farmers of this country. Certainly the statistics he gives to "buttress" the announcement are encouraging. The total of our farm products this year is $8,760,000,000, a gain of $869,000,000, or more than 11 per cent over 1908. Corn has the lead in value, the valuation of the crop being $1,720,000,000. Next to this comes cotton, with a valuation of $859,000,000, just less than one-half of that of corn. Then comes wheat, with $725,000,000, while hay, with its valuation of $665,000,000, presses it fairly close. Other crops follow, with the following valuations to their credit: Oats, $400,000,000; potatoes, $212,000,000; sugar beets and cane, $95,000,000; barley, $88,000,000; flaxseed, $36,000,000, and rice, $25,000,000. Evidently it has been a good year for the farmers, and in the meantime the consumers more and more are sweating drops of blood, or, at any rate, something that is painful, in paying constantly increasing prices for these products. But Secretary Wilson says this is the fault neither of the farmer nor of the wholesaler, but of the retailer, who, according to this high authority, is the one who is deftly inserting the knife of high prices between the ribs of the Great American People.

The Foreigners Whom We Educate.

Reports from the higher institutions of learning in the United States indicate that they are educating a considerable number of foreigners, the total number in such institutions being 1,467. The following are the numbers from countries sending fifty or more each: Canada, 242; China, 193; Japan, 158; Mexico, 81; Great Britain and Ireland, 71; Cuba, 70; India, 60; Germany, 56 (less than one-fifth of what we send to Germany); Argentine Republic, 52; Turkey, 51; Russia, 50. Of the 1,467 foreign students 460 are from North American countries, 458 from Asia, 313 from Europe, 154 from South America, 64 from Australia, and 18 from Africa. It is interesting to note that our supposedly benighted brown brethren of Asia send practically the same number as come from our own North America, one-half more than come from Europe, and about three times as many as hail from South America. Some of those brown peoples have slept a long time, but they are showing many signs of waking.

The Forest Service Somewhat Rattled.

The Forest Service should be more careful in preparing the literature it scatters broadcast throughout the nation. In its latest circular it says: "By the end of the brief minute taken to read these paragraphs the nations of the civilized world will have struck three million matches. This is the average for every minute of the twenty-four hours of the day. Seven billion is the enormous number for the entire year." The trouble with these figures is that they do not "jibe." If the world uses three million matches a minute, it uses one trillion five-hundred and seventy-six billion eight hundred million in a year, instead of the modest seven billion to which the Forest Service debits it. If, on the contrary, it uses but seven billion a year, then it scratches but 13,318 a minute. In short, either its figures for a minute are about 225 times too great or its figures for a year are 225 times too small. Very likely the Forest Service cannot afford to hire an arithmetician, but, if it does not, it should fight somewhat shy of figures.

Uniform Map of the World.

At the present time there is no such thing as a map of the world constructed on a uniform scale, but it is probable that there will be in a not distant day. The question has been considered at congresses of geographers held in London in 1895, Berlin in 1899, Washington in 1904, and Geneva in 1908, and now delegates to another congress have assembled in London. Before such a map can be created certain difficulties must be surmounted; for instance, the British and Americans use the inch as the standard of map measurement, while other nations use the meter, and, again, geographical names are spelled differently by the people of various countries. These are evident difficulties, but the proponents of the universal map propose to surmount them. If such a map is made, the scale of measurement probably will be barely less than sixteen miles to the inch.

Where Accumulating Nickels Count.

Probably there is no other place in the world where the humble nickel shows what it can do in the line of piling up dollars as it does at Coney Island. Witness the following facts: During the past summer some twenty million trips were made to Coney from New York City, Brooklyn and adjacent places, and the people who made these trips expended about $40,000,000 while at the resort. Nearly all of this money was paid out in nickels, although, of course, an occasional larger piece varied the nickel monotony. Here, then, we have $40,000,000 represented mostly by nickels, a total of 800,000,000 of the unpretentious coins which so many San Franciscans used to bank in the slot not long ago. If the pile were distributed throughout the United States, every man, woman and child in the country would receive about ten of the coins. Come to think of it, the despised nickel, if treated with tender care, has a very respectable accumulating capacity.

Adelina Patti's Voice of Gold.

Two or three weeks ago Adelina Patti celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of her debut as an operatic singer, which took place at the New York Academy of Music on November 24, 1859, and the event set the interested to figuring what her voice has meant to her in round American dollars. They conclude that she has received a total of about $4,000,000. She began—and doubtless was very glad to begin—with $100 a week, but two years later, in 1861, the assessed valuation of her voice had gone up to $750 a month. By 1869 she had received as high as $600 a night, and when Nilsson received $1,000 a night Patti struck for and received $1,050—she wasn't going to be ranked by any Nilsson. Modern prices to songsters surpass these figures, but the old financial times were not as the new for divas and pugilists.

Minnesota Will Conserve.

More than any other state in the union, probably, Minnesota is taking hold of the question of conservation of resources with intelligence and energy. Governor Eberhardt has appointed a state conservation commission, and it, with the enthusiastic backing of the state federation of commercial clubs, is planning for a great midwinter convention of 3,000 delegates. The convention will be held during three days which will be devoted to debate concerning Minnesota's resources, what shall be done to conserve or increase them, etc. Minnesota is setting an example which should be extensively followed.

Notes About People.

Miss Helen E. Gregory was recently elected School Commissioner in Rochester, N. Y., by a majority of over 700. She was a Republican candidate.

Miss Gertrude Johnson was recently elected Treasurer of Cherry county, Nebraska. Attorney-General Thompson decided that there was nothing in the Constitution to prevent a woman from holding the office.

Col. Mosby, the venerable ex-confederate, who detests football, says that the difference between the older educational standard and the new is the difference between Stonewall Jackson and John L. Sullivan.

The final appraisal of the estate of the late E. H. Harriman places it at a value of $149,000,000. This is more than $50,000,000 over the most liberal estimates made when it was a matter of speculation.

The full name of the Columbia University professor who invented the wireless telephone is Michael Idvorsky Pupin. He is a native of Idvor, Banat, Hungary. Since 1889 he has been professor of electro-mechanics at Columbia.

Supreme Court Justice David J. Brewer has come out for woman's suffrage, saying it is bound to come in this country, however slowly. But he criticizes the English suffragettes, saying their conduct would not be tolerated here.

Mrs. Maud Ballington Booth has opened a house in New York where the wives of criminals will be provided with work to enable them to support their families while their husbands are in jail. The place is called the Rainbow House and the principal work done there will be washing and ironing.

Trinity college at Durham, N. C., will soon begin to attract attention on account of its endowment and facilities, says the Springfield Republican. The Duke family (tobacco trust) continue to pour money into its treasury, the most recent gift being half a million for a medical school; and they show no sign of having reached the limit of their benefactions.

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES.

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHELF.

"Sir Roger de Coverley."

The adventures of this amiable and temperate old bachelor are amongst the most pleasing diversions in English literature. A hero more modest, more just, more considerate, is nowhere to be found. Wisdom flows from his lips, not harsh nor dogmatic, but reasonable and felicitous. Mercy sweetens his every judgment and act. Simplicity and sincerity lend grace to all his intercourse. And the recollection of an unforgettable romance from which he emerged with honor but also without the lady, tinges his later years with a tender but manly sentiment.

As one ambles down the mellow, autumnal lanes of his mild adventures, breathing the fresh country air and basking in his genial comradeship, the flash and fury of more pretentious heroes dwindle into hectic insignificance. Here is a man, and he needs no such adventitious aids as swashbuckling manners and hairbreadth escapes to throw his manliness into relief. Strong in his passions, but stronger in his restraint of them, he is one of the not too common heroes of romance who is not only a man but also a Christian gentleman.

STAGE AND BOOK FOLK.

Kenneth Grahame, author of "The Golden Age," that most imaginative of outdoor child stories, is employed in the dingy precincts of the Bank of England.

Mrs. Humphry Ward and Mrs. Arthur Somerville took the negative side of a suffrage debate recently held in Manchester, England. Councillor Margaret Ashton, a sister-in-law of James Bryce; Mrs. F. T. Swanwick and Miss Margaret Robertson spoke for the affirmative. Bishop Weldon of Manchester presided.

In return for larger grants of state funds toward the expense of maintenance, President Schurman announces his readiness to see Cornell become a state university. He has been for some time an admirer of some of the Western universities. Cornell is betwixt and between the two types, so that the transition which he favors would not be a radical change of policy.

Elinor Glyn and Yvette Guilbert are announced as recent members of anti-suffrage associations. Mrs. Glyn has joined an English society and Mme. Guilbert has been proposed for membership in an association in this country. Both women are said to have declared their inability to understand why any woman should want to vote when she has health and a good husband.

Mr. Crane tells an interviewer that he is going to remain on the stage until Mrs. Crane is tired of traveling. Then he will withdraw, he hopes, at his best, leaving a pleasant memory behind him. Mr. Crane plans a repertoire for his farewell tour, consisting of "Father and the Boys," "The Henrietta," "David Harum," and "The Senator." He would like also to produce "The Merry Wives of Windsor," but he fears that it would cost too much.

Bernhardt made a great impression as Jeanne d'Arc in Moreau's tragedy of the trial, at Paris, Friday evening. With her amazing genius she did not look over the age of the Maid of Orleans, who was burned at the stake before she was twenty. The New York Tribune dispatch explains the marvel thus:—This was largely due to the fact that Sarah Bernhardt wore throughout only one costume. It was one solitary garment of silver chain, drawn with glove-fitting elastic tightness, causing the impression of extreme youth. This wonderfully effective silver chain combination of mail also covered her head, neck and throat, revealing only the forehead, eyes, nose, cheeks, mouth and chin. Nothing like it has ever been seen on the French stage.

TO A WIFE.

By Edwin Chase.

(For The California Weekly.)

V. Love's Vantage Ground.

Thy bosom is no wintry place,
With ice-clad hills and dale,
And battlements that stand apart
Above a barren vale.

Thy bosom is a sunny slope
Where Cupid loves to play,
Or come in all his idle hours
To practice Archery.

Thy bosom is a vantage ground
Where Comfort spreads a tent,
From which all troubles disappear
By Love's sweet blandishment.

VI. Epilogue.

An haven fair for thee, dear wife,
I hold within my heart.
O furl sail in that anchorage,
And ne'er from it depart.

OUR MELLIFLUOUS COUNTY NAMES.

Alameda County.—The Spanish word "Alameda" means "a public walk or promenade in the shade of trees." Literally, it comes from "Alamo," the poplar or cottonwood tree, and it is from the derived meaning of the word, "a public walk," that this county obtained its name.

THACKERAY'S MODESTY.

The Hon. Sir E. Chandos Leigh recently told a Thackeray story. "Thackeray perfectly abominated anything in the nature of flattery. I was with Thackeray one night when a man came up and for five minutes administered to the great novelist the most fulsome flattery. When the man had gone I said to Thackeray: 'Who is that?' Thackeray replied: 'He calls himself an artist, but I think he paints as much in "butter" as he does in oils.'"

STEVENSON'S NAME.

Robert Louis Stevenson was originally named Lewis, and the Pall Mall Gazette is responsible for the statement that the change in spelling was not an affectation on Stevenson's part. His father, Thomas Stevenson, was a sturdy Scots Tory of the most desperate sort, and there was in Edinburgh a person in authority named Lewis, a no less stringent Radical. The name is rare in Scotland, and Thomas feared somebody would think he had given this Radical's name to his boy. So Robert's name was spelled Frenchwise to divert suspicion. It is said that Robert Louis afterward had a hankering for the ancient name.

THE LAST FURROW.

By Edwin Markham.

The Spirit of the Earth, with still restoring hands,
'Mid ruin moves, in glimmering chasm
gropes,
And mosses mantle, and the bright flower
opes;
But Death the Plowman wanders in all lands,
And to the last of Earth his furrow stands.
The grave is never hidden; fearful hopes
Follow the dead upon the fading slopes,
And thee wild memories meet upon the sands.

When willows fling their banners to the plain,
When rumor of winds and sound of sudden showers
Disturb the dream of winter—all in vain
The grasses hurry to the graves, the flowers
Toss their wild torches on the windy towers;
Yet are the bleak graves lonely in the rain.

A CERTAIN RICH MAN.

How the idle rich spend their money has been the theme of some recent novels. How the money was made receives consideration in "A Certain Rich Man," by Wm. Allen White. It is a novel of epic proportions, narrating the life histories of its characters even to the third generation. The opening chapters tell the story of the Kansas pioneers so simply that we do not at first recognize its greatness, but as it proceeds it gathers volume. We have here "Bleeding Kansas" during the Border Ruffian wars and the drouth of 1860, following with the grasshopper invasion and the panic of 1873, the Granger, Populist and Prohibition movements—the building of a great commonwealth with its varying fortunes of disaster and prosperity.

The curious characters found in a country town are vividly portrayed. There is Watts McHurdie, the harnessmaker and writer of bad poetry, once in his life inspired to write a song that lived; Jake Dolan, the genial Irishman who confesses to a Dutch priest, remarking, "If you want to see how a soul will look in its underwear, get an Irishman to confess to a Dutchman"; General Philemon Ward, prohibitionist and idealist, laughed at and rated as a crank, yet who lives to see many of his ideals realized; Martin Culpepper, the generous and hospitable Southern gentleman, who is not always able to distinguish between other people's money and his own; Lige Bemis, scoundrel and horsethief—later, the honorable E. W. Bemis, politician, lawyer and federal judge, elevated to the bench that he may further the schemes of the millionaire who is his patron.

John Barclay is both hero and villain, of poetic temperament, yet the poetic is crushed by the acquisitive faculty, and the man devotes his life to dishonest scheming for wealth. He is a great organizer and petty thief. As head of the National Provisions Company he crushes competition by the familiar device of railroad rebating and mixes his patent breakfast foods with Missouri river clay. He owns senators and judges and when he finds himself under investigation and indictment, he is astonished to see that the policies he has pursued so long are universally execrated. In the little harness maker's shop, where public opinion is registered, he breaks out.

"What's got into the people of this country? What have I done that they should begin pounding me this way? Here are five suits in the county courts in Texas against me, five or ten in the Dakotas, three in Nebraska, one or two in each of the Lake states, and the juries always finding against me. I haven't changed my methods; I'm doing just what I've done for fifteen years. What's got into the people? What am I doing that I haven't been doing?" "Maybe the people are growing honest, John," suggested the harness maker amiably. Barclay thrust back his head and roared, "Naw—it isn't that; it's the damn newspapers. They're what's raising the devil. Why, they have even bulldozed some of my own federal judges—my own men, Watts, my own men; men whose senators came into my office with their hats in their hands and asked permission to name these judges." Barclay's judges keep him out of jail, but the results of his evil doings come upon him and he finds relief in repentance and restitution.

In this book the present conditions in American life and the dangers which threaten American institutions are set forth with nude realism. The book is written with a noble purpose and cannot fail to exert a great influence. The sombre and occasionally tragic texture of the narrative is constantly interwoven with the bright threads of humor and philosophy and the tone is wholesomely optimistic. Some faults of construction noticeable in the early part of the book are forgotten in the noble rounding out of its second and greater part.

WHAT THE RED CROSS STAMPS DO

HOW, WHERE, AND FOR WHAT THE PROCEEDS ARE USED.

"Don't spit!"

That is indelicate and terse, but, if every man, woman and child in the world obeyed it, the greatest physical scourge in the world would be obliterated in one generation, and a case of tuberculosis would then be as rare as a case of smallpox is today.

Ten thousand people in San Francisco are infected with tuberculosis, three people there die of it every working day. One death out of every six and a half in San Francisco is caused by tuberculosis. Counting the lost earning capacity of tuberculous sufferers, the economic loss to San Francisco from tuberculosis is $3,000,000 a year.

Is it not, then, one of the greatest benefices to cure and prevent tuberculosis? And is it not cheap, at any cost, to cure and prevent it?

The sale of the Red Cross Christmas Stamps is simply one device for achieving this desirable end. The American Red Cross, of which President Taft is president, prepares these stamps at Washington and sends them to the local associations throughout the country. In San Francisco, the organization in which this campaign centers is the San Francisco Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis. With the stamps are sent display cards and other advertising material. The stamps are sold by local merchants absolutely without charge to either the Red Cross or the association. The entire gross receipts are turned over to the local association, which sends one-fifth of them to the Red Cross to pay the actual cost of the stamps, display cards, and expressage. The local association keeps the other four-fifths and applies it to the eradication of tuberculosis.

The San Francisco Association used the funds received from the sale last Christmas, together with private donations, to erect a permanent building at 1547 Jackson street for a tuberculosis clinic and dispensary. This building is now occupied, and daily, except Friday, the free clinic is open from 8:30 to 10 o'clock in the morning. Already an average of twelve indigent patients are examined daily. The examining physicians give their services free, each of five hospitals sending a doctor one day of each week. These hospitals are the Mount Zion, the Lane, the University of California, the Hahnemann, and the Fruit and Flower Mission.

The advanced cases at this clinic are easily detected. But the disease in its earlier stages is one of the most difficult to diagnose, and much time and care are necessary to make sure of its existence. The precautions in the clinic are supplemented by the work of the visiting nurses, of whom three are attached to the staff of the association. One of these nurses calls at the home of every tuberculosis patient and compiles what is called the "social history" of the case; that is, the probable source of infection, the sanitary condition of the living and sleeping quarters, the nature of the patient's employment, his financial resources, and so on. If a tuberculous parent is examined at the clinic, the nurse brings the other members of the family for examination to determine the extent to which the infection has spread.

When all the facts about the case and the patient are assembled, the curative and preventive measures are outlined. If the patient be the family bread-winner and if it be necessary for his cure that he be removed to a sanatorium, the association assumes the financial responsibility of his treatment—which is supplied to the association at net cost—and of the family subsistence as well.

From this extreme type of case on up to those cases which are detected in the earliest stages, in which only simple treatment and careful prevention of the spread of infection are necessary, the association provides for each on its individual merits.

Most of the work of the association thus becomes, in the main, educational and preventive. The family of a patient in the first stages of the disease is warned of the necessity for boiling the clothing and bedding of the patient, and the dishes from which he eats, and of the other necessities for light and air. The patient himself is made to understand the method of destroying the one source of infection—his sputum—by burning the receptacle in which he deposits it; and is instructed in the proper hygienics and diet essential to his cure.

Extensive educational campaigns are carried on. Circulars describing the cause, cure, and danger of infection are distributed to school children by the tens of thousands. Street-car signs are printed, warning passengers of the danger of expectorating in public places; and these signs are displayed through the courtesy of the advertising agents. Similar signs are given space by merchants, by the postal authorities, and by the owners of office buildings.

Public lectures are given under the auspices of the Association, by doctors who donate their time for this purpose. All these lectures are illustrated, the lantern slides being prepared by the Association. Last year these lectures were given before many of the leading clubs—both men's and women's—and the general public was invited to attend. Next year they will be given principally before the labor unions in the various union halls.

The labor unions, by the way, have done more than any other one class of people to make effective the national campaign against tuberculosis. They have invariably welcomed instruction on the subject and have lent their active co-operation in the practical work of extending that instruction and of practicing the preventive regulations that have been suggested. Possibly they are more easily approached on the subject than other people because they see more of the actual misery that is brought about when the head of a working family is stricken, and because they have a vivid object lesson on the economic waste caused by tuberculosis in the frequent reports of money paid by the unions for sick benefits.

These are some of the things that the Red Cross Christmas Stamps do. The San Francisco Association hopes this year to net $10,000 from their sale. All of this money will be applied to the anti-tuberculosis fight. The Association's current expenses are met principally by the donations of Mrs. William H. Crocker, and the Mary A. Crocker trust; and partly by the one dollar a year payments of the Association's 1,500 members; leaving the Stamp fund free for the actual relief work, such as caring for indigent families while the tuberculous father is recovering, buying food and drugs (at net cost) for free dispensing, and like uses.

The San Francisco Association will, in the course of time, succeed in educating the public on another phase of the tuberculosis danger. This is inadequate provision for preventing the spread of tuberculosis infection in the school room.

To understand the gravity of this danger, one need only glance at the following statement issued by the National Association:

"If the percentage of tuberculous children recently ascertained by an investigation in Stockholm, Sweden (1.61 per cent), were applied to the schools of the United States, there would be 273,700 children between the ages of 8 and 15 who are positively affected with tuberculosis. As contrasted with this figure, there are only eleven open-air tuberculosis schools in the entire country.

"Special schools for tuberculous children have now been established in Providence, Boston, New York, Rochester, Washington, Hartford, Conn., Chicago and Pittsburg. New York has three schools and Washington, D. C., two. The board of education of New York is proposing to establish three more, and similar institutions are being planned in Detroit, Buffalo, Philadelphia, Cincinnati and Newark, N. J.

"At the lowest estimate, however, even with all the schools now in operation and those proposed, accommodations will not be provided for .4 of 1 per cent of the children who need this special treatment. In a large number of cities, children with tuberculosis are excluded from the public schools, but in most instances, no special provision is made for them. Children who are afflicted with tuberculosis are a menace to the health of their schoolmates. Both on this account and because they are physically unable to keep up in their work, special schools are needed for this class of children. Every city should provide at least one well-equipped school or special class room of this sort for each 25,000 population.

"In cities like Providence, Boston and New York, where outdoor schools have been conducted for two years, the results obtained from the treatment of children in special tuberculosis open-air schools seem to show the great advantage of this class of institutions. This, coupled with the experience of open-air schools in Germany and England, proves that children can be cured of tuberculosis and keep up with their school work, without any danger to fellow pupils."

The National Association is the authority for the following true story in connection with the sale of Red Cross Christmas Stamps last year:

"In one of the Eastern cities last year a well dressed gentleman stepped up to one of the tellers' windows in a bank over which hung the sign, 'Red Cross Christmas Stamps for Sale Here,' and, after talking about the stamp and the purpose for which it was being sold, asked for ten dollars' worth. A little ragged newspaper boy, who came into the bank to sell his papers and who stood listening to the story of the stamp, stepped up, after the gentleman had gone, and laid a penny upon the counter and said, 'Give me one of those stamps; my mother died of it—and my sister's got it.'"

The moral is: Remember the Red Cross Christmas Stamps. Buy them and put them on all Christmas packages. "It will not carry any kind of mail, but any kind of mail will carry it."

TO A GREEK GIRL.

(After a week of Landor's Hellenics.)

By Austin Dobson.

With breath of thyme and bees that hum,
Across the years you seem to come,—
Across the years with nymphlike head,
And wind-blown brows unilleted;
A girlish shape that slips the bud
In lines of unspoiled symmetry;
A girlish shape that stirs the blood
With pulse of Spring, Autonoe.

Where'er you pass,—where'er you go,
I hear the pebbly rillet flow;
Where'er you go,—where'er you pass,
There comes a gladness on the grass;
You bring blithe airs where'er you tread,—
Blithe airs that blow from down and sea;
You wake in me a Pan not dead,—
Not wholly dead!—Autonoe.

How sweet with you on some green sod
To wreathe the rustic garden god;
How sweet beneath the chestnut's shade
With you to weave a basket braid;
To watch across the stricken chords
Your rosy twinkling fingers flee;
Or woo you in soft woodland words
With woodland pipe, Autonoe!

In vain,—in vain! The years divide:
Where Thamis rolls a murky tide,
I sit and fill my painful reams,
And see you only in my dreams;—
A vision, like Alcestis, brought From underlands of Memory,—
A dream of Form in days of Thought,—
A dream,—a dream, Autonoe!

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Tommy's Letter to Santa Claus.

Dear Santa, if you do not mind,
And if you'll be so very kind,
Bring me—I have to play alone—
A little brother for my own.
You'll have to see the stork, I s'pose,
For so ma says, an' course she knows;
So tell the stork you've heard from me
The kind of brother he should be.

Don't send a baby. Goodness knows
The neighbors have enough of those,
An' they're no good, fer's I can tell,
Except to wiggle an' to yell;
But what I want's a brother that
Can throw a ball an' hold a bat.
So tell the stork he needn't find
One of the useless, wiggly kind.

I hope, dear Santa, you won't make Another such a bad mistake
As you made last year when Paul Gray
A brother asked for Christmas Day.
I s'pose the stork was most to blame,
But it's a fact that when it came
It was a sister, sure as fate,
And, too, it came five days too late.

So don't make more mistakes like these,
But send a brother, if you please,
An' let him be 'bout three feet high,
So he will be as tall as I,
And make him strong, so when we brawl
I just can lick an' that's all.
Please be real careful, and, you see,
I'll be obliged as I can be.

Our Dream of Unselfishness.

Unselfishness is an ideal, son, and, so far as men are concerned, an unattainable one. In all the history of all mankind there is but one recorded instance of a man who seems to have been genuinely and wholly unselfish, and so little use has the world for that sort of thing that he was crucified. The contrast between his life and those of other men, the reflection it implied, was greater than it would endure, and so the cross was fixed on Calvary for him. The unselfishness of his life found its apotheosis in the unselfishness of his death, and in this fact is the surest demonstration that in him was more of the divine than is found in that feeble spark which, in some degree, glimmers in the breast of all of us.

For you and I, and all other men as well, cannot be wholly unselfish if we would. Some of us would like to be, and to that end we really try, but we fail. Just as we are hovering on the verge of an action which might be completely unselfish comes the little grinning Imp of Self and whispers some suggestion which lessens the glory of the deed.

If you doubt that the last assertion be true, son, do a little self-inventorying, or, let us say, make a little moral diagnosis of your case. For instance, you helped Smith, or Jones, or Brown, when he was in hard stress, as you recall with gratification. It was a fine thing to do, and you are entitled to commendation for it. Well, you got it, and mostly from—yourself. You said to yourself: "Ah, you are a superior article in the line of a man, and Smith, or Jones, or Brown, must feel very grateful to you." And if he did not seem to feel that way you were much disgusted, and said: "Well, that ends the unappreciative wretch with me. I will do nothing more for him." In short, you proposed to have the reward of gratitude or go out of the unselfish line of business.

How do I know that this was so with you, son? Because it is so with me, and I am quite typically human in my tendencies. I wish that it were otherwise, and I constantly strive to make it so, but I notice that just as constantly I am wondering whether Smith, Jones, or Brown, are as grateful as they ought to be.

Yes, one man, and one alone, was entirely unselfish. The rest of us are not, but that fact does not in the least excuse us from trying to be, for in that way we come nearer to the divine mark than we ever will without such effort.

The Opinions of Rufus.

It may be true 'nough that seein's believin', but there's lots of times when hearin' ain't.

I've seen folks git up in meetin' an' announce that the Almighty had saved their souls when none of the neighbors could see any reason why He should take the trouble.

Mankind ain't sufferin' from a lack of first-rate physicians; what it's sufferin' from is a lack of means of knowin' them from the other kind.

I'm a great admirer of the frills of the modern school system, but sometimes I can't help wishin' it would teach more children to read an' spell an' do sums intelligently.

Probably your baby ain't the cutest an' brightest an' sweetest that ever happened, but I don't b'lieve you're fit to be a pa an' ma if you don't think it is.

When a parrot gits to chatterin' a lot of words that have neither sense or connection you can put a cloth over its cage and it'll shut up. That's why it's better to have a parrot 'round than it is to have some people I know.

What we can be is decided in the hour of our birth, if not before. The output of a hen's egg is sure to be a chicken; they ain't an instance on record of its bein' an American eagle.

It's true that fine feathers don't make fine birds, but I reckon the bird looks better with the feathers than it would without them.

I hold that the man or woman who is kind, helpful and all-lovin' lives a better and sweeter creed than ever was written in any book.

Unselfishness is a beautiful ideal, but if we attained it it's probable that our relations and the rest of our acquaintances would consider us weak-minded.

How Heney Defamed Them.

Francis J. Heney shows wisdom in bringing his libel suits in New York. He would be hooted out of court in San Francisco were he to ask damages for anything said about him. For three years he has done little else but defame men who are so far above him in all the attributes of honor, breeding and integrity that comparison is out of the question.—Oakland Tribune.

The rogue not only objects to the halter's draw, he also has strong sentiments concerning the one who draws it, and these sentiments are shared by the professional moral prostitutes who are his apologists.

It is true that Mr. Heney has defamed some of our prominent citizens. Let us see if his conduct was grossly unjustifiable.

He defamed one Eugene E. Schmitz, who then was mayor of San Francisco, terming him a scoundrelly recipient of bribes. Later a jury decided that this defamation was strictly in accordance with the facts.

He defamed one Abraham Ruef, who then was so very prominent that he was the unauthorized ruler of San Francisco, asserting that he was a villainous grafter. Ruef first admitted it, then denied it, and then was convicted of his crime by a jury of his peers.

He defamed Louis Glass, insisting that he was a briber. A jury declared that the defamation did not go beyond the facts in the case.

He defamed Patrick Calhoun, insisting that he was responsible for money paid to debauch a willing-to-be-debauched board of supervisors. Today Calhoun's utmost apologist of oblique moral vision does not contend that he did not thus pay money, and Calhoun himself neither dares go on the witness stand to be questioned by an honest prosecutor nor does he venture to bring an action against any newspaper that publicly denounces him as a rascally briber.

Heney defamed several other "prominent citizens." So did the grand jury in its indictments, one of these prominent citizens still is a fugitive from the law, and the great public believes that, with few if any exceptions, the shameful facts justify both defamation and indictment.

Yes, Heney has defamed, but his defamations have rung true, and it is infinite pity that our supertechnical law, as interposed, has shot less closely to the mark of justice than has he.

And if the Oakland Tribune were actuated by some part of the honest purpose that characterizes Francis J. Heney it would be more of a representative of right public feeling, and less of a moral cuspidor.

Wanted: A Universal Mantle.

When, in social conversation, you remark upon the flaws

You have noticed in your neighbor, how he cracks the moral laws,

Or has naughty pécadillos that you really must deplore;

When you first dissect his errors, and do then dissect some more;

When you blast his reputation, with a most pathetic sigh,

For the duty is so painful, as you never will deny,

Then, of course, you're acting nobly, as a righteous man should do—

But suppose it were your neighbor who were then dissecting you!

Just suppose that he were talking of that wayward thing you did—

I refer unto the action which you trust is fully hid—

Of the time when you were selfish, or, by sad temptation tried,

Took a little side-toboggan on old Satan's crimson slide,

Would you trust beyond expression that he'd use the pedal soft

When he told of your transgression that is registered aloft?

Would you long for kindly pity and for charity of view,

If your neighbor now were talking and might be dissecting you?

Oh, I tell you, men and sisters, there is ne'er a one of us

Who has nowhere something hidden that he'd sooner not discuss,

Underneath the fair exterior of all mortals is the flaw,

Or the scar that shows we trifled with the higher, better law,

And full oft, when we're condemning neighbors for the sins they knew,

Our hot words, like barbs returning, should in justice pierce us, too,

So I strive to say forever, when my neighbor's faults I see:

"Well, I'll hide them 'neath a mantle that, I hope, may cover me."

A Few Axioms.

(Though we sometimes act as if they were not.)

Kind words do not need much grammar and rhetoric to recommend them.

Good deeds do not always travel clad in fine linen.

A smug countenance does not always exude its oil above a loving heart.

There is good authority for the belief that the key to Heaven is not made of gold.

Man's mightiest cemetery is that in which he buries the things he intended to do.

"Know thyself," and the charity with which you view all other men will be greatly increased.

It is almost hopeless to look for the betterment of the man who thinks he is all right.

A few men can do things; the rest of them can tell how they ought to be done.

Smile, Anyway.

When it's shinin' I keep smilin'.

And the reason for it's plain;

When it rains I keep on smilin',

'Cause it soon will shine again.

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

The California Weekly.

Gentlemen: In enclosing my renewal subscription, I should like to add my commendation for the work you are doing and also my best wishes for your success in the splendid task which you have undertaken.

If the majority of people in this state felt towards you and your work as I do—and I think that the number is greater than you have an idea of—both would be assured of continued backing and ultimate success.

Very truly yours,

LOUIS EINSTEIN.

Fresno, Cal., December 8, 1909.

We take the liberty of publishing the foregoing because of the value which every man who knows, or knows of, the writer of it will attach to it. This enterprise was founded on faith that there is a constituency in this state for such a paper as The California Weekly, and a good, big constituency, too, if it can be found. Those who feel about it as Mr. Einstein does are the ones to help us to find that constituency by saying a good word to their friends as opportunity offers. One such word is more effective than barrels of circular letters and sample copies sent broadcast. It is a good word from a good man that counts.

The California Weekly.

Dear Sirs:—I have been practising law in Los Angeles for thirty-five years. Have never failed to attend the caucuses, primaries and elections, and have endeavored to induce all other citizens to perform their duties, as citizens, and to deliver this state from railroad domination. I am therefore in sympathy with your objects and enclose check for your journal and Hiebhorn's History.

Yours truly,

H. A. BARCLAY.

Los Angeles, Cal., Dec. 7, 1909.

There is a record to be proud of and such a man is entitled to be known as a "citizen" with all the dignity that at one time attached to being a citizen of Rome. Furthermore, unless all citizens protect their citizenship as they would protect their homes they will one day lose that citizenship as inevitably as the non-use of any portion of the body involves its inability to be used. There is not a despotism on earth that did not have a free beginning. The Muscovite was, originally, as free as the Teuton and the Teuton as free as the American, yet both are now struggling with all the power they know to regain that which was lost. How many of the readers of this can lay claim to a record equalling that above given? For one, the writer of this cannot.

Editor The California Weekly.

Dear Sir:—Children used to be taught that the bird that can sing and won't sing must be made to sing. It now seems necessary that the man that can vote and won't vote must be made to vote. If there lives a man with soul so dead he cannot appreciate the privilege of the ballot, for which his sisters are clamoring and for which they become "martyrs" and suffer imprisonment, then he must be forced to do his duty at the polls.

In a recent number of your weekly one of your correspondents says compulsory voting would seem to him un-American. "A free right to exercise the privilege of voting seems to be much more desirable." The free right man already has—but only a small percentage exercise it!

As it is the mothers' duty to teach the daughters their share of the home keeping and home making, so it is the fathers' duty to teach the sons to bear their allotted portion of the affairs of state. But if the fathers fail to arouse the young men to interest in the duty which they should consider their privilege, their other relative, Uncle Sam, must show his authority and make voting compulsory.

The "individual citizen" will enlarge his opportunities and have a better chance to "gain an independence" if he takes an interest in civic affairs and puts honest men into office. If he does not think there is something to work, vote and fight for right now, the "individual voter" must be asleep, and he never will awaken without a good hunch of some kind.

If the punishment visited upon the "welcher" cannot be lawfully inflicted upon the "electoral shirk" he must be punished through his pocket. The penalty of a fine in proportion to his income might serve as a reminder to the negligent voter to do his duty.

Trusting you have no objection to a woman expressing her views on compulsory voting, I remain,

Truly yours,

FRANCES DOUGLAS.

San Francisco, Cal., Dec. 6, 1909.

It must be maddening to a woman who wants the ballot to see a man throw away his opportunity to vote, and our correspondent is right in saying that the man who sees nothing worth voting for right now must be too dead to the world to be resurrected if Gabriel were to blow his trumpet in his ears. There never were profounder changes taking place in the life of any country than are taking place in this country and right now. These changes are more fundamental than laws or constitutions and the man who does not see them going on, is a mole and not a man, and moles should not have the right of suffrage. How would it do to compel the man who has forfeited his right to vote, through non-user, to designate some woman to be his attorney-in-fact to vote under his name to the end of his days? Such a man will find no difficulty in finding some woman who will prove more of a man than he.

The California Weekly,

San Francisco.

Gentlemen:—I enclose herewith two dollars for the coming year's subscription. While I had access to the paper at our club, I feel that every believer in good government should support papers of this class, and, besides, my wife reads it from cover to cover. When we are through with it we pass it to some one who does not take it.

Yours truly,

C. J. UHL.

Vacaville, Cal., Dec. 9, 1909.

There is a point brought out in the foregoing that not all subscribers have taken to heart. The California Weekly is a woman's paper as certainly as it is a man's, that is, where the woman in the home has any idea above the latest social function, and there are proportionately as many women who do have ideas above the latest social function as there are men who have ideas above the next forthcoming prize fight or horse race. The California Weekly does not admit that there is any more sex in interest in Right Things relating to government and country than in relation to literature, art, religion, science. Every true woman loves a robust, masculine periodical as certainly (if not as much) as she loves a robust, masculine man.

The California Weekly is for the whole family.

The California Weekly.

Please do not leave out of your excellent paper the "School for Citizenship." I am a school teacher and that is just what I need in school. I intend to send a year's subscription to a college student just for that.

Yours,

Mrs. S. D. PIERCE.

Hunter's, Cal.

We shall keep the School for Citizenship going until we can find something else that will do the work the School for Citizenship department undertakes to do better than that department is doing it. Then we shall drop it, but the effort to prepare the youth of California for citizenship will not be dropped as long as The California Weekly remains in control of its present management.

Dear Sir.

It is a source of satisfaction that you are able to give us your excellent paper, which is much better than the Argonaut was in former times when it was good.

We have indeed one reliable paper now. I have not been able to send you many new subscribers but I expect to get some more.

My subscription will be renewed in January, of course.

Yours very truly,

G. A. ZIEL.

San Francisco, Dec. 10, 1909.

This is indeed a compliment and is deeply appreciated. The manager of The California Weekly has but one newspaper policy and that is, first, to gain the confidence of the public and then keep it, but we need help to gain that confidence. Those who do not know of the paper must somehow be informed in regard to it, and those who do know of it are the ones to tell them. One who has sent us a number of subscriptions said the other day: "I could send you one each day if I could keep it in mind." If all our friends would "keep it in mind" and send us one new subscriber a day each The California Weekly would soon come to be the greatest public opinion forming power on the Pacific Coast. Is not that a triumph for Right Things worth "keeping in mind?"

Editor The California Weekly.

I suppose that compulsory voting would be desirable, but hard to enforce.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Why Not Organize A New Political Party?

Editor California Weekly: Is not the issue for which the Lincoln-Roosevelt League was organized of sufficient importance to justify the organization of a state party, inviting all to join it, without regard to "race, color, or previous condition of servitude"? If not, why not? Is it reasonable to expect that the Republican party in California, without the active interest of the national administration (for which there is no good reason to hope), can wreck the machine that is now running so smoothly, or even disable any of the machinists in charge? I am not from Missouri, but I would like to be shown.

GEORGE W. STONE.

Santa Cruz, December 11, 1909.

Find Your Enemy, Then Lick Him

There is no use trying to dodge the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company. If a new party were formed some of Mr. Herrin's handy men would be the most zealous in its formation and would work themselves into the very amen corner of its councils and there stand for reforms so radical as to prove their own destruction. It is written into the constitution of the American mind that there can be but two political parties, a progressive and a conservative, and Big Business will be in both of them and use them both if it can, just as it will be in any other political party that promises to number more than a corporal's guard. The true policy is the one that Grant followed: "Find where your enemy is and fight him." Fight him as long as he stands up, if you can stand up. The enemy of free government in this state is the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company, and he is at present entrenched in the "organization" of the Republican party. He would be in the organization of the Democratic party if that party were in action, or in any new party that might be organized. When Populism was in flower the biggest men in it were on the Southern Pacific payroll. No, the fight is just where it ought to be—where the enemy is.

The Los Gatos Reform Movement

Los Gatos has been getting on without saloons for three years and is happy, contented and prosperous in its new policy. Its example is proving contagious in Santa Clara county. There is being held there today (Thursday) a convention of Santa Clara county people whose purpose it is to drive saloons out of all unincorporated towns in the county, which means the closing of all road houses and crossroads grogeries. The Board of Supervisors of the county can refuse to grant licenses if they want to, but, without a state local option law, they cannot be made to unless they want to. This convention is called to so work up public sentiment as to make the Supervisors of Santa Clara county want to refuse licenses outside of the incorporated cities. Inside the incorporated towns and cities the people have the power to handle the liquor traffic in any way they choose. This is a good movement and The California Weekly is with it. Drive the liquor selling into the towns and then compel its being sold in the way that will prove of the least injury to society, which is certain to sustain some injury under any possible system of dealing with the problem, whether by prohibiting, by licensing or what not.

The People Were Worked Better Than the Machine

The rise and fall of the voting machine job would, if properly written, constitute quite a chapter in the recent political history of California, and doubtless of other states as well. But the trouble is that the story will never be written as it should be, because those who know the inside facts will not write, and those who would be glad to write have no way of finding out. Yet several hundred thousand dollars of the taxpayers' money in this state went into the purchase of the machines, which are now mostly discarded by the communities which bought them. In Los Angeles, the other day, it was seriously proposed to sell for old junk, or at least for what they would bring, all of the machines which had been purchased there. In many instances the machines have been found impossible of use because they lacked the capacity to take all of the candidates and propositions submitted to the voters, and in several cities so many mistakes have been discovered that faith in the accurate operation of the devices has been shaken. Senator Frank Leavitt and Frank C. Jordan, the two politicians who have been most identified with the sale of the ballot machines, appear to have given the thing up as a bad job, and that is precisely what other people have come to consider the whole business, albeit in a different sense. Mechanical voting has not been made a success even mechanically, and the tests given it showed that in the more important matter of calling for the highest exercise of the voter's intelligence it fell behind the old way of voting. And, as before intimated, no one will now reveal how the boards of county supervisors were worked to buy the machines.

Voted Not So Unwisely As Very Insufficiently

While the Los Angeles election was a great success, as respects choice between candidates, the referendum, or initiative, part of it did not show up so well. Six ordinances or referred proposals were voted on, and 28,000 votes represented about the limit of votes cast on any of them, while for Mayor more than 37,000 votes were cast. Still, this was a larger showing than is usually made on similar tests, and as respects the number of voters who participated, the Los Angeles electorate cannot be harshly criticised. But an ordinance to prohibit dice throwing for money or cigars was beaten by 16,997 votes to 12,637, and this has proved something of a surprise. Two proposals to sell city property received majorities, but were defeated because they did not get majorities of two-thirds. The newspapers are now saying that some of the propositions were not understood by the voters, who erred through ignorance. This is another evidence that if the initiative and referendum are going to be operated successfully there must be more thorough education through discussion than heretofore, and that kind of education costs money which must be paid by somebody.

Infringement of Patent And Replevin of Property

Secretary Charles F. Curry, talking to a San Francisco reporter, said that he is not supported by either political machine, and then he explained that he referred to the old, or "regular" machine and to the new machine set up by the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League. He made it clear, however, that he expected to be supported by a very efficient personal machine, one made up of his friends in all parts of the state, who have enlisted and are now being organized. There are many precedents for a machine of this sort, and occasionally it proves a very good machine, indeed. The Curry machine should not be despised either by the Gillett followers or by anyone else. No other politician in this state can find the materials in greater abundance than Mr. Curry, whose many years in office have been one continuous preparation for the effort he is now making; that he knows how to put together the working parts and how to operate the machine after it is built no one questions. The one great doubt is whether the proprietors of the Southern Pacific machine cannot proceed against Curry for infringement of patent and at the same time bring a replevin suit and regain possession of most of the material which he is trying to get away with.

A Nice Little Graft That Need Not Be

The County Treasurer of San Mateo county has been in trouble with the grand jury because he has put several hundred thousand dollars of public funds on ordinary deposit with banks in his county and San Francisco, such deposits drawing no interest for the county, whereas he ought to have deposited the money on the security of state or municipal bonds, to draw 2 per cent interest, as required by the constitution and laws of the state, or else have kept the money in his own possession. The treasurer says that the San Mateo county banks will not accept the money on the terms the law prescribes and that the County Supervisors have provided him with no secure vault in which he could keep the funds. Although the excuses wear an appearance of plausibility, the situation is very like that which exists in a number of other county counties where the banks have long been enjoying the free use of the taxpayers' money in violation of the laws and do not propose to submit to the requirements of the new law if they can avoid doing so. In most of these counties the banks have been furnishing the treasurer's bond as the consideration for him to violate the law. While a majority of bankers favored the enactment of the state's present deposit law, which makes the deposit of public funds safe and profitable, there were here and there nests of banks which combined to make the law inoperative in their particular counties. That their success in doing so usually means the commission of felony by the county treasurer does not disturb the equanimity of this kind of banker. Of course, with the right kind of county treasurer the game cannot be played, and will not even be attempted, because when the local bankers refuse to take the money on the terms prescribed by law it is ordinarily easy to deposit it in banks out of the county, and that will bring the local bankers on the run.

He Only Wants to Stay Until He Finishes Up

The editor of the Sacramento Sunday News holds a job by grace of Governor Gillett and is believed to be pretty close up. Upon his authority it is given out that Governor Gillett does not really care to be governor any longer, so far as he is himself concerned, but he feels that in duty to the state he ought to hold onto his job until he finishes up all the good things he has in mind for the state, including, of course, the expenditure of $18,000,000 in road building, which he hopes the people will commission him to expend. The Governor's frame of mind is not unlike that of the western land grabber who only wanted all that "jined" him. He might have so much unfinished business on hand four years from now as to make it desirable to stay four years longer. Every governor California ever had felt that way, but no governor California ever had had a chance to finish up. Governor Gillett is nearer to his own finish than to finishing up.

A Great Conspiracy Nicely Framed Up

The aforementioned inside viewer has it all framed up that the Democrats are to register as Republicans this year, for the purpose of helping the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republicans to nominate their kind of men for office on condition that, if that scheme fails, the Lincoln-Roosevelters will desert the Republican party as a body and help elect the Democratic ticket. To deny so absurd a charge would be a waste of breath, and yet it is in the wind that party lines are to lie lightly on the shoulders of the thoughtful citizen this year. The Herrin push will bolt any good, progressive, free-minded, clean-cut insurgent Republicans whom the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican Leaguers may succeed in nominating, if there be a programmer of any party to whom they can throw their votes, and there are thousands of free Republicans who will support a free Democrat rather than a Republican bondservant to the Southern Pacific Political Bureau. It would be well for the programmers to bear in mind that Gillett was elected by a plurality of only 8242, that his total vote lacked nearly 60,000 of being a majority, and the people were not stirred up against corporate domination then as they are now. The day for nominating and electing a yellow dog to office, just because he represents a party, is pretty well done with in California. The people may prefer a yellow dog to a reputable man, but if so they will vote for him because he is yellow and not because of the party name on his collar.

First Find the Cause, Then Apply the Cure

Our friends, the northern fruit growers, are much exercised over the high rates which they have to pay on deciduous fruit shipments to Eastern markets and over the discriminations against their business as compared with shipping citrus fruits. Has it occurred to any of them that our railroads have not only been a law unto themselves but unto the fruit growers, too? They have prevented legislation against discrimination in this state, prevented the election of a State Railroad Commission that would deal with such problems as confront the fruit growers and co-operate with the interstate commerce commission for the solving of these difficulties. The cause of their misfortunes is railroad domination of the government of this state, and the remedy is the freeing of the state from that domination and control. With the help of the deciduous fruit growers this may be done next year. They will find a chance to take hold if they want to.

Made Monkeys Of Them All

The strained relations between San Francisco and San Diego touching the proposed Panama Pacific Exposition for 1915 recall to the mind of The Watchman the strenuous days when the adjournment of the legislature for 1907 was at hand and Governor Gillett had in his keeping Eddie Wolfe's buncombe bill appropriating either two millions or three millions of dollars, it does not matter which, in aid of San Francisco's exposition ambitions. The froth on the San Francisco mug was much exercised over the fate of that measure. It looked like a big lot of money to let escape. Mr. Herrin got busy telegraphing to everybody he could think of to telegraph to Governor Gillett to sign that bill. Telegrams poured in by the hundred and were tossed into a barrel big enough to hold them. The bill was not signed. Gillett had demonstrated his independence of Herrin to the satisfaction of every man Herrin could reach. But he could not have signed that bill if he had wanted to ever so much. The state's finances simply would not permit it. No one knew this better than W. F. Herrin. The bill could not have been passed if it had not been known beforehand that it would not be signed. A few days after adjournment word was passed down the line that Mr. Harriman had said "no" from the first. Monkeys had been made of the whole telegraphing caboodle, and Governor Gillett's cheaply made reputation for independence did not last until hot weather.

If the Hayes Brothers Would Only Stay Put

The San Jose Mercury has come out solemnly for political emancipation from corporation domination. The Mercury is the property and spokesman of the Hayes brothers, "Red" and "Black," respectively, two gentlemen of unimpeachable personal character, who are political unstable equilibriums. They are as uncertain in the game of politics as the Heathen Chinee is in a game of draw poker. They don't stay put. "Red" Hayes has been made head of the insurgent forces in the House of Representatives at Washington. The Watchman wishes from the bottom of his heart that he could feel that the Aurora Borealis Hayes could not be pulled down if Old Joe Cannon were to hand him out a Good Thing in the way of political recognition, but he can't be sure of it. As for the Hayes of sable hue

BREAKING DOWN OF OLD ECONOMIC "LAWS" UNDER GROWING SENSE OF SOCIAL UNITY.

By WILLIAM KENT.

I remember well the clear, logical deductions that were taught me some twenty-five years ago, as representing economic laws, for I was carefully brought up in the old Laissez-Faire School of political economy. That school, founded by Adam Smith, was closely allied to the intensely materialistic school of science that grew up in the last half of the last century, and of which Herbert Spencer was the leader. It taught doctrines entirely satisfactory to its devotees until a change of mental atmosphere and new psychological knowledge made its adherents somewhat uneasy, and forced them to modify their views, while without doubt the real discoveries of the time will always be of the highest value.

So-Called "Economic Laws."

That Laissez-Faire School deduced and formulated what were called certain "Economic Laws." If it had put them forth as economic suggestions there would have been less that it is necessary to forget. A natural law is a stubborn, refractory thing that once broken cannot be mended. We learned, for instance, that Free Trade was the only possible commercial scheme. But whenever an out-and-out free-trader got into an argument with an out-and-out protectionist, the discussion was bound to break up in a row without either party getting new light. The reason for this was and is that protection represents a theory based on national boundaries and the possibility of international disturbances, which items have, unfortunately, not yet been eliminated, whereas free-trade is based on the hypothesis of a world federation, and an entire lack of the necessity of making individual nations self-sufficient and self-sustaining. The trend and tendency of present honest and disinterested thought is all toward frictionless and unswerving free trade. In other words, it is a tendency away from international anarchism and war toward international federation and peace. The abuses of protection and the infinite corruption of tariff schedules are hastening the drift.

The "Law" of Supply and Demand.

Again: We were laboriously taught the inexorable law of Supply and Demand, a law supposed to be so perfect and far reaching that it could be carried to its fullest extent even into the field of labor. If the coal miner of Pennsylvania were dissatisfied with his wages, let him migrate to Kansas and raise wheat. Petty details such as railroad fares and ignorance of farming did not for a moment stand in the way of the smug self-satisfaction of this doctrine. The possibility of Orientalising the Pacific Coast was also a mere bagatelle. The cheapest production was what was wanted regardless of any other social element.

The rise of labor unionism, which has proven beneficial to millions of our fellow citizens, the growth of consumers leagues which insist that competition or combinations shall not crush the toiler, these come in to mock the perfect law of Supply and Demand, although as a suggestion or a sort of working hypothesis it has, of course, an immense value.

The trusts, whether they owe their crushing power to the tariff or to monopolies natural or artificial, compel modifications of this so-called law.

"Freedom of Contract."

Under the law of Supply and Demand we were taught that there was such a thing, and a sacred thing, known as Freedom of Contract, which is absolutely opposed to labor unionism and all forms of collective bargaining. Freedom of Contract means that a man has a right to buy labor in the cheapest market and another man has a right to sell his labor for as little as he may be willing to accept. This sounds extremely well, but there can be no real Freedom of Contract between a rich man or a corporation with a surplus, and individuals who, with their families, may be but a short distance from starvation. If two shipwrecked persons land on a desert island, and the biggest and strongest man obtains the provisions, he can require of his smaller fellow such service as he may desire at a pittance, expressed in terms of food.

Another dictum that we learned was that competition would regulate prices. Wherever combinations and trusts exist they have, by eliminating competition, nullified this dictum and now we are forced to throw overboard some more of the Laissez-Faire doctrine in order to regulate these combinations. We have further found that in really competitive industries, which require a minimum capital and employ the newest arrived and most ignorant alien labor, as for instance in the manufacture of cheap clothing, competition results in grinding the faces of the poor to a worse extent than even the combinations of capital. Society must here step in to regulate even this supposedly self-regulating scheme of competition.

The Malthusian Doctrine.

As another instance, we were taught that there was a law known as the Malthusian Doctrine, that "population tends to increase up to the supporting power of the land on a given stage of the arts and with a given standard of living." And yet France, the most frugal and probably the most uniformly prosperous country in the world, is suffering from a decreasing population.

I mention a few of these so-called "laws" merely to show the fallacy of trying to make something easy and clear out of the everlasting complexity of human relationship. The attempt to create a mathematical, cold-blooded, unmoral system of economics has been a dismal failure. The clear thinking of the Laissez-Faire School has left a legacy of great value to its successors and assigns. But with changing conditions the supposedly immutable laws have been badly mauled and generally knocked out.

Popular orators, and cartoonists full of bathos, are everlastingly fond of portraying the amicable relations that should exist between capital and labor. You all remember the sleek, well-fed business man grasping the horny hand of the son of toil, as typifying the ideal status. If the business man aforesaid represented organizing ability and commercial intelligence, and were walking side by side with the son of toil aforesaid, the cartoon would more easily express the correct view.

To say that capital must be recognized in our present scheme of things is undoubtedly true. But when we try to find out what capital is, how large should be its proportion of reward, and what things may be appropriately capitalized, we find the problem infinitely complex.

The Example of Carnegie.

For example: It is probable that in the early nineties Andrew Carnegie, under a protective tariff, and with the right to import cheap labor, had, through his hold on the bounties of nature in the coal and iron deposits, coupled with great organizing ability, amassed a modest fortune of probably seven million dollars. If we admit that the capital thus accumulated was properly obtained and subject to be recognized as against the claims of labor and of the consumer what shall we say of subsequent proceedings? We find that within a few years he had so thoroughly fortified himself with the natural resources of coal and iron, to say nothing of the tariff barricade at his front, and numerous combinations of a monopolistic nature at his rear, as to be able, from his impregnable position, to demand recognition for some four or five hundred millions of capital as set over against the claims of labor and the rights of the consumer. That any one man, however industrious, could have rendered himself so numerous in bargaining, in such a short time, is beyond human credulity. Through monopoly, through the privilege of tariff, and especially through the acquisition of a tremendous lot of natural resources, which ought to have remained the property of all the people, and further, through the ability to tax consumers under relative monopoly, he had built up a fortune which must be paid out of the labor of this generation and many generations succeeding.

And yet we cannot criticize the personal morals of Andrew Carnegie in so far as he merely accepted privileges which a near-sighted nation was willing he should have. In a large sense the privileges under which he gained his wealth were unsocial and unnecessary. As a natural organizer and leader of men, working under a less profligate system, he would have been well satisfied with a modest competence.

The private ownership of our timberlands, entirely apart from the frauds by which many of these lands have been acquired, exhibits another phase of this anti-social tendency. The private owner needs the money, and is privileged to cut the timber as wastefully as he sees fit, because it is his. "Posterity be damned. Posterity has never done anything for him." This, too, is anti-social.

The Conservation Policy.

The whole conservation movement is a revulsion from individual and pioneer conditions and traditions, tending toward a recognition of society. If the word does not shock you too much, it is essentially socialistic.

Reverting for a moment to the cartoonists' view of co-operation between capital and labor, we find that under the old Laissez-Faire doctrine of the one essential, that of cheapening product, there is a tremendous loss not only of human happiness, but also of human life. Self-interest cannot be trusted to conserve the well being of the "other fellow." I once heard the president of a railroad discussing with the superintendent the question as to whether it was cheaper to pay for mangled switchmen or for airbrakes. The recent coal mine horror in Illinois shows a sort of co-operation between capital and labor which strongly resembles the co-operation between the Poleseeker and his teams of dogs. You will find in the more or less truthful narrative that on the return of the ambitious individual the dogs were much less numerous than when they started out. This might have been good for the Poleseeker, but it was rather rough on the dogs.

Niagara and Yosemite.

There has been a tremendous outcry in this country over the utilization of Niagara Falls for power purposes. The main question to be asked is whether the power that could be generated at Niagara Falls shall be used to create great individual fortunes, or to lighten the burdens of the overworked. If that power could be so used as to reduce the strain of the sweat shops and to decrease the cost of the necessities of life, it would seem that the scenic features could well be dispensed with. But at the present time such grants have not been working in that direction.

In the same way the question of the utilization of part of the Yosemite National Park for water supply brings up the query: "Is this the only feasible supply for San Francisco and the adjoining territory?" For if San Francisco and the neighboring cities could obtain a clean and adequate supply elsewhere, even at a considerably greater cost, I should be opposed to invading a peoples' playground. If, as is claimed, this is the only adequate source left, the greater good to the greater number would certainly call for the utilization of these waters for a great and growing community. On the other hand, if the question were up as to turning over any portion of this playground or the waters therefrom, to an uncontrolled, money-making concern, it would be no less than a crime to permit the transfer, and yet such crimes are altogether too common. They are not necessarily the result of wickedness of heart, but merely a survival of the pioneer traditions which carry with them too much individualism for present conditions.

Before long a great book will be written by some great scholar, on the anti-social nature of waste. This book must start out with a view to the interests of society, rather than the status of the isolated individual. Just as long as the notion prevails that man may do with his own as he sees fit, with no particular analysis of ownership, and just as long as "his own" is apt to be inordinately exaggerated, the productive world will toil unduly to support not only the drones, but also those active persons who are rendering service not socially useful.

Anti-Social Nature of Waste.

The labor expended in unnecessary private attendance and in producing useless luxury represents waste no less than do the unproductive armies and navies of the world. An instance, not to my knowledge heretofore brought up as constituting a tremendous economic waste, is found in present day gold mining. All mining of precious metals for use as currency would be unnecessary waste if people were only honest and did not need a redeeming medium on account of their distrust of each other. But even granting that the precious metals are now necessary for currency, we are met with this condition: Practically all authorities agree that recent production of gold has been so great as to depreciate its value. This is the chief reason for the rise in the cost of living. Now this rise in the cost of living unsettles the levels of the world, and constantly brings up new difficulties to be settled by strikes or to remain unsettled, depending on whether the sufferers are organized or not.

It therefore follows that present gold production is an evil, and that those who are working in the gold mines are non-producers in an economic sense; that their support must be provided out of productive industry; that the forests used for timbers are wasted; and that the tools and cars, the stamps, the acids, and all other things that go to the production of gold might better be used in some other way.

Economic waste is thus to be sought in unsuspected by-ways, as well as in the obvious forms of war and luxury, and in the unnecessary destruction of natural resources. It is wasteful for the rich to hire useless servants; it is wasteful by granting of alms to pauperize people that might be productive. And wherever we follow waste we find that it is anti-social and that it means a useless burden on the productive community. Economic morality must become social morality before it is of much consequence. And social morality must be cultivated that the world may become more liveable.

Modern Ten Commandments.

The Stoic doctrine of individual self-respect would be entirely adequate if the premises upon which self-respect is to be based were laid in a social sense. Without such foundation self-respect and conscience are uncertain guides. The old Hebrew Commandments grew out of long experience of society. The doctrine of self-respect as taught by the Stoics, had in it nothing that would prevent the killing of another or of oneself, under provocation. And yet such killing we know to be unjustifiable unless the social relationships are carefully considered. The hope of the future is that the social sense may more and more become conventional, so that men will deem it as anarchistic and as out of the question to buy legislation, a jury or a judge, or to employ lawyers to destroy just relations between men, as they would to throw dynamite or to murder those whom they wish to rob or who do not meet with their approbation.

Compulsory voting would demand compulsory registration, both of voters and of those not entitled to vote, which might not be a bad thing to have anyway. All voters reported not voting by the officers of election after every election could be summoned to appear in court and explain why they failed to vote, and to state whether they were kept away by order of any employer or by any other duress. This loss of time would amount to as much as would be saved by not going to the polls and would go far toward bringing the voter out.

Respectfully,

HARRY POLSLEY.

Red Bluff, Dec. 7, 1909.

There is no use of talking of a democracy unless the constituent elements in that democracy perform the duties of citizenship. Any form of democracy that does not involve the discharging of the duties of an elector will soon become, what our government is fast becoming, a plutocratic oligarchy in fact whatever it may pretend to be in theory. The Republic of Venice was an oligarchy for a thousand years after it had ceased to be a republic in anything but name. It is up to those who believe in a government of the people to devise some way of entreating, persuading or compelling the fulfillment of the duties of citizenship on the part of every person who holds the right of citizenship. The task will not be easy but it must somehow be performed if free government is not to pass from the earth. There is not to-day another civilized government under the sun marching toward a purse-proud plutocracy as fast and as straight as this government is marching.

Post and Montgomery Sts.

I CAN see Melvin Dunbar sitting at the third desk in front of me, for he was short of stature, absorbed in his books, unmindful of the thousand distracting occurrences of the school room, "studying for the presidency," as we boys used to say.

That was more than half a century ago.

His hair was tawny white, long, thick and straight and it had a way of tumbling down upon his face making it necessary for him, with toss of head and stroke of hand, to restore it to its place again, and so maintaining a sort of perpetual motion all day long. His head was broad at the temples, forehead not high, chin heavy and cheeks spare. He was not, as I remember, a favorite with his fellows; was too quiet by half and entered but coldly into their sports if at all. And yet to those who sought his company he could be more than duly gracious. He could give and take like other boys within a certain limit but the bound o'erstepped he became as implacable as a peccary.

Not being like other boys, ranking far above the rest of us in attainment, teachers, pupils and village folks all agreed that Melvin Dunbar must have been fashioned for some providential purpose. Each felt, too, that he was part custodian of this budding genius and in duty bound to see that no harm befell before his fruiting time.

So long as Melvin's widowed mother lived there was nothing lacking in his social atmosphere. She was a little stooped and wrinkled home-body, with large eyes, a jutting forehead and hair smoothed down over corpse-like temples. People called her queer. If she had other characteristics I know not, for I have given the sum total of her image as it abides with me now save that she was devout beyond all things.

But when the little mother was really gone, for people never seemed to think that she would sometime die, the son was seized with a great unrest and people shook their heads because of conduct which, before, had always been exemplary.

It was at the height of this eccentricity that Mollie Ketcham bore down upon him, making her conquest sure before the village match-makers could hoist the danger signal.

Mollie was a dashing, buxom woman, dark, with shaggy eyebrows which met and she had been "talked about." How she had made up to the solitary, bashful fellow no one could conjecture, but as Melvin was in receipt of a good salary and had a pretty home the wherefore of her wooing was not so difficult to understand as the manner of it.

The only fruit of this union was Katherine, and in her Melvin found all of comfort life had for him. She was a wayward, tumultuous thing even in infancy, headstrong and passionate, and in the irregular ruggedness of her features was found small promise of coming comeliness. I have known the father to stand for hours, silent as an apparition, watching Katherine's baby pranks, and in obedience to her importunity, to join in her sports right heartily, though awkwardly enough it must be confessed.

To his daughter's youthful training Melvin gave his most studious attention, but her education was not such as other girls received. Whatever there was of passion in her nature or in his was suffered to find expression in music alone, and when at such amateur concerts as we were wont to have in town, Melvin and his daughter bore a part with harp and violin, there was such ecstasy of enjoyment on the part of those who heard as humbled them almost to point of weeping—father and daughter drinking deepest and feeling keenest of all.

Melvin Dunbar lived for Katherine and, by way of reward for seventeen years of devotion, she gladdened his fading sight and solaced his days of pain, growing day by day more lovely and more loveable until she stood before him in luxurious womanhood, tender, innocent, sweet, but all untutored of the world and with a head full of vain imaginings. Thus he, dying, left her.

Great was Katherine's need when Melvin was gone of a mother's care and trustful confidence, but instead she was plotted against deceitfully. Not that Mollie, graceless though she was, would have been privy to her child's undoing, but she was an adventuress and poor, and Katherine, accomplished, young and beautiful, appeared in her ambitious mother's eyes a potent sesame to fortune and Mollie did not scruple to stake her child's well-being upon the issue of an adventure. Sales of property were speedily made, trunks packed and apartments taken at an eastern resort of pleasure.

Little attempt was made to introduce Katherine into the full swim of society, but, attired simply and tastefully, it was contrived to have her charms of face and form displayed when and where she would awaken liveliest interest. It was a pretty fair for Katherine, the realization and more than realization of her fondest dreams, and she drank of pleasure deep and strong.

One whole year went by and then another, but nothing came of all this angling. The pretty bait attracted well enough anything but goldfish. Matters were becoming desperate, for Mollie's bank account was running low, when William Harper came upon the field.

Harper was a handsome fellow, college bred and polished. Inheriting a fortune he had squandered it at the gaming table, yet not without having learned what the nether world had to teach of cunning and deceit, for, with no other capital than quick eyes and wits and deft fingers, he contrived to live luxuriously and to retain the reputation of being rich. An adventurer by profession, he did not hesitate to bear a part in any intrigue promising enough of difficulty to give interest to the enterprise.

And so it came about that William Harper wooed and won, and left in direst desolation, Katherine Dunbar, more sinned against than sinning, yet sinning.

I saw Harper cross the street one morning and enter a billiard hall. There was a loud guffaw within and through the open window I heard a voice cry out, "Hello, Billy! How's yer kid? Oh! we're onto your secret. What's the matter with drinking to the youngster's health, eh?"

There were sounds of clicking billiard balls, of cues dropping into racks, and half a score of roisterers, having fallen into line behind Harper, each resting his hands upon the shoulders of the one before, went trooping across the hallway to an adjacent bar marking time with their feet and whistling the "Dead March In Saul."

Upon reaching my office I took up a morning paper issued at an adjacent city not many hours before, and in running my eyes over its columns, they fell upon the following:

"A Forlorn Mother.

"As officer Fagley was nearing the end of his beat at a late hour last night his attention was arrested by convulsive sobbing and cries of pain issuing from the darkened hallway of a business house, and upon entering, found a young woman prostrate upon the floor in agony of approaching motherhood. An ambulance was hastily called and the sufferer conveyed to the city hospital where, an hour later, she gave birth to a male child. The young mother, who is very handsome, gave the name of Sadie Ellis, but while asleep the matron found upon her bosom a tiny golden locket containing the likeness of a middle-aged man and the graven words, 'To Katherine, from father.'"

It was plain enough to me now. Two hours later, accompanied by my wife, I was on my way to the city. I saw Harper meantime and pleaded with him to go at once and make a manly and lawful reparation for his fault, but he tossed his head loftily, laughed lightly and turning upon his heel, walked away. "One cannot marry every silly fool he meets, you know," he said.

We provided a home for Katherine and found employment for her when she should become strong enough and care to earn her livelihood. She was calm, spoke infrequently, shed no tears and gave way to no exhibitions of weak despair, and much of the time seemed wrapped in all-absorbing meditation.

We heard from Katherine by letter occasionally for a time but by and by her letters ceased and when I went to ascertain the cause, I found that she and her child had gone no one knew where.

It was long after this that I saw Harper alight from his carriage and move toward the staircase of our chief hotel. He had taken no more than a step or two when he was confronted by a woman in black leading a little boy in kilts. She threw back her veil. It was Katherine.

"William," she said, her left arm upraised to stay his steps, "William, I have come to you for justice. I found that you were not free to marry me as you promised to do, but now I have set you free. I sought your deserted wife and told her all, and in pity for me and my child she has divorced you. Here is a copy of the decree. Read that you may know that what I say is true."

Harper caught the document and eagerly scanned its stiff and formal pages, his face lighting up with pleasure.

"Why, my dear, you have been to a deal of trouble and I will gladly repay you all this document cost and more. What did you say the charges were?" and he thrust his hand into his pocket as if to draw his purse.

"William Harper!" Katherine exclaimed, and her eyes began to kindle dangerously. "I come to you not for money but for some small share of justice. I ask you, now that you can, to give our pretty boy a name that when he shall grow to be a man he may have a name among men."

She had spoken deliberately until now but her mother's heart got the better of her self-control and, catching up her child, she held him before his father's face. Her words came swiftly now and she rushed on pantingly.

"See, William! Isn't he pretty? Isn't he sweet? And he is yours as well as mine, William, yours and mine. Oh! you will, won't you, William? You cannot refuse. You surely cannot. You need not live with us or ever see us if you do not wish to. I can care for him and for me. All we wish is a name, William, a name for him and for me."

"I fear you do me too much honor, madam," he said bowing low, "in attributing the paternity of so bright and interesting a child to me, and yet the little fellow does seem to have possessed himself of my honest, blue eyes, somehow."

While Harper was speaking the light fled out of Katherine's face and she suffered the child to slip from her arms and stand at her feet.

"You are quite right though as to the name," Harper continued, "quite right as to the name. A man really does need a name. How would Ebenezer do for a given name? I have always been partial to Ebenezer, and for a surname, why, there is the much abused but highly honorable name of Smith. What would be wrong with calling the young gentleman Ebenezer Smith?"

"Stop!" she cried, "stop! I say. You have done me the greatest wrong that man can do woman. You are about to inflict upon this child the greatest wrong that father can inflict upon son. That which I ask is not much, but if you refuse it is at your peril."

"If you were only disposed to be a little more reasonable, Katherine," he said, querulously, "I might do something worth the while for you and the child; but as for matrimony, really now, having been injudicious enough to unite myself to one specimen of feminine unwisdom, and gotten nicely out of it, thanks to you, I must be excused from doing the like again. I really must, but think the matter over and if I can serve you any other way—any other way, remember," and he stepped lightly by her and bounded up the stair.

Quicker than thought, almost, Katherine drew a pistol from beneath her shawl and a bullet went crashing through Harper's face from cheek to cheek. A second bullet would have followed the first but strong arms and hands prevented and a worthless life was saved.

Katherine was taken into custody and it became my duty to appear in court for her defense. As the shooting was unquestioned I saw small hope of preventing her spending a term in prison, but to my relief Harper failed to prosecute, disappeared in fact, and her case was dismissed upon motion of the prosecuting attorney.

When told that she was free Katherine bowed, and, as I supposed, passed into an anteroom to avoid the multitude and await my coming, but when I went to look for her to take her to my home she was gone. I sought her everywhere and many joined in the search, but though we spared no effort to seek her out, even going so far as to drag the river's bed, we found no trace of Katherine or her child.

("Political Table Talk"—Concluded.)

(now fast approaching the antipodal ermine), it is an open secret that he has haunted Mr. Herrin's back door for years asking for a cold handout in the shape of the gubernatorial nomination for governor of California. Has hope deferred made the heart seasick? And if so, has it experienced relief in the usual way? The Hayes brothers must not feel injured if the forces of reform exact a probationary service before admitting them into the inner temple of the council chamber. They may be doing nothing more than hazarding a guess as to the set of the 1910 political wind.

UP AND DOWN THE STATE.

The San Bernardino Sun has issued a sixty-four-page illustrated edition which is calculated to make both old and young, to say nothing of those between, "sit up and take notice." Besides containing much literature of a holiday nature, it carries a fund of valuable information concerning San Bernardino and the good country surrounding it.

Four or five inches of snow fell in Corning during the storm of last week, on Friday and Saturday. Such a fall is without precedent there.

Joseph A. Norvel, editor of the Merced Express for more than a quarter of a century, died on the fifth instant.

Several samples of topaz and hyacinth (the mineral) have been found in the vicinity of Porterville.

The club women of Modesto are taking steps looking to the enforcement of the anti-expectorator ordinance in that city.

The Sacramento Valley Irrigation company has sold 21,566 acres of land in Glenn county to fifteen purchasers for $2,321,018.

Southern Pacific records show that Tulare has fully doubled the volume of its business since the irrigation bonds were burned in 1903.

Earl Summers, a twenty-year-old Colusa boy, was instantly killed, last week, by coming in contact with a live wire in the basement of his home.

From the Orcutt section of the Santa Maria oil fields about ten million barrels of high-gravity oil have been taken during the present year.

It is announced that funds have been secured for the construction of a line of railroad from Coaldale, Nevada, to a junction with the Bodie railroad in Mono county.

Something or other must be a little binding over in Mono county. The last issue of the Bodie Miner was printed on colored wrapping paper.

The town of Orosi, in Tulare county, was flooded, during the rains of last week, by water from Sand creek.

AN EPOCH AT MILLS COLLEGE.

A good many people still doubt the wisdom of coeducation in colleges. A great many more doubt the quality of the higher education dispensed in sectarian colleges. It has been the great achievement of Mills College to supply a high grade of education for women that falls on neither horn of this dilemma. More than ten thousand girls have received a liberal education, apart from any distracting influence that may abide in the association with male students. And this education, though not sectarian, has been distinctly Christian.

Mrs. Susan I. Mills was peculiarly endowed and equipped for the management of such a college. Born of a sturdy Puritan stock, educated at Mt. Holyoke Seminary under the luminous mind of Mary Lyon, trained to missionary labors in India, and strengthened by the influence of a singularly fortunate marriage union with a man of similar ideals and force of character, she has grown steadily in moral purpose and educational efficiency until, in her eighty-fourth year, when she relinquished the presidency of Mills College last May, she has built up a monumental institution that is the only one of its kind west of the Rockies and one of the foremost of its kind in the world.

The graduates of Mills College are profoundly loyal to it. The oldest of them still feel the impress of its influence and are warmed by the recollection of happy days spent in scholastic pursuits that were always made intimate and quickened by the atmosphere of home life. Mrs. Mills insisted upon character more than upon scholarship. Not that scholarship was allowed to be slighted, but that the womanly virtues were put at their proper higher valuation.

Now that Mrs. Mills has laid down the executive direction of the college, she leaves it a centre of culture where forty years ago was a cow pasture; a monumental pile of buildings where there were only a few trees; a smoothly working organization which will long continue its good offices for the daughters of the state and which will perpetuate the remembrance of her labors, her sacrifices, her fidelity and courage.

Her successor in the office of president is Miss Luella Clay Carson, A. M., Professor of Rhetoric and English, and Dean of Women in the University of Oregon. Miss Carson comes to California with the highest reputation for efficiency and for winsomeness of personality. Mills College will not alone be the beneficiary of her administration, for the college is now a state institution, and the state at large will be directly influenced by her work.

Editor The California Weekly.

Dear Sir:—I enclose, herewith, from more subscribers. If your readers would only realize the possibilities of The California Weekly, I think it would soon have the largest circulation of any weekly in the West.

I have had splendid success in securing subscribers for it. My plan is to mention the matter to some acquaintance whom I know to be interested in good government, telling him that this paper has been financed by some two hundred citizens who have contributed to a fund with the idea of providing one paper to which the people of this state can look for a fair and intelligent discussion of the questions of the day. The hearer is most always interested, and I, almost invariably, secure a subscription when I explain that the paper is not a money-making institution, but has been established by a number of citizens purely as an instrument for righting the wrongs of the times.

Would suggest that you urge the readers of the Weekly to get busy and roll up a large subscription list, without which the paper can never accomplish its mission.

Sincerely yours,

LEO S. ROBINSON.

Alameda, Dec. 14, 1909.

If all the readers of The California Weekly took as active and as unselfish an interest in the success of the paper as Mr. Robinson has done from the first, it would soon become one of the great periodicals of the country. All it requires is to be talked up in a hearty, friendly way as opportunity offers. A word from a disinterested friend counts for more than a whole chapter from an agent.

Editor The California Weekly.

The idea that men register so that they can vote if they want to seems to me to be on right grounds. The reason for not voting, after registering, is often trivial. As you ask for ideas, how does this strike you? A man registers so that he can vote if he wants to; now, if he fail to vote at any election, and if that failure to vote were to take away his right to vote at the next election, would he not go to the trouble of voting at the, to him, unimportant election in order that he may vote at a more important election if he should want to? I think he would.

This is only extending the idea of one of your correspondents.

Sincerely yours,

C. B.

Oakland, Cal., Dec. 13, 1909.

The foregoing strikes us as being a very sane conclusion. If the penalty for failure to vote at a primary election, for instance, were the loss of the right to vote at the ensuing general election, a full vote would be gotten out at the primary and, of the two, the primary election may easily prove to be the more important to the public welfare. We are of the opinion that the success of compulsory voting will not have to depend on the severity of the compulsion, but only upon its automatic and equal operation. The penalty above suggested could easily be made automatic in operation and it is certainly not a severe or undeserved penalty.

FROM "SUNRISE."

By Sidney Lanier.

The tide's at full; the marsh with flooded streams

Glimmers, a limpid labyrinth of dreams;

Each winding creek in grave entrancement lies

A rhapsody of morning stars. The skies

Shine scant with one forked galaxy.

The marsh brags ten; looped on his breast they lie.

O, what if a sound should be made!

But no, it is made: List! somewhere—mystery, where?

In the leaves? in the air?

In my heart? is a motion made.

'Tis a motion of dawn, like a flicker of shade on shade.

In the leaves 'tis palpable: low, multitudinous stirring

Upwinds through the woods; the little ones, softly conferring.

Have settled my lord's to be looked for; so they are still;

But the air and my heart and the earth are a thrill,—

And look where the wild duck sails round the bend of the river,—

And look where a passionate shiver

Expectant is bending the blades

Of the marsh grass in serial shimmers and shades,—

And invisible wings, fast fleeting, fast fleeting.

Are beating

The dark over head as my heart beats; and steady and free

Is the ebb tide flowing from marsh to sea— (Run home, little streams,

With your lapfuls of stars and dreams)—

And a sailor unseen is hoisting a peak.

For list, down the inshore curve of the creek, How merrily flutters the sail—

And lo, in the east! Will the east unveil?

The east is unveiled, the east hath confessed A flush: 'tis dead, 'tis alive, 'tis dead, ere the west

Was aware of it; nay, 'tis abiding, 'tis unwithdrawn:

Have a care, sweet heaven! 'Tis dawn.

THE LEADING NEW ENGLAND JOURNAL

A college professor writes to The Republican: "In the three months during which I have been receiving The Weekly Republican I have been so impressed with its vigor, fairness and worth that it seems to me folly not to keep it coming."

A reader in Illinois writes: "The Weekly Republican certainly is different from all newspapers I have ever taken, and I think far superior."

These tributes, selected from hundreds of letters received during the past year, are suggestive of the satisfaction which subscribers to The Weekly Republican derive from their favorite newspaper.

This famous independent New England journal, established in 1824 by Samuel Bowles, appeals strongly to a thoughtful, intelligent class of readers. Its able, vigorous editorials are quoted all over the country, and cover every range of human interest.

The complete news service, local and general, of The Daily and Sunday Republican is drawn on for the Weekly's record of the world's events, while special departments in charge of experts treat of literature, art, music and the drama, science and invention, education, the interests of women, recreation and out-door sports, progressive agriculture and forestry. Travel sketches, handsomely illustrated, and original stories add to the interest and charm of this high-class home paper.

The subscription rates are, for The Weekly $1 a year, Daily $8, Sunday $2.

Specimen Copies of either Edition sent free on application. The Weekly Republican will be sent free for one month to any one who wishes to try it.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The Poll Tax.

"Poll," of course, means "head," and the poll tax is a head tax, but not all heads are taxed. The Constitution of California declares that, "The legislature shall provide for the levy and collection of an annual poll tax, of not less than two dollars, on every male inhabitant of this state over twenty-one and under sixty years of age, except paupers, idiots, insane persons and Indians not taxed."

The legislature complied with the constitution and enacted a poll tax law which it has been the good pleasure of many thousands of propertyless men studiously to evade paying, and they have been abetted in this by a press that has manifested a demagogic sympathy for the propertyless man upon whom the law bears so hard as to demand the payment of two dollars per year for the benefit of the school fund. It is not definitely known to the writer to what extent the payment of this tax is evaded, but it may not be a bad guess to say 20 per cent. There are now not far from half a million registered voters in the state. A percentage of these would be exempt from the tax on account of being sixty years of age or upward. Poll taxes are collected on about 300,000 heads or to the amount of $600,000. It is within bounds to say that if all paid who should pay the public school fund would be richer by $150,000 to $200,000 a year.

In olden times the poll tax was levied upon aliens living in a country and requiring its protection, but owning no property that could be taxed. It was not, even in those days, an unjust tax or based on a wrong principle, as it is not now.

In a number of southern states of this union, if not all of them, the payment of the poll tax is required before anyone can vote, and it ought to be so in all states, although the purpose of it, in the states named, mainly was to shut out the negro vote. Being less desirous of voting than of holding on to their dollars, it was believed a great portion of the blacks would lose their franchise. It was so, but, what was not counted on as being equally true, a large percentage of white voters also held on to their dollars and lost their votes. It may be doubted if the non-participation of the non-paying voters, white and black, proved to be detrimental to the political best interests of these states.

Many states have road poll taxes. California had such a tax until within a few years, the amount going into the road fund of each county or into the street fund of each town, but the law imposing this tax was repealed. In some states the poll tax goes to the road fund and not to the schools, and there are some states that do not impose any poll tax at all, holding that the man who has nothing should pay nothing, even in aid of the school fund.

The writer of this believes that to be a mistaken policy. We should beware how we make mendicants of men. There is nothing easier, nothing more disastrous. To be an elector is something worth while of itself. Let him who has property pay for the protection of that property in proportion to the amount of property he has to be protected. If, for other purposes than the protection of property, additional revenues are needed, let something more be raised in proportion to ability to pay, but at the ballot box manhood should stand shoulder to shoulder merely as men, one man paying as another pays, and the whole going into the school fund as a thank offering for having been born a man. Here the propertyless man, having paid his part, can look the millionaire in the eye without shame and without that cringing of the spirit which, by and by, ripens into mendicancy.

From time to time agitations are started looking toward the amending out of the constitution of California the provision requiring a poll tax to be imposed. It is to be hoped that the readers of these lessons will, out of consideration for the impecunious citizen himself, resist that movement. The tax entails a burden of only about two-thirds of one cent for each working day in the year and there are so few instances where the tax may prove a hardship as to make hardship negligible.

Men who have property find their poll tax taxed up to them when they come to pay their property tax, if not paid on or before the first of July of each year, and when that is done a penalty of another dollar is added, so it is a good thing to pay the tax between the first Monday in March and the last day of June each year. File away the receipts with care. Tax collectors are often careless in making their records and an accessible receipt may save double taxation.

JUST FOR FUN.

"Who in the name of Fulton-Hudson wrote this obituary of old Captain Onthebridge?" demanded the city editor of his assistant. "That cub from the bushes," the latter replied, with fine scorn. "Well, send him back to his marbles. He says the captain 'chose the sea as his life's work, and began at the bottom.'"

An overloaded boat, in which Mary Jane Sisk was attempting to cross the Sacramento river at Kennett, was capsized, and the woman was drowned.

To All, Greeting!

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY extends Christmas greeting to all its friends. And it ventures the hope that it comes into no home where it will not have that greeting returned to it as heartily as given. It is hard, sometimes, when battling for Right Things, to remember that those against whom we battle are also our brothers, that in their homes and among their associates they are exemplary gentlemen; that they do evil only when they have forgotten their better selves and have been swept off their feet by the surging influences about them, but it is often so. We must oppose them with all the power that in us lies, yet without malice. He for whom this good-will season was named, and in whose memory it has come to be a great institution the whole world around, was uncompromising. Occasionally his denunciations were terrible, but no other one was ever so ready to let "bygones be bygones" whenever sorrow for wrong doing was manifest. So let it be with all of us, uncompromising as to Right Things, but patient with those who have lost their moral bearings and are groping in the unrelieved darkness of our present day materialism. Again, to all our friends a Merry Christmas, with just a hint as to how we came by any Christmas at all, the most stupendous fact in all human history!

Zelaya.

NICARAGUA IS AS LARGE as Illinois and, leaving out Chicago, it is conceivable that it might sometime contain a population as great, instead of which it has a few tens of thousands whom Zelaya has brayed as in a mortar. There is not one right known to civilization in the possession of which any Nicaraguan has been wholly safe. There is no form of cruelty which the cunning of the American Indian can devise that Zelaya has not inflicted upon his own people. Conditions in that country are intolerable. They have no right, in this twentieth century of Christianization, to exist anywhere upon this globe. There is no one to bring this intolerable condition to a termination if the United States does not do it. With all our shortcomings as a government we can establish order, we can establish free schools, enforce sanitation, build roads, allow a free press and free speech, promote the general welfare and give to every citizen a right to pursue happiness, preserve his life, enjoy liberty. We have done these things in Cuba, Porto Rico, the Philippines, and at Panama, albeit at great cost to us. We ought to do as much in Central America, not for our advantage but for the advantage of those unhappy peoples. We should not stand upon the order of our doing, but do at once. The cost will be great, the burden heavy, the loss of life not inconsiderable, but we have no right longer to turn the deaf ear to the cry of the oppressed of our own continent.

What Are They Creating?

MR. WILLIAM J. BURNS HAS BEEN PLACED in charge of the detective work for the American Bankers' Association. We wonder if the bankers have a clear view of what they have done in selecting this man for that place! Are they fully aware that, in order to discharge his duty to the banks, it will be necessary for Mr. Burns to have trained detectives in every considerable city in the country? Are they aware that Mr. Burns has a moral purpose in all that he does as well as a legal? Are they aware that if any alleged trust company were to finance anything like the lamented "Calkins Syndicate," on security that would not be taken at a pawn shop, Mr. Burns would be very likely to hear of it and get busy? Are they aware that Mr. Burns will be as unlikely to protect criminality among the big men in banks as to overlook it among the small ones? It requires no sagacity to surmise that there are bankers in San Francisco who are in no wise responsible for the selection of William J. Burns to head the detective department of the American Bankers' Association. That he was so selected is a fine compliment, not alone to Mr. Burns, but to the banks.

Assassination.

FOUR OFFICIALS WERE ASSASSINATED on the same day in different parts of the world. There is no great cause for wonder in this. The wonder is that there is not more of it. The assassin is one in whose breast there rankles a deep sense of wrong with a feeling of inability to have that wrong redressed in any lawful, orderly way. It is born of a spirit of helplessness. Often, perhaps generally, these sentiments find lodgment in a disordered or morbid mind. The normal mind knows that assassination rights no wrong, remedies no evil. The morbid mind is willing to sacrifice life, if need be, that the assassin may quench his thirst for revenge. It is not possible for one menaced by assassination to defend himself from it. The only defense against it is such an orderly and equal establishment of justice that the sentiment of helpless endurance of injustice shall find lodgment in the breast of no man. It is therein that government most generally and most grievously fails. It is therein that failure in our own country is most pronounced. Therein lies our greatest danger that this Oriental form of retribution may find lodgment among us.

Not a Woman There.

A LONG PROCESSION OF MEN, we are told, followed the remains of Leopold, late king of the Belgians, to their final resting place, but not one woman had a place in the procession. This was not because women were not free to join in rendering respect to the memory of their dead king, if they had respect to render, or because it rained incessantly, but because the king's life had been one continued indignity to womankind. That the women of Belgium so conducted themselves is a glory to the sex. Woman is not merely the female of her species, useful upon occasion. She is a living soul and whoever ranks her as less than that deserves, in life, her disregard and, in death, has no claim upon her homage, be he king or peasant.

All Muckraking.

THE LOW-BROWED, CENT PER CENT materialism of our time has a right to be voiced by a newspaper and the San Francisco Chronicle has a right to be such a voice, but the intelligent public will be foolish to permit itself to be deceived by that voice. To the mind of the Chronicle all this talk about Secretary Ballinger is the merest muckraking. Nothing is to be allowed for a solicitude for the preservation of our remaining resources from spoliation, nothing for a public demand that the heads of our departments shall be above suspicion. The sinister, cynical smirk on Ballinger's portrait, as it appeared in the public press, was sufficient of itself to put the nation on its guard. Will the Chronicle mention some estimable gentleman who has been muckraked without justification?

ALLEGIANCE TO PRESIDENT AND PARTY.

We reaffirm our allegiance to the Republican party, and to the Roosevelt policies, and heartily endorse President Taft in his avowed determination to carry out and enforce those policies, and we pledge him our support as Republicans in securing their enactment into law and in the enforcement of such laws.—Extract from platform adopted at the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican conference held at Oakland, November 22d.

There was a period in the evolution of free government during which political parties were merely constituencies rallying around a personal leader advocating a cause. That meant as many parties as there were leaders with causes, and made for political instability and government by faction. Parties formed as above suggested finally continued in being after the leaders had died, or had fallen from grace, and the causes had been achieved or forgotten. In short, parties came to be great corporations organized for the purpose of managing government, inviting the people to give them the job.

That is the condition to-day. The Republican party is such a corporation. The Democratic party is another. Leaders and causes may come and go, but these parties either continue to administer government or continue to hope for a chance to administer government.

The Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League is Republican. It is an organization within the larger organization having for its purpose the control of the larger organization, and it specifically reaffirms its allegiance to that organization. If defeated before the people at the August primary it will, as an organization, acquiesce in the result and abide its time in the belief that, after a time, the rank and file of the party will be won over and the party organization gained. This, under existing conditions, is easier than to organize a new political party.

The Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League reaffirms the Roosevelt policies. These policies are understood to consist in the square deal in all relations of government, the conservation of national resources and the subjection of predatory interests to lawful regulation in the public interest and the punishment of malefactors of great wealth as certainly as those of small.

Fault has been found with the endorsement of President Taft, in the foregoing resolution, as being half-hearted and qualified. Qualified it is. Half-hearted it is not. It endorses him in his championship of the Roosevelt policies, but not otherwise. If President Taft were to go back on the Roosevelt policies the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League would go back on him. It will go farther. If President Taft, through weakness or a too close adherence to the technicalities of the law, shall permit the associated villainies of this country to make off with the rest of the nation's power sites and forest reserves, the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League will denounce him for so doing and strive to bring his presidential career to a close with the expiration of his present term.

But if the President shall strive in good faith to secure the enactment of the Roosevelt policies into law, and the enforcement of the laws when enacted, the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League pledges him its support in achieving those ends. In short, the Roosevelt policies constitute the issue. Those are the things that the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League stands for. By that test the League judges the President and his cabinet, and by that test will it judge the members of congress and candidates for official preferment in this state. There is nothing equivocal or uncertain about the League or its purposes. Whoever fails to understand what it stands for has himself to blame.

THE DANGERS OF GEARY.

We are warned that the Geary Street Municipal Traction enterprise is fraught with grave dangers. It is. There is no getting around that.

For instance, the people of San Francisco might learn from the hazard of this enterprise that the municipality can undertake, and carry to a successful termination, a constructive work of large dimensions. That consummation would prove dangerous to those who owe their opportunity to an assumed inability of a municipality to do business without getting robbed at every turn.

Again, the construction of the Geary street system, and its extension to the ferry and the Cliff, might open the way to the municipal construction of numerous other parallel and cross-town lines, gradually demonstrating the ability of a city to furnish its own traction system, and make a good interest on a legitimate investment while performing a public service in an improved and acceptable manner. That would be nothing short of calamitous to gentlemen wont to secure a street railroad franchise for a song, capitalize it for a great fortune, pocket the proceeds and leave the traveling citizenry to hang to straps at one end while treading on corns at the other.

Once more, if the city were to construct an underground instead of an overhead trolley system and should put fenders on its cars, thereby leaving the streets unhampered by poles and wires and passengers uninjured by having their bodies crushed and mangled under car wheels, property on such streets might become greatly enhanced in value over that on those streets on which the shambles wagons operate, and the undertaking business might suffer harm.

It might result from the Geary street investment that San Francisco may find capital eager to be placed in its charge for investment in gainful undertakings, thus obviating the need for appealing to eastern capital to buy our securities at two or three times their actual value that we may pay two or three times as much interest and principal as needful. That would be destructive of the elemental principles of Big Business, and, if other cities were to profit by San Francisco's example, might almost ruin it.

There is no question that the hazards of the Geary street enterprise are great, and among them we may frankly include the possible miscarriage of the venture, its dishonest construction and unprofitable operation and the loss of a million or two of dollars in the affording of a horrible example to other cities, but we regard this hazard as so much less serious than the others as to incline us to the opinion that the venture should be made notwithstanding.

Declares He Did Not Do It.

Last week we charged Col. John P. Irish, by implication at least, with being the author of editorial utterances in the Oakland Tribune hostile to the graft prosecution. Col. Irish declares that he has written nothing for that paper that did not appear over his name. The information came to us from an inside source, voluntarily, and with no conceivable reason for saying so unless it was so, and our informant certainly believed that what he said was true; but we are under obligation to accept Col. Irish's denial as conclusive. It is sufficiently discreditable to be a contributor to that journal over one's name.

The President Not to Be Blamed.

Those who were shocked to hear that former Governor Henry T. Gage, of San Quentin furniture notoriety, had been commissioned as United States minister to Portugal should not be hasty in criticising the President for having so honored one as politically defunct, for instance, as former Governor Markham. So long as our United States senators are selected by the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company we shall have only those citizens honored with office whom that Political Bureau delights to honor and, with here and there an exception, they are an off-color lot. Gage was a broncho caught up off the range and broken into the gubernatorial office with difficulty, and it is to be feared that his rough Western way will not be appreciated among those Latins with whom etiquette is a passion and ill-breeding a crime.

Investigating Incorporealities.

It may be doubted if the investigation into the official conduct of Secretary Ballinger can be productive either of a vindication, a whitewash or a condemnation. No one has charged that he has broken any law, except the one that forbade him acting as attorney for a land claim for two years after resigning as Commissioner of the General Land Office, and that was malum prohibitum and not malum per se, wrong because forbidden and not wrong within itself.

The charge against Ballinger is that he has not been a sincere friend to conservation, that he has construed his powers to save the public domain from spoliation strictly as against the government, and liberally as to those who would despoil the government through the forms of law. An investigation may, and probably will, disclose these allegations to be true, but no investigating committee can bring in a verdict of guilty conduct on an issue of a liberal or a strict construction of the law. It will be good to have all the facts laid before the public, but the findings from those facts will have to be made by the American people. The verdict of no congressional committee will be accepted as conclusive.

Change of Management Desirable.

Supervisor Pollok will find the public with him in his desire to have a new management in control of the United Railroads. The public will go even farther than that and welcome a new ownership. The advent of the United Railroads personnel, from top to bottom, has proven a disaster to the city. Our home ownership, disagreeable as it was at times, was more wholesome. If a city may not own its own street-car system, at least it ought to be owned by its own people. Absentee landlordism is bad at all times and in all aspects. The purpose of the whole United Railroads enterprise from the first has been the exploitation, and not the service, of this people; to saddle this community with a stock and bond indebtedness several times the actual investment. Whatever of welcome was extended the United Railroads management when it came must prove tame indeed when compared with the spontaneity of feeling that would be manifest on its taking its departure.

Not So Purely Personal.

Governor Gillett regards the purchase, on his part, and that of his wife, of coal lands in Alaska as a purely personal matter in which the public has no interest. He is mistaken. The fact that Gillett is governor of California, and that there are associated with him Representatives McKinlay and McLachlan, warrants a lively public interest in the transaction. The public would like to know, and has a right to the knowledge, how these persons became interested in the Alaska coal lands deal, who the original entrymen were, whether they were financed by these gentlemen or any of them, whether these gentlemen or any of them, or any of their associates, "grub-staked" or otherwise assisted the entrymen to make their entries of these lands and to secure patents on them. Governor Gillett is no stranger to the methods employed in securing timber lands, oil lands and coal lands from the government with nothing more than a technical compliance with the law. He has seen it done all around Humboldt bay. This is not saying that there is a thing in the world irregular in the proceedings by which he and his associates have acquired 2,500 acres of coal lands, but only that the method of acquiring them is a public and not a purely personal affair. "How did they come by it?" is a query that, in every such case, should receive the most explicit answer, with the burden of proof upon the purchaser. The law is bad enough at its best and its purpose has been to reduce to private exploitation a great public heritage, and, in its application, that law should be construed with the utmost strictness until it can be repealed.

Back to the Eskimos.

Dr. Frederick Cook is reported to have said that if the scientists found against him in his claims to have reached the pole he would go back to the Eskimos and spend the rest of his days ministering to them as Dr. Grenfel has ministered to the fisher folk along the Labradorian coast. He will do well not to stand upon the order of his going, but go at once. Anywhere in civilization he will live a man forbid. Let him but venture out of doors day or night and some one will point the finger of scorn at him and say: "There goes the colossal faker of human history." He might as well be an unconvicted, law-crushing higher-up! And it was for this that he endured years of privation and hardship in those boreal regions! Henceforth the term "Cooked" will take on a new significance. And to think that while he can die, can crawl under a mountain of ice somewhere and suffer it to fall upon him and so blot him out, his reputation as the champion faker of all time will go down the ages like a soul whose material body has been forbidden sepulture. Alas for Frederick Cook! It had been better if he had never been born.

Objections to Unionism.

The special article, elsewhere in this paper, under the above title, from the pen of Doctor Brown, of Oakland, will be found of great interest. The issues are stated fairly and afford the citizen an opportunity to weigh what may be said in extenuation of many of the criticisms made. The non-union laborer, like the non-voting citizen, is not an attractive personality. He either lacks the courage or the inclination to pull his own weight.

But there are one or two objections to unionism that Doctor Brown did not touch upon. One of these is the feeling on the part of the employer that he ought to be The Boss and ought to be free to do as he wills with his own. For he feels that his business is his own about as much as his house, his wife, his children and the family dog and cat. In practice he finds that, even under his own roof-tree, his ownership is much qualified. While his wife is his wife and nobody's else he falls far short of owning her. His children the state may reach out and take from him if he does not educate them properly and treat them well, and the poundmaster may ensnare his dog if he does not take out a license to preserve him. The things that we can call our very ownest-own are not abundant, and if society wants us it will take us, too, and set us up to be shot at. Autocracy in industry is, on the whole, rather farther gone than in government.

Boiled down, a chief objection to unionism is that the employer wants to be The Boss, but can be such no longer. Associated labor confronts him as an equal and he must make terms with it or fight.

Another objection to unionism is that sometimes the labor union wants to be The Boss, wants to turn the tables completely over and give the employer a dose of the medicine he has been giving his employees for several centuries. That objection is valid wherever organized labor, feeling its oats, makes the attempt to boss. That attempt should be resisted. It owes its origin to pugnacity rather than to judgment or reason.

Somehow, this whole problem has got to be removed from the plane of Man the animal, to Man the living soul, Man a little lower than the angels, but capable of being crowned with glory and honor. On that plane the problem of unionism is easily solved.

How It Feels to Be Hurt.

The Santa Fe railroad has found that the Oklahoma laws regulating fares and freights in that freaky commonwealth have injuriously affected its receipts. In short, it is hurt. Now we don't want our railroads hurt, unless it be in order that they may know how it feels to be hurt. The transcontinental railroads have lately hurt the business of this state to the tune of $10,000,000, and we hear it rumored that there is another hurt coming like unto it, not to meet expenses, not to pay legitimate dividends, but to give an illegitimate value to the market quotations of railroad shares. A turn about at hurting is written into the constitution of animal man, as fair play, and the railroad corporations must not be surprised if what they mete out is returned to them in round measure. The people, even in Oklahoma, instinctively want justice, but the time may come when they will want that justice to be retributive. Then what?

The Case of Oppenheimer.

There is just one class of cases in which the extreme penalty of the law should be inflicted speedily and with no qualms of conscience. That is the class of the congenital degenerate with homicidal mania. To this class Jacob Oppenheimer belongs. He is now confined at San Quentin prison under sentence of death, with an irrelevant and inconsequential right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States still open to him. He should be killed as a mad dog would be killed, without enmity, but as the only guaranty of public safety from his propensity to kill. So long as he remains alive the lives of those who must have him in their care will be in danger. The law should find the miscreant guilty of not being fit to live and kill him. In no other class of cases need the extreme penalty be meted out.

Kill the Roadhouse.

The effort making in Santa Clara county to drive the roadhouse out of business is one that every county in the state should imitate. The roadhouse has not one plea it can justly make for life. There is every reason why it should be killed. Every such establishment is a center of immoral infection. A plague-infected rattery could not be more injurious to any community.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

The multitude approaches the Christmas season in the spirit of good will and with the expectation of doing a large business in swapping gifts. Not all countries do this. England does not. There is little or no giving of presents there, but rather a general home-coming and manifestation of good will, chiefly around the table as we meet on Thanksgiving.

In our country Jew, as well as gentile, makes no little out of Christmas, notwithstanding that the Jew does not believe that Jesus was the Hebrew Messiah, but, anyhow, he was a Jew to whom the world has rendered the greatest homage ever rendered to man, and the children of Israel enter heartily into the kindly relations of the Christmas season.

To the reverent, believing follower of the Nazarene the Christmas season is holy time. With the shepherds, he hears the voice of the angels singing their song of good will and of glory to God, sees the star in the east moving brightly athwart the sky until it comes to stand over a stable at Bethlehem of Judea where, in a manger, a child is born that is to revolutionize human society and bring the kingdom of God on earth as it is in heaven, sees the wise men who have followed that star gather about the manger where the virgin mother and young child are that they may gladden their eyes with the new hope and prostrate themselves in humble adoration. It is a beautiful story, beautiful all the way from the Annunciation to the Ascension, and it is small wonder that it has taken such a hold on the hearts of men.

But there are those who believe that the story, beautiful though it is, is beautiful only as poetry, that it isn't really true as related, that the child Jesus was in fact the son of Joseph and Mary, born as every other child is born, of a physical father and a physical mother, that he was probably not sinless, that he lived as others lived except that he forgot self in zeal for a cause, as many a hundred other religious enthusiasts have done, and that for nineteen hundred years the world has been mistaken as to the cold facts.

Very well, let it go at that for the nonce. There are those whose imaginations find no difficulty in peopling the earth, the air and the sky with invisible beings, and there are those matter-of-fact Missourians who must be shown else they will not believe anything that lies outside their own experience and observation. The issue is largely temperamental and not to be quarreled over.

Let us, therefore, concern ourselves this once with just the Christ idea as we encounter it in the world, waving aside as unimportant, at this time, all considerations as to whether or not it ever found perfect incarnation in the flesh. That idea is embodied in love to God and love to man, as the fulfillment of the law. What manner of man would overreach one he loved better than himself? What one would be a hard taskmaster to an object of his sincere affection? What one, loving God with all his heart and soul and mind and strength, would cruelly and despitefully use a single one of God's creatures? And the Christ idea is further embodied in a religion of purity of heart and human fraternity, a religion to keep one mindful of the obligations of love to God and man and help one to do as he knows he ought to do.

Now, frankly, apart from creeds and dogmas, from what men can believe or can not, is not the Christ idea—just as an idea to stand off and look at as one might at a beautiful painting or a piece of statuary, at a landscape or a sunset—is not that Christ idea the most beautiful thing in all the world? Is it not the hope of the race and of every member of the race? If one doubt the man Jesus, if he reject the beautiful story of the Christmas child as not being literally true, how can he reject the Christ idea in the world? And after all is not the acceptance of that idea in love and humility the important thing?

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Work and Starvation Hand in Hand.

Man's inhumanity to man easily includes man's inhumanity to woman. Witness the sweatshops which are a feature of all "christian" lands. Witness particularly, for the purposes of this reading, a recent report of the Labor Department of the French government. The report deals with labor conditions in the departments of northern and eastern France, and here are some of its details: Sotteville is the center of the sweating system in the department of the Seine Inferieure. There seamstresses earn two cents an hour and work from 12 to 15 hours a day, their sole food being soup and cheese. In 70 per cent of cases these women earn less than $80 a year, while in 12 per cent of cases the earnings are below $40. These conditions are practically duplicated in the department of the Oise, and at St. Quentin, Amiens and Lille, while at Nancy the horror of the condition is emphasized by a working day of 14 to 16 hours, with a payment averaging less than a penny an hour. This is not the problem of Labor and Capital, it is the problem of Labor and Slow Starvation. Almost it seems that France (and it does not stand quite alone), may be preparing to duplicate 1790 and the mad years that followed, for the conditions trend in much the same direction.

The Mighty Family of the Smiths.

The cheek of the bearer of the historic name of Smith well may be suffused with pride when he considers an official report recently filed in Great Britain, for, according to this report, the mighty Smiths march in battalions, while the rest of us must content ourselves with moving in companies or by units. It was to have been expected that the name of Smith would lead the list in England, and easily and proudly it does so, but something different might have been looked for from the canny clans of Auld Scotia. The look is in vain; the prolific Smiths maintain the lead in Scotland, with the Macdonalds only second. Then, Wales! If there were anything on which a man of speculative spirit would invest his last nickel, it would be the proposition that the Jones family is ahead in the running in the country of many consonants and few vowels. He would lose his nickel; the Joneses make a good showing, but the ever-multiplying Smiths outnumber them. In Ireland alone is the proud supremacy of Smith rudely shattered. The Murphys outrank them, and so do the Kellys, and the Sullivans, but even on the old sod the Smiths take the fifth place, which is not a bad showing, when the popularity of the name in England is considered. The Smiths forever! The rest of us are distanced.

The Supreme Court Getting Behind.

The annual report of Mr. Wickersham, the Attorney General of the United States, which was sent to Congress the other day, shows a rather unfortunate condition of Supreme Court affairs. Deeper and deeper, during the last decade, the court has been getting into the bog of undecided cases. The statistics are the demonstration of the truth of this assertion. At the close of the 1899 term 303 cases remained undisposed of on the calendar. By the close of the 1906 term this number had increased to 343, or more than 13 per cent; in 1907 the number had increased to 421, or 39 per cent, while a year later the number was 478, an increase of nearly 58 per cent in nine years. This is an average annual increase of 6½ per cent, and the question how long it will take the court to become so bogged that it will find it difficult to progress at all naturally arises. The situation suggests, too, that it might be better to appoint to the justiceships, as they become vacant, comparatively young men, with the vigor to surmount obstacles, rather than men who, like Judge Lurton, have attained the age and the resting tendency that come with 65 years.

Naturally the Lords Objected.

It was a hard proposition which the British House of Commons put up to the Lords when it presented, for their approval, a budget containing a land tax based, to a considerable extent, on the Henry George theory, to say nothing of other features which were scarcely more agreeable. It was too much like asking the possessor of a "soft snap" to vote the snap out of his keeping. The last British Domesday Book tells the story, by inevitable inference. The total area of the United Kingdom contains about 77,000,000 acres of land, and the members of the House of Lords own 16,411,986 acres, or considerably more than one-fifth of the whole. Twenty-three peers own one-fourteenth of the entire British domain. Generally speaking, too, the land which is in their names is of the richest and best, and makes particularly choice game preserves. The Commons should have realized that to break up these preserves, etc., would be an invasion of immemorial privilege and divine prerogative, but they refused to see it, and the war is on, a war which is not at all unlikely to leave the peers with a severe headache.

Estimated Cost of Airship Travel.

If the conclusions and estimates of a committee of German aeronautical experts are sound, travel in the air is not likely to become immensely popular; that is, there will be no immediate rush to the airships. The committee finds that the cost of constructing an airship with capacity for eighteen passengers would be about $100,000, and the cost of working it would be $375 a day. Supposing it carried its full complement of passengers, the fare per day could not be less than $25 in order to give even a small profit, and the fare per hour could not be fixed at less than $5 to $10. Evidently, under such a schedule of prices, people who could afford to ride along the sky would be in a small and gilded minority. The most of us must fly by aeroplane if we are to fly at all.

Enterprise Touches the Dreamy East.

The world moves, even the sluggish Orient moves with it, and it is coming to pass that "a cycle of Cathay" may see several things in the line of modern progress accomplished. By way of illustration, note the following facts: Constantinople, wherein the telephone heretofore has been excluded, is, under the new Turkish regime, about to install a system within its limits. Ancient Damascus, where genii of old were wont to assemble, now has that greater and more powerful genius which is represented in an electric street-car system, and its streets and mosques are lighted by electricity, while Beirut, Aleppo and Smyrna soon will be similarly lighted. Jerusalem has just purchased a fire engine and a town clock, and a chamber of commerce looks after its business affairs. A railway soon will be constructed from Jaffa to Gaza, and others from Haifa to Jaffa and from Jerusalem to Es Salt are under consideration. Soon it will be, "All aboard for the Holy City, Mount Horeb and the Dead Sea," for the eyes of the drowsy East are opening to the sunlight of civilization.

Increasing Our Killing Capacity.

An invention whereby warlike men may humbly trust to increase their killing capacity has just been perfected by a Swedish engineer named Angrell. It consists of a device by which submarine mines may be raised or lowered from the shore, or a ship, at a distance of six miles. Electricity is the force employed, the pressure of a button shifting the location of a mine. The admirably murderous invention would do its work in the following manner. Say that the enemy's vessel of war is in the offing. Our ship goes out to inspect her, turns and retreats. Nothing doing; the way appears to be open for the enemy to follow. It does so. Somebody presses a button, a mine rises under the foe's war ship, bang! All off. Very nice, you see, unless ours chances to be the pursuing ship, in which case, inasmuch as the widows and orphans would be our own, we would feel called upon to remember them and give them our sympathy, it being a recognized martial fact that none but our own afflicted are entitled to sympathy. The "little brown men" may as well make a note of the fact that the Russian government has ordered 200 of these devices.

Lightest of All Metals.

The lightest of all metals thus far discovered is electron, which recently was manufactured in Germany. It is a magnesium alloy, and can be cast, pressed, rolled or drawn. It weighs about two-thirds as much as aluminum, the lightest metal heretofore known, possesses much strength and ductility, and is silver-white in color, taking a brilliant polish. It is believed that it will be found very useful in the manufacture of automobiles and airships of all varieties.

Representative William Brown McKinley of Illinois, the owner of more miles of interurban electric railways than any other man in the world, is remarkable because of the way in which all animals love him. A friend says of him, "If he hadn't made money in railways he could have made a fortune as an animal trainer. At home every dog in town knows him and follows him in the street."

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHELF.

"Pride and Prejudice."

Jane Austen's first and best novel is a gem of literary craftsmanship. She took for her characters the members of an ordinary family, and so faithfully reproduced the everyday experiences of family life, the intrafamilial ambitions, jealousies, confidences, misunderstandings, foibles, and love affairs, that the story reflects them as personally to-day as it did years ago in England. The ambitious, match-making mother, the father who has no patience with feminine intrigues, the family of daughters—the sweet and loyal confidante of her father, the boy-struck brainless sister, and the family drudge—the steady young man who wins the likeable sister, the foolish soldier boy who marries the coquette, the rich relations—they appear throughout the story in life-like characters. The art that makes their doings real and interesting, Scott compared to the delicate work of the cameo cutter. The satire that makes us see the weaknesses of our own family relations is penetrating, yet kindly. The story is as natural, as commonplace, and as absorbing as our everyday life is to each of us.

YOUR STORY.

A cattleman in Montana was an admirer of the writings of Rudyard Kipling. He read everything that Kipling published, with an approval born of a kindred interest in the frontier soul of things which the author loves. In his experience this cattleman stumbled on a story from real life that possessed every element of a piece of fiction, an original character, dramatic action, romance, and a conclusion in accordance with the law of poetic justice.

When Kipling made one of his visits to America, this Montana cattleman made the long and expensive trip to New York solely to tell Kipling this story. He pulled wires for an introduction to the great writer, and finally succeeded in meeting him. Then he told his story.

Kipling listened, all attention, completely absorbed. When the cattleman finished, he exploded in one word of entire approval, "Splendid!"

Then the cattleman explained that he had come all the way from Montana to give this plot to Kipling, whose writings he so much admired, and that he hoped he would write it as his own, in his inimitable way.

"But," Kipling exclaimed, "I can't write that. That's your story."

This incident—it is literally true, by the way—illustrates two things: the process by which a writer individualizes his work, and the fact that every man who sees and thinks has at least one story of his own.

The writer with a distinctive style has such a style because the living drama of the world around him groups itself into organized shapes according to the peculiar character of his personal interest in only certain parts of the things he sees. Dickens was a humorist because every grotesque shape of man struck his eye with an especial force, because every oddity of character appealed to his risibles, for instance, more than any conventionality of character appealed to his sense of dignity. And, more than that, Dickens had to receive his impressions of the grotesque as first impressions, else they did not become corporeal elements of his own mind. Otherwise, much as they might amuse him when described by others, they were at best some other person's story.

And each man who thinks and sees has, to the extent of his observation and originality, stories that are peculiarly his own. Hardly any man enjoys reading but has in his own mind a story, either an incident of real life that has appealed to his constructive literary sense or a creation of his own active fancy. Such a man, lacking the arduous training in the skilled trade of writing, wishes either for the power to write or that his pet author could have the story as he has it, a living and moving picture of the mind, to make it imperishable in print.

DICKENS IN CAMP.

By Bret Harte.

Above the pines the moon was slowly drifting.The river sang below;
The dim Sierras, far beyond, uplifting
Their minarets of snow.The roaring camp-fires, with rude humor, paintedThe ruddy tints of health
On haggard face and form that drooped and fainted

In the fierce race for wealth.

Till one arose, and from his pack's scant treasureA hoarded volume drew,
And cards were dropped from hands of listless leisure

To hear the tale anew;

And then, while round them shadows gathered faster,And as the firelight fell,
He read aloud the book wherein the Master
Had writ of "Little Nell."

Perhaps 'twas boyish fancy,—for the reader

Was youngest of them all,—

But, as he read, from clustering pine and cedar

A silence seemed to fall;

The fir-trees, gathering closer in the shadows,
Listened in every spray.While the whole camp with "Nell" on English meadows

Wandered, and lost their way.

And so in mountain solitudes—o'ertaken

As by some spell divine—

Their cares drop from them like the needles shaken

From out the gusty pine.

Lost is that camp, and wasted all its fire;

And he who wrought that spell?—

Ah, towering pine and stately Kentish spire,
Ye have one tale to tell!

Lost is that camp! but let its fragrant story

Blend with the breath that thrills

With hop-vines' incense all the pensive glory
That fills the Kentish hills.And on that grave where English oak and hollyAnd laurel wreaths entwine,
Deem it not all a too presumptuous folly.—

This spray of Western pine!

"AS OTHERS SEE US."

John Graham Brooks, author, economist, lecturer, and student of history, is rounding out an active life by publishing a series of books containing a ripe review of the studies of his lifetime. "As Others See Us" is one of these reviews. Mr. Brooks has read, digested, and compared nearly a hundred standard works of foreign authors who have described American life as they saw it on visits to this country. These writers range, chronologically, from the first years of the republic down to the intensely alive and contemporaneous Hugo Munsterberg and H. G. Wells. Mr. Brooks has weighed the critical value of each author, discarding those who came to America with a bias of mind sufficiently violent to warp their judgment completely, and suggesting the extent to which those more fair-minded may be trusted. He then proceeds to unfold their criticisms, favorable and adverse, of American life and institutions, arranging them by subjects and chronologically, so that the two final chapters in the book naturally bring the reader up to a recapitulation of all the criticisms and to a weighing of the signs of progress that they reveal.

He notes that every one of the writers has observed that we are braggarts. Californians will be interested in this: "Two 'men of distinction' tell Sir Charles Lyell that as you travel west, the note of braggadocio steadily rises till you reach the Pacific Coast, where it would be deafening if your approach were not so gradual . . . its commonest form being that everything, from scenery to general culture, is the sublimest or the biggest in the universe. He notes down some forty objects of achievement that are indisputably 'the finest in the entire world.'"

We learn also that Americans are extremely sensitive to foreign criticism (largely because it shrewdly hurts when true); that the tone of foreign criticism has gradually become more friendly, as instanced by the fact that earlier critics attributed our habit of elevating our feet to mantel-pieces and table rims to vulgar breeding, whereas later critics excuse it as a relief from the national indigestion; that we have not a monopoly of the best wit and humor in the world, but only a keen appreciation of our own brand; that James K. Bryce is our greatest and most friendly critic; and that the best judgment of our critics is that, though we still are oppressed by mighty problems and struggle at them as blind men in masses, we have a reserve fund of sense and patriotism that will somehow pull us through.

Our progress over the past is noted by such signs as these: a recognition of the negro problem as soluble only by the white men of the South, and the sensible seriousness of these Southerners toward the problem; the increase in comfort, economy, and safety of railway travel; the rise of earning power of the laboring class and the slow, but steady, improvement in industrial conditions; a profound improvement in our physical health (the earlier writers all described us as a race of invalids); the great advance in educational opportunities; our growth in culture and the practice of the fine arts; the increased sense of national unity; the rise in the moral tone of the press; amelioration of prison conditions; and, greatest of all, the education of the people at large to the fact of the criminal relation between Big Business and corrupt politics, pointing the way directly to the cleansing of our institutions from their principal menace of decay.

This book is a foundation for a comprehensive view of our national history from an original view point, and it is as interesting as it is instructive.

PICTURES OF AMERICAN FEUDALISM

BY E. FRENCH STROTHER.

Every school boy is familiar with the historical fact of feudalism. It was the system of local government in the Middle Ages. Each lord held a body of land, and this land was worked by his tenants. These tenants gave him a share (a large share) of their produce, and he waxed rich upon this tribute. Every tenant was a subject of the lord; the lord was his king, his judge, and his tax collector.

That kind of feudalism has passed from the civilized parts of the earth—even Russia. Remnants of it survive, in European monarchies, in restriction upon individual liberty. In America, the home of the free, even these restrictions imposed by government have largely been thrown aside.

But feudalism exists in the United States today. Not political feudalism, nor feudalism in name; but, in every essential effect upon the lives of the people concerned, an exact likeness of the feudalism of the Middle Ages, except that the overlord is a captain of industry instead of a baron of chivalry, and the serfs are his hired laborers instead of his liege subjects.

The writer is acquainted with two striking instances of this industrial feudalism. One example exists in Pennsylvania; the other in New Hampshire. It is well to consider them separately, because one is much less oppressive than the other, though both are un-American, undemocratic, and objectionable. But they deserve consideration from thoughtful Americans everywhere, particularly in California. California has no such feudal system, yet; it does not want one; it is well to see how these two arose, so that it may never have one.

This article will deal wholly with the Pennsylvania example.

I. A PICTURE FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

The New Jersey Zinc Company (or the "zinc trust," as it is generally called) a good many years ago located perhaps its largest reduction works in Carbon county, Pennsylvania, in a lonely mountain valley, far from any city or even town of considerable size. Their objects in choosing this location were two: this valley is near to vast coal beds, and the company had found that it was cheaper to haul the zinc ore to the region of cheapest coal supply than it was to haul the coal to the zinc fields; and (the second object) they wanted to use the cheapest labor in the market and to keep that labor away from the towns where union leaders and union example might make it discontented or less cheap.

Both objects have justified the company's hopes. Zinc reduction in Carbon county is profitable; and labor has remained cheap and unorganized. At the yawning mouths of two rows of furnaces—each row a quarter of a mile long—smoke-grimed Poles and Lithuanians work twelve hours a day, shoveling coal, shoveling limestone, shoveling ore, clearing fireboxes of clinkers with pokers twenty feet long and heavy as lead—do back-breaking work twelve hours (not eight) a day, for—seventy-five cents. The day shift works from six to six; the night shift works from six to six for the same pay.

These men get one thing "thrown in" with their wages: the right to live in the "company houses." Come and look at them. Two-story, unadorned square houses of rough planks painted red, set on an ore "dump," with not one convenience in sight. The drinking water is pumped from wells bored directly behind the houses. The sewage is drained into an open ditch in the dump only a hundred feet away. There is not a bath tub to be found.

Two rooms in each house are set apart for kitchen and dining room. The men who board here pay the wife of one of them their share of the amount necessary to buy what they can afford to eat—the ingredients of a villainous stew and loaves of rank bread. That is all they eat. The other rooms are sleeping quarters. Each room has from four to eight bunks built against the walls. Each bunk holds two men, so there are from eight to sixteen men sleeping in one room. That means all day and all night, for the day crew comes home at night and routs the night crew out of the bunks, and crawls into the still warm berths as the night crew goes to work; and the night crew in turn ousts the day crew in the morning. The same bed-clothes are used all the time.

Up from this filthy heap where the workmen live rises a gradual slope, which grows green as it rises to a hillside. Here, set aloft, is the modern equivalent of the ancient baronial hall, the hotel occupied by the company superintendent and managers. This is owned by the company, and board and rooms are sold at nominal rents to the industrial chief and his underlords. The comforts and elegances of a club are supplied: a bar where a gentleman's signature is good for a gentleman's drink, a billiard hall, and a dancing floor, where the carefree waltz and two-step gild the evening after eight hours of gentleman's work.

The gayety, the grace, the congenial atmosphere of secure social intercourse that shine brightly here are in brilliant contrast with the somber faces, the bound muscles, and the uncouth dinner talk in the "quarters" two hundred yards away, down there on the "dump." The difference by day is equally a challenge to attention. Down at the grimy rows of furnaces the six-bit-a-day foreigners sweat and tug, or walk pallidly amongst the flour-like settling bags, whose dusty refuse clogs the workers' lungs forever in five years. Up at the feudal hall gay traps carry the ladies for a day's outing to the woods, while their sisters on the dump below heavily prepare the next meal for the men. Above the hall a half-hour at lunch is enjoyed by the men at tennis or golf.

This contrast is more than the mere restatement of a common enough fact of economic inequality. If a man in the hall on the hill takes a highball or so too many, kind hands restrain him and tuck him into bed. If a man on the dump takes a pint too much of the vicious Slav wine and makes the same disturbance, he is arrested by a company policeman, locked in a calaboose built and owned by the company, and, next morning, is tried and sentenced by a justice of the peace who could not get his office if the company disappeared of him.

The company sells land for homes to those workers who can save enough out of seventy-five cents a day to believe, at least, that they can rise from the dump to better things. The plan is for easy payments and looks plausibly altruistic. It isn't. By starvation economy the beneficiary of altruism could pay out in eleven years and would then probably know enough English to find that he could be forced to sell to the company at any time. Thus altruism and peace are preserved without cost to the company. If, at the end of eleven years, the laborer concludes that six bits will not go around the daily requirements of food and clothing, much less put the boys even for a year or two into school, he would do well not to say so too loudly. Or, if he should become impressed with the damnable doctrine that laborers have the same right to combine and sell their labor collectively that corporations have to combine and sell their product as a trust, he had best keep that quiet also. Eviction costs the company nothing but the filing of a few legal documents, and industrial peace is cheap at the price.

If this necessarily brief article has conveyed a living impression of the truth it has portrayed a state of actual feudalism. These laborers live under a system of earning which practically, in their stage of intelligence and economic helplessness, throws about their actions the same restraints of fear and compulsion that legal feudalism threw around the actions of the serfs.

There is a hope for these men. The superintendent, with a genuine compassion and in a tone expressive of a relieved sense of responsibility, declared that he had seen the nationality of his workmen change twice. Wages had not changed, races had. The Irish had come, hundreds had worked out their strength here, but the remainder had gone—to the cities, where they rose in the economic scale. The Italians had succeeded them, and in turn had gone, pushing into the city trenches from which the Irish had, meanwhile, risen to the trucks and the police force. He saw another change coming. The Poles were succeeding the Italians in the trenches, and the Italians were struggling up into the gardening business. Soon, he thought, the Poles would all be leaving the zinc works. He wondered, too, with some anxiety, who could be got to take their places. He frankly said that every race that had come to Carbon county had been lower in the economic and human scale than its predecessor, and the Poles seemed to be about the dregs. Worse, they seemed probably to be the last of the emigrant peoples. It might be that they would have no successors. He did not suggest—possibly the habit of mind of a lifetime made it impossible that he should think it—that the sacred wage scale of the zinc works might actually have to be raised, to persuade even the dregs to work there.

Nor did his mind run down the ringing grooves of change to wonder whether industrial opportunity in America would some day approach its limit, so that the happy transition of the Irish and Italians might prove impracticable. Suppose it should. Will this form of feudalism still be tolerated? If it is, it will then begin to crystallize, and we shall have a new social order in America, patterned upon the obsolete model of political feudalism and differing from it only in this, that its existence will be maintained by the pressure of economic stress instead of by the authority of law and the force of arms.

CURIOUS EPITAPHS.

Among the 1,300 epitaphs collected by Ernest R. Suffling in "Epitaphia" are many quaint and curious specimens. Grimaldi off the stage was said to be a sufferer from melancholia. It will be remembered that going to a physician on one occasion he described his case, when the worthy doctor briskly told him to "shake off the feeling. Go and see Grimaldi, and if he does not cure you your case is indeed hopeless." "Alas," said the poor sufferer, "I am Grimaldi." His epitaph reads, "Here Am I."

A prize of £100 is said to have been offered by one Thorpe, who was desirous of being perpetuated but briefly on his tombstone. One competitor sent in "Here Lies Thorpe's Corpse." This was certainly brief enough, but finally it was cut to "Thorpe's Corpse."

There are many curious epitaphs on wives. Here's one from Ulverston, Lancashire:

Here lies my wife,
Here lies she Hallelujah!
Hallelujee!

An inscription placed over the grave of a missionary who was accidentally shot in India read thus:

Here lies the Rev. A—B—,
For many years missionary in B— district.
He was accidentally shot by his native servant.
"Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

At Chelmsford, Essex, on a stone to the memory of "Mary Blewitt of the Swan" it is stated that she "was the wife of nine husbands successively, but the ninth outlived her." It is added, "The Text to Her Funeral Sermon was: 'Last of all, the Woman died also.'"—Westminster Gazette.

A MOOD.

By Elizabeth Gerberding.
(For The California Weekly.)

I know a mood so rich in joy of life,
So bound about with happy memories
And soothed by fair and radiant Future, rife
With hopes—space, atoms, worlds are harmonies!

No black nor tawdry thought may enter here,
Nor chilling shapes of grim and awful fears;
Enwrapped in beauty like an atmosphere,
Soul speaks to body in a rush of tears.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Ring, Christmas Bells!

Ring, Christmas bells; sing sweetly shrill,
While childish voices sing again:
"Though He was dead, He liveth still Where'er love reigns in souls of men."
Ring, sweetly ring! Let echoes leap
Beyond the shades that round us fall,
And o'er the utmost vap'rous steep,
Till Heaven answers to your call.
The message old
Ring out again:
"Peace, peace on earth;
Good will to men."

Ring, Christmas bells! In Bethlehem
A babe was born long, long ago.
(How shone the star, like some great gem
Upon the robe of night aglow!)
A babe was born, and love was born.
The love which yet shall banish hate,
(How burned the star upon that morn, While wise men waited at the gate!)
Ring, Christmas bells,
Both sweet and shrill:
"Peace, peace on earth;
To men good will."

Ring, Christmas bells! Ring in the day,
The day of love, by Him foretold;
Ring in the fairer, better way,
The day of peace, foreseen of old.
Ring till the clamor strikes the sky,
A silvern dart 'gainst azure shield;
Proclaim to list'ning hosts on high:
"Love yet shall reign, and hate shall yield."
Ring, Christmas bells,
The glad, new birth:
"Good will to men,
And peace on earth!"

San Diego and the Exposition.

As a strictly personal opinion—which, of course, will in no way interfere with the smug self-satisfaction with which any San Franciscan may view his city's conduct in the matter—I wish to say that I look upon San Francisco's selection of a date for an exposition as a "hold-up" worthy of even our big city's reputation in recent years. Some months ago San Diego announced that 1915 would be the year of its proposed exposition, and straightway it went to work to make that exposition a success. To that end it obtained the co-operation of practically all of Southern California, and already it has secured subscriptions to its fund to the amount of a half million dollars or more. These facts San Francisco knew, could not help knowing, and yet she now steps in and, without as much as a by-your-leave, appropriates that year unto an exposition of her own. If this is not mere brute selfishness, what name would you, in some milder mood, give to it?

The big boy may wrest the small boy's apple from him, and, quite regardless of the tinier urchin's protests, calmly eat it. He has the brute force to do this thing, and so, too, may he have the callous selfishness; moreover, there may be at hand nobody large enough to spank him, but, just the same, he is not an admirable character, and deserves the spanking.

I deprecate this deed of shameless selfishness and disregard for the rights of another, because it is certain to engender an ill-will which must endure for years. It cannot terminate before 1915, and it will not for years after that date. San Francisco has the apple, and very likely she will eat it, but she will pay high for it in that increased enmity on the part of Southern California which sometimes, even now, is too visible. Can it be expected that the small boy will be fond of the big marauder who appropriated his fruit?

Thoughtful Man on Geary Street Road.

"I wish," said the Thoughtful Man, "to call your attention to the nobly altruistic spirit which characterizes the United Railroads, as its own perfumes of Araby characterize the gentle polecat. Have you noticed that they (I refer to the first of the pair) have placarded the city with appeals to the dear people to vote against the Geary-street outrage? It must have cost them a large sum of money, but have they flinched on that account? No, sir, not a flinch. They have saw their duty and, have did it, as our friend, Mose Gunst, might say.

"Base and unscrupulous traducers have let go of their straps long enough to assert that the United Railroads' motive in this proceeding was selfish. 'Can't you see,' they said, 'that—excuse me, madam, for stepping on your fragile toes—as I was saying, can't you see that—pardon me, madam, I did not deliberately sit in your luring lap; the crowd forced me—as I was about to remark, you can see that—What! have to wait for the next car? Oh, da—that is, I will tell you what I think of the United Railroads and the Geary-street proposition when we next are tele-scoped on a street-car together.'

"The base traducer's conversation may be somewhat involved in spots, but you cannot escape the inference that he is intending to hit the altruistic United Railroads. Yet anybody can see that they cannot have a personal and selfish interest in this proposition. They object on those high moral grounds which influence a boy with an apple when he protests against another boy eating the core—he doesn't care for the core himself, but he is afraid it may injure the other boy's digestion. The United Railroads is paying out its money (many thousands of fares at a nickel a strap) not because it has any selfish objection to the people running a car-line in their own interest, but because it fears for their digestion.

"The attitude of the public toward Mr. Calhoun and his interests is scandalous, don't you think so?" the Thoughtful Man inquired.
"Well, I don't know," said I. "Sometimes I have thought that the Heney vote didn't look that way."

An' I hear her, plain's can be,
"Law me!"

"Law—me!" She kind o' drew
Out the words es robins do
When their last good nights they say.
I'd be chatterin' away,
An' "Law me!" was what she said,
Or per'aps "Dear suz!" instead,
Or, if she could not agree,
"Dear me!"

Ain't much in the words fer you
'Less you knew Aunt Sally, too.
An' her gentle, lovin' ways—
Then they'd seem like words of praise,
And the tears you wouldn't blame
If into your eyes they came,
Waitin' for her words that fell:
"Well, well!"

Long time now since she passed through
Earthly mists to heaven's blue,
But I guess the angel throng
Sometimes stop right in their song
Jest to hear her say, "Law me!"
Or "Dear suz!" then smile maybe,
Knowin' all's es her words tell,
"Well—well."

The Dream of Fatima.

Reclining on her downy divan in her satined boudoir Fatima, the young and beautiful Oriental princess, dreamed a wonderful dream. In her vision a prince, tall, statuesque and handsome, came to her. And, behold! the prince loved Fatima, and Fatima loved the prince. And he was her'n, and she was his'n.

Awaking with a violent start, Fatima immediately rubbed her magic ring, and at once her favorite jin appeared, at the same time casually inquiring, "What wouldst thou, my mistress?"

"Bring the prince of my dream to me at once," Fatima ordered, at the same time imperiously stamping the floor with her No. 7 in its No. 3 slipper.

With a loud honk the jin departed, but soon he returned. "I cannot do thy bidding, fair mistress," he reported.

"Say not cannot to me," Fatima reproached; "say tinnot—it is more English, y'know. What is the matter? What broke?"

"Your prince is such stuff as dreams are made of, and I tinnot get at him. Is—that is, would anybody else do?"

"Well—er—yes," Fatima thoughtfully responded.

"Who?"

"Why, some—some man, you know."

So the jin's next job was an easy one.

For Fatima was but sixteen years old, and the dream of young love ever is the dream of young love, and—well, we all know how it is

The Limit of Americans' Travel.

William Clark Crittenden, the University of California graduate who was honored by selection for a Rhodes scholarship at Oxford, tells a rather good story of an incident in which he, with some others, figured.

It was during an Oxford vacation, and three or four American students were devoting it to travel. They had reached Vesuvius, and, standing on its summit, were looking down upon the fiery maelstrom below them. Naturally it was an intense moment, and one of the students gave expression to his emotions.

"It beats hell, doesn't it?" he said.

Thereupon a young woman who was standing at no great distance, turned, looked the students over, and then addressed a friend.

"It's astonishing how extensively these Americans travel, isn't it?" was what she said.

And the students said nothing more.

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Editor The California Weekly.

Your splendid fight for decency is much appreciated and should ultimately win the support of most of the people in California who stand for Right Things.

WILLIAM CRANSTON.

Palo Alto, Dec. 16, 1909.

There are those who stand for Right Things who feel that they do not require the bolstering aid of a paper that stands as they do, but rather that those who do not stand for Right Things are the ones to subscribe for such a paper as The California Weekly. There is some measure of truth in this, but, alas, it is not workable. Those who do not stand for Right Things do not much care for a paper that does, and it is upon those who do stand for Right Things that the right kind of papers must depend for that measure of patronage which will enable them to command advertising and so get on. Gradually the influence of a Right Things periodical does work out among and effect those whose ideals are not the best, and whose stand is not the loftiest. It is worth while to sustain good papers even if those who need them most do not come to their support first.

The California Weekly Staff.

Your paper is not only so good that I want it another year, but that I also want it in the homes of some of my friends and therefore enclose you my own renewal and two new subscribers for the coming year.

Yours respectfully,

E. A. GAMMON.

Courtland, Dec. 18, 1909.

Such things speak louder than words and they come often enough to encourage the hope that the power there is in suggestion may lead others to imitate Mr. Gammon's example. That is the kind of help that does The California Weekly the most good. If each subscriber were to send us two others this paper would step at once into a commanding position in the journalism of this state.

Editor The California Weekly.

I have been a regular patron of your splendid paper ever since its first copy was issued, having purchased it always from the newsstand, but now that the movement for "Equality Before the Law" promises to take on larger proportions and become state-wide in character, I think it well may be that you, and our leaders also, should know who and where your supporters are. I know of no better way than that of adding my name to your subscription roll for which please note enclosed check for $2.00.

Our battle for right must not be allowed to lapse on account of our recent defeat which, I believe, will prove only temporary in character. San Francisco's valiant "26,000" don't propose to give up the fight simply because of a "knock out" in the first round; our wind is good and when the gong rings we'll be there again, ready to make another strike for "citizenship before partyanship."

Yours truly,

WILL G. DARLING.

San Francisco, Dec. 6, 1909.

The note of courage sounded in the above letter is good to hear. There has not been one upward movement in all human history that was not achieved at the cost of defeat after defeat. That quality which results in human progress is like leaven which, hidden in the measures of meal, leavens the whole lump and no lump with 26,000 particles of leaven in it can long remain soggy, inert and unprofitable. The men under the ban in this city would give half they are worth to be reinstated in the good opinion of mankind, but this they cannot be without confessing their fault, making reparation and asking public forgiveness for the wrong they have inflicted upon the public, and not one of them has made one sign of doing anything of the kind. If they were to do so they would find the public ready to go more than half way to meet them. Instead of that they are brazenly trying to cheek it out. No, the case is not so nearly hopeless for those who stand for Right Things as for those who have not only transgressed the law but have crushed it.

Editor The California Weekly.

Dear Sir:—Herewith enclosed kindly find check for the subscription to your paper and for the "Highborn's History."

I am very glad to find in San Francisco a weekly that stands for righteousness amid the most sordid of influences. The object of upbuilding a government is certainly not better reached than by teaching your readers civic spirit.

Civism is what is wanted and unless the people are educated to it popular government will ever be a nullity, a government for the stronger, a mediaeval affair, a South American farce.

People ought to be educated that their right is their country's right and that next to bread and butter stands the welfare of the community, which is a government for all the people, and that no man or collection of men, no matter how powerful, should be allowed to get the best of a community, even if he has to suffer for it a while, because he is doing it for his future, for his children and because he owes it to himself as a freeman and to the institutions that made him a freeman. And to begin with, it would not be bad trying some means to compel the stubborn and the selfish with some laws like the one proposed by your Mr. Ray P. Brubaker; an idea that occurred to me also at the last elections, once that the people are taught that disregarding citizenship's duties is a crime amenable to law, unless it is for a reasonable cause, it is easy to awake the civic spirit which lies latent in all, and so render impossible the coalition of money and interests.

Sincerely yours,

C. O. FAUDA.

San Francisco, Dec. 14, 1909.

We gladly give space to the above letter, if for no other reason than to show the doubting that not all the spirit of liberty and love of justice comes from an Anglo-Saxon or a Celtic strain. The Latin also can be counted on to cherish freedom and resist encroachments upon the rights of men. Only one thing is needful to make democracy triumphant and permanent and that is to have each citizen discharge his civic duty promptly when it is due. It is the well meaning delinquent who is making all the trouble. He was numerous enough in San Francisco in the recent election to have changed the result had he gotten out and voted. What can be done to make this civic shirk do his part? In the answer to that question is involved the whole problem of free government. Roughly speaking one-third of almost any American population has no idea above selfish advantage, one-third is capable of exalting principle and making a sacrifice for the general welfare. The other third would stand right if not too spineless to stand at all. There is no problem connected with public affairs that lays larger claim upon thoughtful minds than this one of bringing into the civic struggle the help of the indifferent, the careless and the cowardly.

Editor The California Weekly.

My dear Sir:—I shall have pleasure in renewing my subscription to the Weekly and (since you have asked for opinions) to express my more than satisfaction with your work during the past year. I subscribed for the Weekly because I wished to show approval for its purposes, not expecting to read it very diligently, except when I wanted information on matters of local politics; but I have been surprised to find that, though I take and read the Nation, Collier's and Harper's weeklies, the Independent and the Literary Digest, I find good matter in your journal, in fields of general and literary interest, which I should not care to miss.

Regarding your School for Citizenship, which I note has awakened some discussion, let me say that I think the plan an admirable one, and that its execution is at fault largely in the matter of style. You need a full page for matter which you condense into a column—if you would attract younger readers. At present the information given reads like the abstract of a chapter on the subject, without the "filling in" and illustrative matter that make things readable. A recent paper on the law of tax assessments was admirable in the ground covered, but seemed to me so condensed that it would really be understood—not to say found interesting—only by persons already familiar with the subject-matter.

Wishing you increased success during the coming year, I am,

Very truly yours,

RAYMOND W. ALDEN.

Palo Alto, Cal., Dec. 20, 1909.

The Staff appreciates the above compliment and criticism. The California Weekly is different. No matter how many other periodicals one takes and reads he will still find need for The California Weekly for the reason that nothing else quite covers the ground that it covers. It has a definite personality. It is not formed after any existing model. For that reason people have had to learn to like it, but that they are forming The California Weekly habit is evidenced by the fact of almost universal renewal of subscriptions as they expire.

The comment on the School for Citizenship is much to the point, but unfortunately the space available is limited to the space given. The only remedy at present applicable is to treat less at a time and so, perhaps, more lucidly. The suggestion is valuable.

To the Editor of The California Weekly.

Sir:—It is scarcely worth while for an economist to take account of every misrepresentation of the aims

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Politics With Indexed Cards The Los Angeles Times does not like Meyer Lissner of Los Angeles. The Times regards every effort making for civic decency as a personal affront aimed at the General and, inasmuch as Meyer Lissner has been indefatigable and successful in his efforts to redeem Los Angeles from "organization" rule, he has become the special object of the Times' villification. Among other things that the Times objects to in the methods of Lissner is that he does not "do" politics as others are wont to "do" politics. The Times is right about that. The method is totally different. The "organization," by the aid of the saloon and the maquereau, rounds up the floating, or "push" vote, "passes the word down the line," and, if the reputable vote can be divided on party, or some other irrelevant issue, the balance of power can be held by the "push" and is generally so held. That is "doing politics" according to the rules of the game. Mr. Lissner and his friends work differently. They long ago made a card index covering all the voters in the city and they keep it corrected. Then they make their appeal through the mail directly to the citizen. There is no "passing the word down the line," no "orders" given or taken, just a plain pointing out of all the facts in each case for the information of the individual voter. When he has been shown what he ought to do for his city, the voter is urged to do it. The postage bill is a big one, but the whisky bill is not. The plan works. That's why the Times objects to it.

Sidestepping the Laws of the Land Paul Morris, a supervisor of Tuolumne county, has been indicted by the grand jury of that county on a felony charge. He sidestepped the law forbidding a supervisor being interested in furnishing supplies to the county. He had the supplies furnished in the name of his bookkeeper, but for his own and not the bookkeeper's benefit. Very likely the county got value received and no harm was done, save that the law was violated, but that was harm enough. It needs to be dinged into the political and official consciousness that the plain intent of the law is to be followed and not sidestepped, and if Tuolumne county shall make an example of Paul Morris the state may be the gainer thereby.

As Well Parker As Any Other Every once in a while rumor gets busy with the retirement of Walter F. X. Parker from the management of the Southern California end of the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau. This time it goes so far as to name his probable successor, one D. C. McGarvin. Whether Mr. Parker continues as under boss for Boss Herrin, or resigns to give place to another is wholly unimportant. We may as well have Parker there as any other. He is not more unscrupulous, more designing or more an enemy to free government than his successor is likely to be. What is wanted is to end the system of which he has so long been a part and re-establish in the place of that system a free government by a free people. A good beginning looking to that end was made in the recent election in Los Angeles. Whip that system often enough and hard enough and it will be glad to quit.

The Stockton Movement Stockton is now reveling in Sunday drinking and a general Democratic-saloon domination, with results that are sure to become odious to all good citizenship without regard to party, and Stockton finds itself in this predicament through partisan politics in municipal affairs. Already voters are being canvassed, one by one, and invited to go on a card record saying: "I am opposed to political domination by saloons;" "I am in favor of county, township and precinct option;" "I will support only such candidates for office as will publicly endorse the foregoing declarations."

We can not have Right Things in our political life with the saloon power dominant.

The Bee in the Bonnet Of Friend W. Richardson The back country newspaper talk of Friend W. Richardson for governor has, until now, been looked upon as one of the jovialities of the season, not to be taken seriously and certainly not to be looked upon with any disfavor so far as passing compliments is concerned, but Friend W. Richardson stands about as much chance of being nominated and elected governor of California as he does of being made Ahkoond of Swat. Friend W. is a good fellow, and he is president of the California Press Association, and the California Press Association is, and ever has been, a protege of the Southern Pacific Company. Most of the boys who belong to it do not know this. For years, if not until now, and probably now, the Southern Pacific gave it an annual pension of $1500 to help it get together and, under the able chaperoning of the late William H. Mills, it did good work in enabling the country editor to see over the rim of his home horizon, and all was well. But away down deep the purpose of the organization, the $1500 a year, the outings and all were to gain for the Southern Pacific Railroad Company and its Political Bureau what Mr. Mills aptly styled the "negative friendship" of the interior press of the state and, with rare exceptions, it fulfilled its mission. There is no good reason for supposing that it has ceased to do likewise, and there is at least some reason to fear that it is now being used, not to Richardson's advantage, but to the hurt of good politics in this state. The only way the Southern Pacific's political bureau can beat the forces of decency before the people is by dividing those forces on a multiplicity of candidates. Therefore, look out.

The Knight-Gillett Late Unpleasantness That the sonorous vocabulary of George Knight should be heard reverberating through the corridors of the new Palace in criticism of the governor of California is not new, except as to the place. The soul of Knight was made bitter soon after the inauguration of Gillett and, upon one occasion, he so made the welkin ring in the bar of the St. Francis that the doors leading to the upper floors had to be held shut to prevent shocking the sensibilities of guests. It was not that Knight loved Gillett less with his mask off than with his mask on, but the obviousness of George Hatton as factotum of Gillett had so given the lie to Knight's repeated assurances to the people that Gillett was "no man's man" that he could contain himself no longer. The finding of Gillett's name and Hatton's on the same door at the St. Francis so outraged Knight that he simply roared. It will all blow over. Knight and Gillett are good friends. The fact that Knight stands for Curry for governor is also gratifying. It precludes any possibility of his trying to break into the ranks of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, "for which the Lord be thankit."

In the Case of San Pedro Harbor The only way for a person to enter San Pedro Harbor without trespassing upon what is claimed to be private property is to enter through the neck of the bottle from the ocean and go out the same way he came in. And yet that harbor constitutes the road to the world's highway which the commerce of perhaps one-fourth of this continent needs to use. The Southern Pacific Company, and allied interests, have surrounded the whole harbor and, so far as in them lies, have reduced what should have been a public heritage forever to private ownership. If their title holds good, not a pound of freight can go in or out of that harbor without paying toll to one or other of these allied corporations, now and forever. A case involving the title in fee to tide lands surrounding this harbor was recently brought in the Superior Court of Los Angeles county by the Attorney General of this state, who seeks to set aside the patents issued by the state to the claimants of these lands. The values involved run into the millions, as they stand now, and the future is not unlikely to raise those values to hundreds of millions, in strategic advantage as well as in selling price.

What a Position To Put a Man In! At the outset the writer of this wishes to say that he has read with care the printed copy of the oral argument made by Attorney General U. S. Webb in this case and, so far as he is able to judge from an exparte presentation of the issue, General Webb seems to have made both an honest, a vigorous and what should prove a successful fight to upset the patents to the lands which surround San Pedro harbor. The Watchman can not find an admission, omission or commission which even squints at want of zeal and sincerity in the cause of the People in this case. But what a position to put a man in! General Webb is and ever has been known to be an "organization" man through and through. He was appointed to office by Governor Gage, an "organization" governor from center to circumference, and he has since twice been nominated for the office he holds by conventions dominated by "organization" politicians, the term "organization" being a polite phrase for designating the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company. And yet to a man so nominated, so elected and so affiliated, has been confided the task of representing the People in litigation involving the rights of shippers of a fourth of the continent to the end of time. The writer knows nothing of the matter, but it is not beyond the realm of possibility that the very judge before whom the case was tried may have owed his nomination and election to the activities of Walter Parker, and to whom the judges of the appellate bench owe their nomination is matter of common notoriety, not to mention the supreme bench. It is plain enough that such a condition of affairs ought not to exist, and it could not exist under a government that was representative of the People instead of the corporations.

Is Webb at Outs With the Bureau? In justice to General Webb, and his connection with the foregoing litigation, it is proper to say that there are rumors afloat that he is no longer persona grata with the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company. In fact, it has for some time been common talk in the corridors of the state capitol that he is to be dropped. The reasons why are given about as follows: When the issue of discrimination in freights came before the state railroad commission last year Attorney General Webb was appealed to by the commissioners to know if they had power under the law to make investigation and, so it leaked out, in full confidence that he would hold that the commission had not the requisite powers. What, then, was their chagrin, and the disappointment of the Political Bureau, when the Attorney General advised the commissioners that they had power to act! The next cause of offense alleged to have been committed by General Webb was his drafting of the Stetson railroad regulation bill, which received the support of the better element in the legislature, and appears to have been a sincere measure. It was sidetracked for the Wright bill, a measure from which nobody hopes any very good thing. The third jolt was Webb's taking the side of Kingsbury in state land legislation last winter. The final blow, however, is believed to be the taking up, in the name of the state, of the litigation mentioned above for annulling patents to tide lands surrounding San Pedro harbor. Of course the Political Bureau has no use for any man, judge, surveyor general, attorney general or poundmaster who does not remember at the crucial moment who it was who made him, but that bureau slips up sometimes by picking a man who stands up, just as the People slip up by picking a man who falls down. The Watchman hopes that these rumors are well founded.

The Democrats Also Running

Senator J. B. Sanford, chairman of the legislative Democratic caucus, has issued a call for a meeting of the untitled at San Francisco on January 7, to consider the condition of the state and the Democratic party of the state, in which call the hope is held out that a "union of reform forces can sweep the state from one end to the other and emancipate California from boss domination and corporation control." The Senator is right. Such a union would do it. The Senator is also right when he declares that "What the people want is good government, caring very little through what avenue it is secured." Let the reform forces in the California Democracy therefore beware how they get together here in San Francisco and put themselves into the custody of one of Mr. Herrin's most adroit, dependable and resourceful reciprocal coadjutors. The Democrats will have to emancipate their party as certainly as the Republicans will have to emancipate theirs, and the best service either Republicans or Democrats can render the state is to make that emancipation thorough. No gain in state affairs will prove permanent that is not backed by a regenerated political party.

Consternation in The House of Curry

Gentle whisperings blow hitherward from Curry's own office to the effect that Mayor-elect P. H. McCarthy has been writing his friends among the labor unionists in the northern part of the state that he and his followers are going to do what they can for Gillett and not Curry betwixt now and next August's primary election. From another direction comes the further information that resolute labor men have read the riot act to McCarthy and pointedly declare that they are not to be delivered to Gillett or anybody else like a band of branded sheep. So there you are! Things have a way of leaking out and it leaked out directly after the late election in San Francisco that the offensive and defensive arrangement entered into between McCarthy and the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau contemplated working the same kind of a game on the state that had met with so much success in San Francisco, but it may be doubted if it can be worked as well. McCarthy has a few thousand men in San Francisco who are ready enough to do his bidding, register as Republicans and vote as Democrats or anyhow he wants them to do, but it is to be doubted if that kind of mastery can be extended much beyond the political atmosphere of San Francisco, where every man seems to want a boss and does not know how to behave when he is without one.

SAM WELLER'S ORIGIN.

If Dickens molded his character of Sam Weller upon anyone it was on the imaginary Simon Spatterdash, a character in the farce entitled "The Boarding House," played for the first time at the Lyceum theater on August 27, 1811, again in 1822, and which was very popular from 1830-1836 at the Surrey and other playhouses. Sam Weller was introduced into "The Pickwick Papers" in 1836. Simon Spatterdash was continually uttering what have since become known as "Wellerisms," and a selection of them will be found in a pamphlet entitled "The Origin of Sam Weller," which booklet also gives a full history of the subject. The original impersonator of Simon was Samuel Vale, and here again is another suggestion for Sam Weller's name. Sam Vale—Sam Valer—Sam Veller. Convert the "V" into a "W" and there you are, as Sam Weller himself would have put it—Sam Weller.

THE MODERN LABOR UNION

II. THE OPPOSITION TO UNIONISM.

BY CHARLES R. BROWN.

In the preceding article I spoke almost exclusively of the claims which may be properly advanced on behalf of the labor unions and it is only just that some of the more cogent objections urged against the practices of organized labor should be considered with equal frankness. Some of the objections popularly advanced are not to be taken too seriously. It is comparatively easy for any one to fix upon some stupid requirement adopted by some local union in the days of its callowness, or to bring forward some bit of tyranny practiced by an unwise labor leader which has no warrant whatsoever in justice or in reason, where some union became intoxicated with its new-found sense of power, or to hit upon the utterance of some loud-mouthed demagogue who is misleading the real working men, and then upon that exceedingly slender basis of fact to rear a mighty structure of violent condemnation. But such facts as these may be in no sense representative facts and the man who is pronouncing judgment upon the cause of organized labor on such a narrow and prejudiced showing may be merely a victim of the non-significant detail.

Opposition to the Closed Shop.

There has come in late years an increasing and now an all but universal recognition of the necessity for some sort of organization among the working men, even on the part of those who are opposed to many of the union methods. It is less than a century ago that seven scissoring-grinders in the city of London were arrested and sentenced to three months' imprisonment, for belonging to a club which paid to its members "out of work benefits" and sought to maintain the customary rates. Such an extreme attitude is altogether a thing of the past, but there are even now many intelligent and conscientious men who freely admit the right of workers to combine in order to increase wages and to reduce hours, but when these workers undertake to have their wishes and judgment considered in the fixing of the ratio of apprentices to the journeymen employed in a certain establishment, or to say something about restricting the output per man, or to express their minds in an organized way as to the regulation and the use of machinery, or to insist upon what is known as the "closed shop," then these same men are strongly opposed to the union.

The question of the number or ratio of apprentices in any given establishment is indeed a delicate one and into its determination a large amount of wisdom and experience must enter. But that some restriction is needed is perfectly evident when we witness the attempts of certain employers to make the admission of apprentices an excuse for introducing into the shops a disproportionate number of underpaid young boys, thus endeavoring to have the work done more cheaply than it could be done by trained and competent craftsmen. There can be no arbitrary rule laid down to meet all conditions, but the self-interest of the employer in his desire to reduce the labor cost by the employment of boys needs to be constantly held in check by the interest of the men in maintaining such conditions for the trade which they have been at pains to learn, as to enable them to receive a living wage and to guard against having the trade in a particular locality so overcrowded as to compel men to bid against each other in order to secure work, until that reasonable standard of wages shall have been broken down. We shall more nearly approximate that ratio between the number of apprentices and the number of journeymen in a given establishment which is truly an equitable one, when the decision is reached as the result of conference and compromise between the two contending interests. It would not increase the chance of having justice done for the working men to abandon their organized expression of judgment touching that mooted question.

Restriction of Output.

The habit of restricting the output has undoubtedly been grossly abused here and there, in a way that has tended to lower the average efficiency of the men and to needlessly increase the cost of production. The legitimate contention at this point is intended merely to guard the man of average strength and speed against being "rushed" by some man of exceptional strength and skill who, openly or secretly receiving an extra wage, is expressly engaged as a pace setter to the manifest disadvantage and actual injury of his fellows. In this way ordinary men are sometimes rapidly worked out and are broken down sometimes at forty by such over-crowding; and in the long run not only the individual but the whole trade and the public itself incurs serious and sometimes irreparable loss by such unnatural crowding. There is no doubt, however, but that with unwise leadership and because of short-sighted self-interest the principle of restricting output has been wrongfully and hurtfully used in certain industries.

"Open Shop" a Sophistry.

The insistence upon "the closed shop" or more accurately the unionized shop is in the last analysis, stripped of all sophistry and the misplaced sentiment which sometimes clouds the issue, simply a question as to the existence or the destruction of the union. If non-union men are employed in a certain establishment and if union men consent to work side by side with them on the same terms, then the real motive for maintaining the union will be almost entirely removed and presently in the absence of any organization the working men will again be in the old position of having to resort to individual bargaining instead of utilizing the more equitable principle of collective bargaining. And as a consequence they will again find themselves at the mercy of the more unscrupulous members of the employing class, who by cutting prices in the markets of the world will compel the more equitable employers of labor to reduce their wage scales in order to meet this severer competition.

There is nothing heroic or admirable about the attitude of the non-union man when we thresh it all out. The sympathy expended on "the scab," as he is vulgarly called, is largely the misplaced sympathy of the uninformed. He is the man who is content to remain outside the union, eagerly availing himself of whatever improved conditions in the trade the efforts of union men may have secured, but refusing meanwhile to incur any of the burdens or responsibilities which belong to membership in the union. He may indeed be able to offer certain well-grounded criticisms of union procedure, but this fact does not warrant him in entirely withholding his own measure of co-operation in a cause which at bottom is just.

Non-Union "Copperheads."

During our civil war there were men here and there in the north who were known as copperheads; they were non-union men. They too might have found certain plausible reasons for withholding their support from the union—reasons satisfactory to those who were ready to be satisfied with them. They could have said with a considerable show of justice that in the conduct of the war McClellan was too cautious and Burnside was too rash, and Halleck was too sluggish, and various other items in the campaigns of the northern forces were open to serious criticism. Even so, the country, as a whole, had nothing but well deserved contempt for the men who, enjoying the advantages which these political institutions of ours had secured to them, thus stood apart from the self-sacrificing efforts of their fellow citizens to preserve the union and to free the slaves.

And in the great struggle of the working men to better their condition, by securing a more equitable distribution of the results of co-operating muscle and brain and by making the conditions of their employment more humane, those who are familiar with all the facts have, as a rule, very scant sympathy for the industrial copperheads who, hoping to share in the benefits of victory, meanwhile refuse to bear the burdens of the struggle and who by their apathy and ill-advised aid rendered to the other side, even retard the forces which are working on their behalf. The refusal of union men to work in what is euphoniously and insincerely called "the open shop," is at bottom simply the refusal of loyal men to meet and fellowship those who show themselves disloyal to the common cause of labor.

Strike Violence.

The violence and brutality of some union men toward professional strike-breakers or toward non-union men who are seeking employment and thus aiding the employers in breaking the strike, cannot for a moment be defended. We live in a land where the determination of questions of policy must be effected by ballots, not by bullets or brick-bats. All such violence is strongly condemned by the reputable unions and by labor leaders generally, but it has not been entirely eliminated from any of the great strikes.

This violence must be set down to the incomplete moral development of men who in struggling in their own interest and in the interests of their families, sometimes forget what means are admissible and what means are criminal. The individual local unions and indeed the whole labor movement is making its way up through the rashness and turbulence of youth, up through its whooping cough and measles, up through its boyish fits of uncontrolled temper and street fights, toward that better ordered life and service which belong to maturity. Even so respectable and conservative a labor organization as the "Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers," which is now everywhere recognized and dealt with on a manly, businesslike basis by all the railroads in the country, had its period of unwisdom and employed in its earlier days certain methods which were altogether reprehensible. And this was a union of highly skilled labor! It is, therefore, incumbent upon the public to show some considerable measure of patience toward the "Amalgamated Order of Scavengers" or toward any other group of unskilled laborers, when they fail to display those qualities which belong to the higher levels of reason and justice.

A Clerical Analogy.

It has been cleverly pointed out by Dean Hodges of the Episcopal Theological School in Cambridge, Mass., that so respectable and worthy an institution as the Christian church had a corresponding period, when moral suasion seeming slow and ineffective, it also resorted to just such violence as now and then disfigures the contentions of the working men. In the reign of Queen Mary, the union was the United Catholics of England. They were determined that no non-unionist should hold ecclesiastical office in that realm and that no citizen should be baptized, or confirmed, or receive the sacrament of the altar, except at the hands of an official of the ecclesiastical union. Non-unionist Christians were insulted, fined, forbidden the right of assembly and boycotted. Some of the more obstinate and aggressive were put to death. Cranmer, Ridley and Latimer were burned at the stake as non-union bishops. In Queen Elizabeth's day, the union was the Brotherhood of Anglican Churchmen and the non-conformist sometimes had his ears cut off because he insisted on remaining out of the union. In Cromwell's day it was the Amalgamated Association of Congregationalists and Presbyterians.

They all behaved very much alike, doing the same kind of thing for which we now reprobate the working man. In New England, whither men had come ostensibly to secure the right for every man to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, the men who belonged to the established order whipped the non-union Baptists and the non-union Quakers. Whoever would thoroughly understand modern unionism in some of its unattractive phases, has but to read church history. We have grown wiser now and religion has learned to rely upon the power of instruction, persuasion and moral appeal—in time the labor unions will all of them, as many of them have already, see the wisdom of this course and cheerfully adopt that better policy which alone will stand the test of time.

SANTA CLARA VS. SALOONS.

The uprising against the saloon took a dramatic and impressive shape in Santa Clara county two weeks ago. The little city of Los Gatos was suddenly alive with visitors, special trains emptied at the station, the streets were crowded. A thousand and more men and women, from every corner of the county, thronged there on a business day—a Thursday—in the height of the busy season, to organize a political movement for the sole purpose thus announced in the report of the committee on organization: "We have gathered in mass meeting today to express our united desire to be rid of saloons and roadhouses in Santa Clara county, and that we may organize to conduct a successful campaign to this end."

The local theater proved too small to accommodate the crowd, and the overflow held meetings at a local church. Business men, professional men, and clergy joined in the practical preliminary work of the campaign. The organization adopted the name of the Clean County Co-operative Council. A nominating committee selected seventy members of a county central committee of 100, leaving the choice of the remaining thirty to the seventy named. An executive committee of fifteen will be chosen by the committee of 100 to direct the actual campaign.

Thirty-one members of the committee of 100 were present. These members subscribed, on the spot, $615 toward a campaign fund. General subscriptions in the audience made up an additional sum of $460. A cash collection netted $78.35, making the total campaign fund subscribed during the day $1,153.35. A careful canvass, to be made in the near future, will undoubtedly increase this sum by several thousand dollars.

(Concluded.)

EIGHTEEN years passed. I had removed with my family to the Pacific coast, settling in the chief town of an important lumbering district, and had been long enough a resident to be accounted a pioneer when the community was startled by a more than usually sensational murder which had been committed on Wild river. "Who killed Poker Bill?" seemed as little likely of being satisfactorily answered as, "Who struck Billy Patterson?"

Wiseacres wagged their heads and conjectured, and half the loafers in the county turned detectives and undertook to "work up" the case. As such busy-bodies are seldom content to acknowledge themselves baffled, with some unanimity they fixed the crime upon Ah Chin, a Chinese who had been cooking for a gang of loggers. A warrant for his arrest was issued and the much protesting Celestial was spirited away to avoid lynching and thrown into jail to await his trial.

The facts of the murder were these: A morphine "fiend" and gambler had been hanging about the camp and adjacent village for several weeks, consorting with Chinese and taking part in such games of chance as unwarly loggers could be inveigled into. No one knew his name but he was commonly known as Poker Bill or the "Wapper-jawed gambler." One morning this worthy was found stretched at full length by the side of a redwood log, stone dead, and with a small, keen-bladed knife thrust into his breast. Fastened to the knife was a bit of unprinted margin torn from a newspaper upon which was written the words, "I have found your heart at last, William—so shall you abide with me in hell."

My services were retained by the Cong Chow company to defend the accused and I at once entered upon my work. I had not anticipated any connection with the case and so had not been present at the coroner's inquest, nor had I, to my knowledge, seen deceased during life, but being informed with much particularity about him, I was strongly impressed by the description of the wound in his face. It brought to my mind a chain of events which had become a half-forgotten memory.

The wound which Katherine inflicted upon Harper left a scar which would make his identity unmistakable. The bullet had carried away portions of the lower jaw upon both sides, giving his face a krinkly appearance never to be forgotten if seen once. I had the body disinterred. One glance sufficed. The corpse was wrinkled and gray and blanched by immoderate use of opium, but in life it had been tenanted by William Harper.

A theory as to the murderer came into my mind unbidden, but it was only a theory, with nothing whatever to substantiate it. I could obtain no trace of Katherine, for no strange woman had been about the camp and those habitually there were prudent wives of sturdy lumbermen. The only stranger seen at all was an aged and bearded invalid who had spent a fortnight in the woods in search of health, and not finding it, had gone his way a day or two after the murder.

The case came on for trial. The prosecuting attorney was able and zealous—unduly zealous it seemed to me, but in these days of judicial tardiness it is regarded as a great achievement to secure a prompt conviction, and, right or wrong, the fellow was determined to convict if by any means he might.

The chain of evidence forged about the Chinaman, while wholly circumstantial, was cunningly wrought and strong. It was proven that deceased had taken meals at the cook-house without paying for them and that defendant had repeatedly berated him for so doing; that on the very day of the murder he had ejected deceased from the house and had applied threatening language to him. It was in evidence also that defendant was ill-tempered and malicious and generally regarded as a "bad Chinaman," and one witness positively identified the knife as one he had seen the accused have in his possession prior to the murder.

Furthermore, it was shown that the Chinaman, who had been educated at a mission school, was a facile penman. Proud of his accomplishment, he was ever ready to reproduce the handwriting of others for the edification of on-lookers and, thanks to the consummate imitateness of his race, his attempts were often successful beyond expectation. Upon some pretext he had been induced to copy the very slip found upon the dead man's bosom and had done it with so much skill that one unaccustomed to discriminate might readily suppose that both pieces had been written by the same hand.

The case had been fought step by step and point by point for nearly a week. The court room was crowded almost to suffocation and popular feeling was strongly against the prisoner. I had been too long at the bar not to be able to read from the faces of the jury as my last witness left the stand that it would go hard with my client if nothing more conclusive were put in evidence.

Resting my elbow upon the table before me and my head upon my hand, I permitted my mind to run back over the case from first to last, becoming so absorbed that I was scarcely conscious of a rustling of skirts back of me and a husky voice whispering in my ear, "Have you no other evidence?" Mechanically, I answered, "No," thinking that one of my brethren at the bar had spoken.

A profound stir throughout the court room recalled me to myself. I looked up. A woman in deep black had ascended to the witness stand, and turning toward the venerable clerk, and raising her right hand, "I wish to be sworn," she said.

"Katherine!" I cried springing to my feet and rushing toward her, "Katherine! you must not! You shall not!" Turning full upon me and gently waving me backward, "Pardon me, sir," she said, "I must and I will."

The clerk must have caught something of solemnity from Katherine's face and voice or from the breathless interest of the audience, for, at variance with a custom of twenty years, he lifted high his hand and with voice clear but wavering administered the oath slowly and impressively.

"My name is Katherine Dunbar," the witness said, sinking into her chair and leaning heavily upon its arm, "and I am forty-one years old. I live anywhere, for I have not had a home for twenty years."

She spoke with much effort and hollowly, but so perfect was her enunciation that not one word was lost in all that crowded court room.

"The name of deceased, for whose murder you were about to convict this Chinaman, was William Harper, and it was I who killed him."

As she spoke she raised her right arm and stretched it forth before judge and jury. Her fingers were long and toil-stained and her arm was bony and shrivelled. Her eyes, deep set, glowed like polished ebony and her skin had shrunken tense and shiny upon the bones of her face and forehead.

"If it please the court," she continued, "it may not be in accordance with usual forms, but I beg you to hear my confession now. I feel myself nerved with power to speak, but my life is far spent and if I do not speak now I fear I may never tell the things I ought."

Bidden to proceed, she told the story of her life and the court stenographer took it down. So much as the reader already knows need not be repeated, but that which follows was taken from the official record and completes the narrative.

"Up to the instant of firing the shot which wounded William Harper I had no purpose in my mind to take his life; but when he refused to marry me, as in the blindness of my infatuation it had seemed to me he could not, after I had made the way so clear, all the love I had ever cherished for him went out of my heart and in its place came hate. In passing to and from my work I was often out at night alone and once had been assaulted. Afterward I always carried arms, the use of which my father taught me in childhood.

"Discharged from custody, I caught up my child and ran, half-crazed, to the river's brink and would have plunged in but my babe was afraid and cried, so, seeing a boat near by, I got into it and rowed to an island in the middle of the stream and there lay hidden under overhanging willows until night came. I sang softly to my baby boy under the willows until he fell asleep, thinking it better so that he should drown, waking in heaven; but he looked so pretty there in the bottom of the boat and so trustful that I could not, and we drifted away in the darkness.

"All night we drifted down that sweet old river, baby sleeping and I weeping, praying and sometimes vowing vengeance upon him who had cast us off; but by and by we passed out of our river and into a turbulent stream where I was afraid for baby's sake, and for his sake God led my footsteps far into the country to the home of a sweet, Christian family where I remained almost a year.

"They were humble, farmer folks and learned to love my boy, for they were childless, but me they feared, for hate grew big in my heart and I became a morbid thing with reason half dethroned. When I sought upon my knees to pray, 'Father, forgive as I forgive,' my soul cried out in very mockery, 'Hate as I hate, ha! ha! Hate as I hate, ha! ha!' and I knew by this that my soul was dead.

"Then I looked upon my child and asked myself, 'Can a mother whose soul is dead rear a child in the fear of the Lord?' and immediately I sought these good people of whom I have spoken, and leading them to the cradle where my baby lay sleeping, told them all—how that I had sinned and that my soul was dead within me and for my baby's sake I would have them take him and rear him as their own child, and they consented, but the conditions were hard—that I should go away and never come back any more, or seek to see my boy again so long as I should live. Only God knows how hard this was for me, but I promised; upon my knees by the side of my baby's bed I promised, and so well have I kept my word that I know not whether my child be dead or living, for I have seen him only in my dreams.

"I now turned my steps to seek out William Harper that I might be revenged upon him, but I sought long before I found him in the penitentiary of a distant state serving a term for forgery. But I found him; found, too, that he had become a penitent, 'had prostrated himself at the seat of mercy and been forgiven of heaven,' so the prison chaplain told me.

"The words of the pious chaplain pierced my heart like a naked sword. My brain swirled and I thought I should die upon the street before reaching my lodgings. William! Ah! he had not murder in his heart that his soul should die within him. It drove me mad to think that William had found favor in the sight of heaven and, dying, should live forever before God's face, while I, silly fool undone by him, was damned while yet alive—aye, and tortured, too.

"Oh! my heart was hard. Going out under the stars alone I raised my hands on high and swore a wicked oath. I swore that inasmuch as William Harper had beguiled me, despoiling me of honor, of promised wifehood, of my sweet child, of love, of hope of heaven; so I, Katherine Dunbar, would beguile him that he also should lose his soul, hating as I hated and suffering as I suffered. From that day until the day of his death, seventeen long years, I never swerved from my purpose.

"Of all these years of dread pursuit I need not speak, nor of the arts employed to gain my end, for only God, myself and the prince of darkness shall ever know of these. Discharged from the penitentiary, penniless, I dogged his steps unknown and spread his reputation before all so that no one would give him work to do, and when he had fallen low and I thought his spirit ripe for hell, some fatality ever stepped between him and me so that I could not wreak my will upon him.

"A craven at heart, fear of death always brought him to his knees that the waters of contrition might break over him and his soul cry out in supplications for mercy. I have brought him to the very brink of destruction, when a half murmured prayer or repentant sigh sheathed the knife and sent me forth upon his track again. Apples of Sodom, how have I devoured them! As a holy sister of mercy, telling my beads and murmuring prayers, I nursed him when ill that I might tutor him into slavery to opium, for such drugs have power to kill the souls of men. But for this I might have failed.

"Consumption fastened its fangs within my flesh, but while William Harper lived to whimper, sin, repent and whine I could not die and would not. The aged and bent old man hobbling about the logging camp in search of health was I who had risen from a bed long kept to follow a trail long lost.

"For once William Harper's ill fortune waited upon my purpose. His stock of morphine had been stolen and frenzy seized upon his frame. Accusing this Chinaman of the theft, he was thrown from the door raving, trembling like a despicable thing at point of dissolution.

"I saw all this and crossing to where William sat leaning against a fallen redwood, cursing and impotently plotting against the prisoner there, 'Friend,' said I, 'you are ill and ill-treated, too, but there is that within this vial which will calm your nerves and give you peace. I keep it by me constantly.'

"He snatched the vial from my hand and swallowed enough of the drug to kill ten common men and when it had produced insensibility, I gave him enough to kill ten more and went away until darkness should come.

"I took good care to speak to those I met that they might remember my going, but once out of sight I plunged into the redwoods and stole along a lonely path until I came where William lay in brutish sleep. I pricked him with my knife that he should die in blasphemy, and when I heard vile curses bubbling up and saw them taking form upon his lips, I thrust my pretty bodkin home. A convulsive shudder, a feeble fluttering, and 'twas over. I had won."

Katherine stood, half risen from her chair, her eyes gleaming, her bosom heaving, her whole being wrought to highest pitch of intensity, and above the stifling tension of the house was heard her deep and labored breathing as she spoke.

"Oh! the ecstasy, the intoxication of it. Seventeen years of inflexible pursuit, torn by passion, tortured by despair—but here at last was victory!

"I fled away into the impenetrable darkness of the thickly littered forest, treading the air it seemed rather than the earth, for not once did I touch my foot to stumble, but reaching my lodgings and stealing lightly up the stair, I cast myself upon my bed and fainted away. When I opened my eyes again the sun was high and the murder of William Harper was in the mouth of every one.

"My reason tells me that which I have done is monstrous, but my soul speaks no word of censure and a peace has come in upon my spirit which I have not known since father and I used to play and sing together at home on summer evenings. I have transgressed the law, but I shall give a life for the life I took as I have slain a soul for the soul that William Harper slew. Where I go he shall go and what I suffer he shall suffer. But be speedy I charge you with your penal enginery lest death come upon me by the way and cheat the law of its vindication due."

Having concluded, Katherine attempted to descend out of the witness box into the sheriff's custody, but a frayed bit of carpet binding tripped her foot and threw her headlong down the stair. Springing forward, I caught her in my arms, but a crimson torrent burst from her mouth and I bore her, bleeding, to my home near by.

All night my wife and I sat by the sufferer's bed looking upon a face as calm, as motionless as marble and every whit as white, but when morning came and the great bank of fog rolled away so that the sun looked down, we saw that she was dead.

and rests of his subject that appears in the public press. But when a journal usually so well informed as The California Weekly gives currency to characterizations of political economy so wide of the mark as those contained in your editorial of December 17th, I, for one, am unwilling to let the assertions pass unchallenged.

Economists, at least, have always understood that "economic laws" are, at best, only statements of important general tendencies that have to be taken into account by everyone who seeks insight into the complexities of the present industrial situation. That there are a thousand and one "ifs" which prevent these "laws," taken alone, from leading to an accurate and complete description of economic life, is nowhere more explicitly recognized than in the pages of economic treatises. For an economist to postulate free competition and free contract as premises in an examination of certain very important forces affecting prices and incomes should be no more misleading than for a physicist to neglect friction and the resistance of the atmosphere in a discussion of the force of gravitation. When the principles of physics are utilized in engineering practice due account has to be taken of these disturbing factors. The relation of general economic principles of tested validity to the determination of public economic policies ("social engineering") should be a similar one. Fortunately or unfortunately, however, there seems to be no immediate danger that economic principles shall have even their due recognition in the formulation of social policies.

Mr. Kent, in the admirable paper which furnished the occasion of your editorial, was careful to focus his attack on the "old Laissez-Faire School of political economy," whose doctrines might properly be left undisturbed as part of the now partially discredited intellectual creed of an elder generation. But in fact his target is largely a scarecrow of his own making. No political economist ever taught, even implicitly, that "the cheapest production was what was wanted regardless of any other social element." There is nothing in political economy, past or present, which justifies the inference that the only orthodox prescription for the economic ills of the coal miner in Pennsylvania is migration to Kansas and wheat raising. The "sacredness of free contract" has never been a doctrine of political economy.

The thing which Mr. Kent really wished to attack, I imagine, is that kind of political philosophy which is best illustrated by the Declaration of Independence and kindred documents—a political philosophy of which the political writings of Herbert Spencer are a belated expression, and which was taken as granted by some economists who wrote in the later eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, as it was by other men who felt the intellectual current of that age. It might be argued with some assurance that this "natural rights individualism" was, in its day, the best-fitting and most effective general statement of the ideals and impulses of those men who labored hard and successfully to overthrow the artificial political distinctions which seemed then to be the greatest barriers in the way of social progress. Be that as it may, there is no question but that it has to be sadly twisted and tortured into new shapes if it is to express, even with partial adequacy, the social ideals of this generation. It is pretty thoroughly embedded, however, in American constitutional law, and its retention there has greatly retarded the progress of such things as adequate labor legislation and efficient railway regulation.

In the progress toward a new social philosophy in which "social welfare" (as yet vaguely defined) forms the keystone, economists have led as often as they have followed. Compare, for example, what you and Mr. Kent put into the mouths of the economists with the following, taken fairly at random from a text book on political economy more widely used in American colleges than any other: "Unregulated contract cannot be free in any real sense of the term because back of contract lie all the inequalities and injustices found in human society. Contract can be free and equal only when the men making it are free and equal. We have in consequence the necessity of regulating contract in the general interest; and this is recognized in every country in the civilized world. It is especially marked in labor legislation, where the Laissez-Faire theory has utterly broken down."

Yours respectfully,

MILYX A. YOUNG.

Stanford University, Dec. 20, 1909.

The foregoing is interesting especially for the reference made to "That kind of political philosophy which is best illustrated by the Declaration of Independence and kindred documents," and it serves to show how differently the mind of the lawyer, for instance, and that of the political economist, view these "kindred documents." It is a fact that, despite all the fine phrases employed in the Declaration of Independence, our government was founded on property. Property was safeguarded a hundred ways to where the vital rights of mankind were safeguarded once. When the lawyer comes to one of these declarations of property rights he says, "It is the law," much as a Mussulman would say: "It is the will of Allah." Not so the economist. He recognizes no wall behind which he may not go questioning and if we are to "Put the Man First," as this paper insists we must, there may be a most urgent need for the economist to show us how to do it. The writer of this is, in his contrition for the editorial referred to above, moved to suggest that inasmuch as the theology that is most savagely combated is that of fifty years ago and has no existence in enlightened minds to-day, so some of us who cherish no great regard for the economic doctrinaire, may not have been able to keep up with the procession of economic thought.

Editor The California Weekly.

In an editorial discussing the resignation of Mr. Heney The California Weekly—December 10th issue—brings out some truths which demand more than a casual consideration. In referring to Mr. Heney's services the Weekly says:

"The inability of the public mind to grasp the significance of this service, the tendency to feel that somehow it cannot be true, testifies to the rarity of unselfishness in championing great public causes."

Continuing in another paragraph the Weekly adds: "For it was a great cause to which Messrs. Heney and Spreckels gave their services, their means, their time and thought—the equal establishment of justice. Without it government becomes a mockery and the degradation of the citizenry is only a question of time."

Now if these words as written are true—and no one can say in his heart they are not—we are right there led face to face with the problem of civic regeneration that is ours. We are confronted with the actual condition out of which all our political evils have sprung and out of which they will continue to flourish, despite a clamorous half-envious denunciation—until we are, so to speak, born again into a new conception of duty and purpose in living.

For such service as that of Mr. Heney's to be regarded by the public mind as almost a phenomenon—what more shameful indictment could be made against our citizenry than that?

Here is the situation: To the knowledge of every one with eye and mind but half alert, the real power of a city and state is in the hands of a coterie of corruptionists. A man says: Here is a work that is in urgent need of doing. This rottenness should be cleared away and I volunteer to do all that I can do to clear it away. And he goes to the work until a timid, faithless people compel him to stop.

What more could Mr. Heney do? But, by the same token, what less could he do? What less could any real man do? To bring the issue directly home where it is needed, what less can you and I do in our sphere of life than that which Mr. Heney has done in his? What purpose did he follow in this work that should not actuate every mother's son of us? It is not so much to be considered that the work of Mr. Heney has been remarkable, but it is actually astounding that among an enlightened, truth-seeking people such work is in a class by itself.

"O well," some one interposes, against whose conscience such self-inspection goes awry, "we can't all be Heneyes, and then Mr. Heney"—yes, there we are again directly before the issue. We do not understand such service. We trust it but grudgingly, the best of us, and will continue to give it but half trust as the same evil forces will continue to dominate our government until the same purpose becomes a dominant force in our everyday lives.

And why should it not be? Every man who seeks the truth must find that the same purpose is making the same imperative demand upon his life. All the rest is good only as a means to this purpose—getting and spending, the clothing and feeding of our bodies, even the ties of love and comradeship that are to us most sacred—these are truly but accessory to the higher purpose of unselfish devotion to the well-being of mankind.

No blood has been spilt on this continent for a worthier cause than this of greed versus common good. None has meant more to those that come after, and none has demanded more unselfish, earnest service than this cause of to-day.

Yet here is a man who has given to this cause as all men should give—the full measure of his time and ability—and he stands before us as a marvel, half to be feared, scarcely to be trusted, and almost to be hated as a public enemy.

Sincerely yours, RAY P. BRUBAKER.

Shandon, Cal., Dec. 20, 1909.

The basic difficulty is that government, commerce, industry are located on the plane of Man the animal. Under that dispensation the strong will take from the weak and the weak will be forced to the wall. It is only on the plane of Man as a living, undying soul that better things are to be hoped for. Mr. Heney's career in San Francisco "wasn't business." If it had been "good business" men would have found no difficulty in understanding him. Since the Civil War, when millions valued the preservation of the union above business, we have had little to exalt us and our thinking and acting have been on the plane of Man the animal. But as the writer sees it we are coming to a time when the dollar, always to be valued, and right well worthy of being valued, for we all have need of it, will nevertheless yield the first place in the hearts of men to that which makes for the common good. This may sound utopian, but whosoever looks for a justification for that hope will not go away comfortless. Altruism is in the ascendancy. Man the living soul will yet have his day of supremacy in this world.

Mrs. Lily Wilkinson Thompson has won the first prize with her homemade bread at the state fair recently held at Jackson, Miss. Two years ago she took a prize for her cornmeal muffins. Mrs. Thompson is the chairman on press work for the Mississippi Woman Suffrage Association, and is credited with being as competent a newspaper woman as she is a housekeeper. She has more than a dozen women under her direction in her press bureau.

SHEAR WIT

A Kansas editor refers to the burning of twelve thousand chickens at Hutchinson as "a severe loss to the ministry."—Kansas City Star.

Bacon: "Why doesn't some budding genius build a clock that won't run down?" Egbert: "Why, how could he?" "Build it on the principle of the gas meter!"—Exchange.

"To what do you attribute your unvarying success?" "To being picked early for the village fool. Nobody ever tried to get me to indorse a note or go into a scheme."—Washington Herald.

"I suppose," said the cynical bachelor to the young bride, "that your husband's love is fiery hot?" "Well," admitted the bride, "taint so hot that it will kindle the morning fire."—Baltimore American.

Learned men tell us that in Latin the word "editor" means "something to eat." In the United States its meaning is altogether different. It means to scratch around like blazes to get something to eat.—May (Tex.) Messenger.

Small Mazie was taken to a Yonkers church for the first time, where the choir loft was above the pulpit. Upon her return home she asked: "Mamma, why did all those who sung have to sit on the mantelpiece?"—Yonkers Statesman.

A patient woman toiled and hoarded for fourteen years, and then cheerfully spent all her savings for a divorce. This would seem to be a peculiar application of the axiom which cautions us to lay up something for a rainy day.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Mr. Topfloor—I just told the janitor to go to Hades. Mrs. Topfloor—Why, George! Aren't you ashamed of yourself? Mr. Topfloor—Not at all, my dear. That seems to be the only way in which he can acquire any knowledge of heating.—New York Times.

A school teacher asked a pupil how old he was. The pupil replied: "I am one-fourth as old as my father, and he's two years older than my mother. My two brothers are as old as my mother was when my mother was 25." The teacher solved the problem by knocking the pupil to the floor, sitting on his head and pounding him with the poker until he was ready to talk sense.—Kansas City Times.

One has to be careful when attending a prison service or even when singing before convicts, as the titles of the numbers of a recent jail recital suggest. Hymns, too, may need careful selection, as witness the story of the Rev. F. B. Meyer. He once attended a prison service at which one of the hymns was, "We Are Marching on the Good Old Way, the Good Old Way Our Fathers Trod." Archdeacon Sinclair capped this with a story of a Bishop who opened a prison service with the observation that he was delighted to see so many present.—London Globe.

"I think," said the aspiring young dramatist, "I have written a play that will make a fortune for the manager who produces it. It is absolutely unique in a way, and I feel sure the public will appreciate the innovation." "In what way," asked the interested manager, "does it differ from other plays?" "Well, for one thing, I have arranged it so that the heroine, after dying in full view of the audience will not have to come to life for the purpose of responding to encores, but can be shown beautifully laid out in her coffin when the curtain is raised. By providing a nice casket and plenty of flowers this can be made a very artistic scene."—Chicago Record-Herald.

The following is quoted from the American Hebrew, which gives it as one of the humorous stories that originated amongst the Jews and are passed down from generation to generation by word of mouth. A merchant who had just married a very rich wife was promenading with his bride when he met a friend, to whom he introduced her. The lady was so ugly that the friend could not refrain from whispering to the young merchant. "You know, Max, she isn't exactly beautiful." "No," said Max. "I can't say she is beautiful." "And her teeth are gone," continued the friend gently. "Next week," said Max, stolidly, "she shall get some." "And she squints, too—poor thing!" murmured the friend. Thereat the bridegroom turned upon him and said: "You needn't be afraid to speak aloud, she is deaf, too."

Mark Moneybelt arrived on the Moneytania at 10:42 this morning. His $200,000 yacht drew alongside the vessel in the harbor, and Mr. Moneybelt was helped aboard by his $7,000 secretary, where his daughter printed a $100,000 kiss upon his lips. After stroking his daughter's $500 Spitz a moment, he greeted his $3,000 yachting engineer. To newspaper men Mr. Moneybelt said that his $200 champagne baths and $40 sun baths had done him a world of good. Mr. Moneybelt was then hurried to his $2,000,000 country estate by a $12,000 automobile, where he was put on a $9,000 inclined railway, and was escorted up the $4,000 imported stone steps by his $12,000 private physician. There Mr. Moneybelt was welcomed by his $6,000 head butler, by his $4,000 coachman and his $1,000,000 wife and by his $666,666.66 2-3 son, whom he greeted affectionately. The $5,000 second secretary closed the door against the newspaper men and gave out the official statement that Mr. Moneybelt had enjoyed his home-coming.—Puck.

SOME EDISON OPINIONS.

Said Thomas A. Edison to a New York Tribune reporter, recently: As for food and sleep, I eat six or eight ounces of food a day, mostly vegetable, and sleep six hours. I have a pair of scales in my bathroom, and when I begin to go under or over my standard of weight I reduce or add a few ounces of food. I eat a variety of things, but not much of each. Exercise is not in my regimen. When you eat much you need to exercise it off and vice versa. My sleeping allowance of six hours is extremely generous compared to what it used to be for forty years, when I slept three or four hours out of the twenty-four. I made it six to please my wife, and I've trained her not to sleep any more than that.

Much sleeping is merely a habit. It owes its origin to the primitive time when man went to bed at sundown with the other animals because there was no artificial light and nothing else to do. Neither the brain nor the body requires prolonged sleep. Rest is obtained by change of occupation and environment. City people get tired of the city and are rested by going to the country. Of course, it takes a month or so to conquer the sleep habit, just like any other habit. The thing to do is to taper off, reducing the hours from eight to seven, then to six, and so on. At first your eyes are red, heavy, you feel fatigued, and then you begin to eat more and enjoy it. With less sleep, more food is needed. And sleeping four hours a night you are not troubled with dreams and tossings, which are signs of incomplete slumber, but you have what I call a genuine "cannon" sleep. I don't know what a dream is. My wife hasn't been troubled with them since I put her on the six-hour plan.

ODD PLAY NAMES.

An enterprising bibliographer of stage lore has been engaged for twenty years in ascertaining the history of all plays, their authors and plots, which have been produced during the last 500 years. He has records now of 50,000 plays. Over 350,000 playbills stored at the British Museum and works on theatrical subjects that may be consulted there, as well as those of the Guildhall library, have been examined by this bibliographer, and the result is an extensive volume of stage history.

It is interesting to find that "She" is a very favorite introductory word to the title of a play and that the names of over a thousand plays have commenced with the word "My" and about 150 with the word "Old."

Curious names of plays are given, such as

"Those Who Adulterate the Word of God"; "Give a Man Luck and Throw Him Into the Sea"; "The Blind Eat Many a Fly"; "The Roaring Girl, or Moll Cutpurse," and "She's Not Him and He's Not Her."

Other names of plays include "The Open Gate," "The Open House," "The Open Window," "The Open Sea," but there is no "Open Door." There are plays in the records called "A Woman in Black," "A Woman in White," "A Woman in Red" and "A Woman in Mauve," but there is room yet for a woman in green, blue or yellow, all fashionable colors.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The Executive Arm of Government.

Government naturally divides itself into three separable, if not wholly distinct, functions, the legislative, executive, and judicial. The legislative department does not do very much except legislate, though it would sometimes like to tie the hands of the judiciary or force the hand of the executive. The judiciary does a good deal of legislating, and the executive department is a part of the legislative and likely to become a much more important part of it as time passes, and for this reason: The senators and assemblymen represent districts and, therefore, special communities and interests, even where they are selected by the people and not through corporation influence, whereas the governor of a state, unless he represents corporation influence also, is elected by the whole people and upon him the responsibility for a legislative, as well as an executive, administration policy is likely more and more to be thrown.

The term, "administration," is very expressive and each administration differs from another all down the line. The spirit differs, the execution of the work differs, as the men at the head differ. The "administration" of Governor Pardee was a very different one from that of Governor Gage who preceded him, and the administration of Governor Gillett differs very much from that of Governor Pardee. All departments of government take their cue from the character of the man at the head. If he is easy going and lax all the other officers will tend to contract the same lax habits, with here and there a notable exception, perhaps, but if he is exacting, and holds a stiff rein, he will find the others "traveling right up on the bit," as horsemen say.

The power and influence of the executive department of government on legislation is also very strong. It is hard to get by the governor any measure that does not meet his approval, and it is hard to prevent the enactment of a measure that he very much wants and, at Washington as well as at Sacramento and other state capitals, there is a growing tendency to hold each "administration" responsible for legislation as well as for executing the laws. It is a centralizing force demanded in the name of efficiency, and the time does not seem to be distant when nearly all positive legislation will be prepared by the executive departments of government, as in England, and submitted to the legislative for ratification or rejection.

The legislative department of our government does not reside alone in the office of governor. There are numerous state offices provided, and filled by election, quite independent of the governor and yet a part of the executive machinery. The only hold he has on any of them is that they are usually elected at the same time the governor is, belong to the same political party and stand on the same political platform. These all help to make good teamwork in the executive department, but the teamwork would be better if there were fewer elective and more appointive officers responsible to the governor. We shall treat each of these offices in turn.

The constitution of California declares that, "The supreme executive power of this state shall be vested in a Chief Magistrate, who shall be styled the Governor of California." He is elected for four years and always wants to be elected for four years more, but never is. He must be twenty-five years old and have been a resident of the state for five years. No "tenderfoot" need apply. The election returns concerning governor are collected by the Secretary of State and placed in the charge of the Speaker of the Assembly, who, in a joint session of senate and assembly, announces the result. The candidate receiving the highest vote is declared elected. In the almost wholly impossible event of a tie vote the legislature, in joint session, would decide which of the two should be chosen.

The Governor is Commander-in-Chief of all the soldiery and naval forces and the constitution declares that "He shall see that the laws are faithfully executed," although the execution of most of the laws is confided to the care of the sheriffs and district attorneys of the several counties. He can call out the militia if he thinks it necessary, but he has nothing answering to the office of marshal and he is not given a state constabulary. In fact, his ability to see that the laws are faithfully executed is inadequate. Even his law officer, the Attorney General, is independent of him.

The Governor may fill vacancies in offices, call the legislature in extra session, may adjourn a legislature in the event that the two houses cannot agree as to when to adjourn, and he may unbosom himself once in two years in a message to the legislature and, through the legislature and the press, to the people. This is a great source of comfort to every Governor.

So much for the powers and duties of the Governor of California. What actually happens in the administration of his office will afford material for two or three more lessons. These lessons will be from behind the scenes, as it were, and, we think, not without a very human interest.

"Back safe and sound from your deer hunting trip, I see. Well, well! How did you escape being shot?" "Bully scheme. I disguised as a deer."—Cleveland Leader.

Happy New Year!

THIS IS THE SEASON and the greeting of optimism. The past is behind us. Most of it has been good, and the evil has at least the virtue of being past. It need not recur, unless we will, while the good can be preserved, if we will. It has been a year of almost uniform material progress. Politically, it has been a year of both progress and reaction. Los Angeles went right, San Francisco went mostly wrong. But the net result, even in politics, has been betterment. Defeat has united the reform forces of San Francisco as victory could not have done. The outlook is upward. The new year is propitious. Happy New Year!

If Doctor Wiley Should Resign.

THEY SAY DOCTOR WILEY is threatening to resign. Perhaps it is well that he should. Also, it is a pity that he should. For the place of this Doctor Wiley, in the reform of American laws, is anomalous and contradictory. To him more than to any other man we owe the formulation and passage of the pure food law, designed to protect our food, our drinks and our honesty. Under the subterfuge of pure food, that law is also giving us some degree of pure business and pure advertising. It is a great service, for which Doctor Wiley has earned the lasting gratitude of the American people. But Doctor Wiley is a zealot. He has an almost Gallic faculty of pushing things to their logical conclusions. That will not do, in our Anglo-Saxon civilization. He lacks perspective, and has threatened great business harm for small or doubtful hygienic gain. Also he has assailed the wrongs not only of Big Business (which is beginning to be popular) but of small business, which is horribly unpopular. The toes of small business are our toes, and when they are pinched we squeal. So, if Doctor Wiley must go, God speed him. But do not forget the good he has done.

Primary Law Confusions.

THE PRIMARY LAW is now on its way through the courts, to find out what it means, and how much of it is constitutional. The first puzzle is to find out which registration is to be used, to qualify voters and petition-signers. Then the eternal feminine impends, for it seems that a candidate for nomination must qualify as a registered voter, and most of the incumbent county superintendents of schools in California, who are presumptive candidates for re-election, are women and consequently not registered voters. Later will come the complexities of verifying petitions for state nominations, from ten different counties. We shall get through it all, somehow, and for the direct primary itself "the Lord be thankit," in spite of the bothersomeness of procedure in the present law. But will not this year's experience teach us the lesson of simplicity? The ideal direct primary would let anybody run for any nomination for anything. The best practical primary law would put such limitations on this liberty as are necessary to prevent confusion, and would add none whose effect is to make confusion.

Valuation of the Railroads.

AND NOW THE BOGIE MAN will walk again through the disordered dreams of railroad managers, for the Interstate Commerce Commission has renewed its recommendation of a valuation of the physical property of the companies. When the suggestion was first made several able managers pointed out the undoubted difficulties of making such a valuation which would be fairly accurate and also the injustice which would be likely to result from a valuation that was not accurate. The Interstate Commission does not claim the undertaking would be an easy one, or that once made it would long remain accurate; but it does maintain that without some kind of basis of value on which to proceed it is a good deal like child's play for the commission to be revising and establishing rates. For fear that the commission's yardstick would not be a perfectly fair one, the objecting managers do not want it to have any measuring rule at all.

The New Era.

AND NOW ENTERS THE NEW ERA for San Francisco. The graft prosecution is no more. Will unscotched grafters cease to graft? The reform administration is no more. Will a government of the unregenerate walk the paths of redemption? "Business" is no longer disturbed. Will that fact make any more prosperity? "Labor" is again in political power. Will that lighten the lot of the man who labors? We are waiting to see. And as the answers to these questions turn out, so shall the history of San Francisco be, for this good year 1910, and so shall its impetus be, toward better or worse, in the years to come.

Which Committee?

THE "STATE CENTRAL COMMITTEE" of the Republican party, it is announced, will meet in San Francisco soon after the middle of January, "to plan the campaign of 1910." Does this mean the state central committee, or the state executive committee? There is a difference. The state central committee is a more or less representative body, chosen by a more or less representative convention, to represent the Republicans of the various sections of the state. Ostensibly it is the governing body of the party, but actually it has no functions whatever. It is not even permitted to elect its own officers, and the officers chosen for it are never selected from its membership. All its functions are exercised by the state executive committee, a different and independent body, not chosen by the party nor by its representatives. Among its members are P. S. Teller, George Stone, Walter F. Parker, Thomas B. Dozier, J. L. McNab, Grove L. Johnson, Henry A. Melvin, John D. Daly, and other equally loyal henchmen of the Southern Pacific Machine. Among the members of the state central committee, on the other hand, are included the president and most of the officers of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League. It will be interesting to see which body is called together.

Heney.

FRANCIS J. HENEY IS NO LONGER an official of the city and county of San Francisco. He is going to Oregon, to try Binger Hermann, and afterward he will be heard from, here or somewhere, in one capacity or another. Such a man will not down. In fact, he is not headed that way. He is headed up. The people of San Francisco may not realize it, but Francis J. Heney is their most commanding figure. He is their one national character, the one man who if he chose to shake the dust of San Francisco from his feet could settle down anywhere and begin a new career already famous. It is service that has done this—unrequited, mostly unthanked service to the people of San Francisco. The people of San Francisco knew this, the night they surged about Dreamland rink, and shouted for vengeance. Some of them know it now. All of them will know it again. The Heney era in San Francisco will be remembered as long as the days of the vigilantes, and there will be, in the perspective of history, as little difference of opinion about it.

POSITION OF GOVERNOR GILLETT.

Current newspaper discussion of candidates for governor, however lacking it may be in some other respects, has at least had the merit of making plainer the relation of Governor Gillett to the organization, or the machine. During the last two years a more kindly feeling than prevailed previously has grown up toward the governor, and many good citizens have been disposed to support him for reelection. To quite an extent this feeling has been based on the belief that he has proved more independent of the machine than had been expected, and at times the story has gone around that there had been a positive break in the former relations with the railroad political bureau. Of course the governor's attitude toward other issues, which has often been commendable, has also exerted an influence.

But what is the striking fact of the situation to-day? Is it not that despite all former reports to the contrary, Governor Gillett is entirely satisfactory to the organization as a nominee for governor, and, more than that, that he is decidedly the favorite with that element? Such is admitted on all hands to be the case; one may read it in newspapers of all political faiths and no faith, and nobody denies it. This being so, what light does it throw on the governor's fitness to be the candidate for governor of anybody who is seriously desirous to improve the political conditions which have prevailed in California for a generation? There may possibly exist some brand of reformers so mild that they do not want to turn the organization out, still less to destroy it, but merely to induce it to govern us somewhat better. It is known that some very loyal followers of the machine do sometimes protest against the things they are expected to stand for, and we have no doubt that now and then a sincere friend of Mr. Herrin goes to him and tells him to his face that it is really scandalous and that he owes it to himself, to the company and to the people to govern them better. There are good men, in the ordinary sense, among the machine politicians, and that they feel like using moral suasion with the head of the machine to "improve the service" we have no doubt. When people think that the Southern Pacific is not running trains enough, or running them at the wrong hours, or in some other way failing to consult the convenience of the public, it is recognized to be the proper thing to go to the active head of the corporation, state the grievance and respectfully suggest that it should do better. In the same manner some persons are always hoping that they will be able to convince the political bureau of the railroad company that it can afford to give us better state government than it has been giving.

In this attitude of mind it may be logical to support a candidate for governor whom the political bureau picks out, provided that otherwise he appears to have proper qualifications. This view assumes the continuance of government by the corporation and is only concerned with the quality of it. But there is another view, and one which we hope is held by all readers of The California Weekly, and it is this—that the only way to get good government is to get rid of the political bureau of the corporation. For any one who thinks this it is not logical to support candidates chosen by the corporation, because, of course, it selects candidates first for itself and secondly for the people. Least of all is it consistent to submit to a choice of a candidate for governor made by the railroad political organization, because if the governor be a servitor of that machine no part of the government can be really independent of its influence.

This is the test by which to try the governor. Is he the candidate of the railroad organization? If he is, then his admitted good qualities do not fit him to be the candidate of those who would free the state of California from the power of the organization which has so long dominated it to its harm.

TWO ARGONAUT WAILS.

The ever capacious Argonaut is worried because the Lincoln-Roosevelt League is not "constructive," and because Chester H. Rowell, president of the league, has written articles in the Fresno Republican distinguishing between the right of a faction of a party to call a pre-primary convention and the lack of right of the party as such to do the same thing.

Doubtless the Argonaut would be even more worried if the Lincoln-Roosevelt League were "constructive" and therefore, to its view, more dangerous. But what do you demand of a pioneer movement? The axe is the pioneer's first tool. The first work needed in the redeeming of any evil situation is destructive, and the Lincoln-Roosevelt League is not to be diverted from the primary duty of destroying the power of the political bureau of the Southern Pacific railroad company, by any showing, no matter how valid, of the need of constructive work afterward. That bureau is now in possession of the organization of the Republican party of the state of California, and of all the essential departments of the state government. So long as that domination continues, no thorough-going constructive work is possible. Resolute, belligerent, concentrated, destructive effort is the first and most vital need of California public life. When that is done, the ground will have been cleared for the constructive work. There is plenty of that to be done, and no one connected with the Lincoln-Roosevelt League is blind to the necessity of it. A Lincoln-Roosevelt League governor and legislature would initiate more constructive reforms than this state has known in a generation. But the first and absolute necessity is the destruction of the barrier which bars this state from liberty.

The other Argonaut worry is the pre-primary convention. That matter is so perfectly plain that the only man who does not see it is the man who stubbornly closes his eyes. The official governing body of the Republican party in this state represents a faction, simply and unanimously. Every man on it was appointed (not elected) by reason of his loyalty to that faction. It does not represent the Republican party, and it could not call a pre-primary convention which would be attended by more than one faction. But if it were representative, and could call such a convention, why should it? There are two factions in the Republican party, and the law provides, in the primary, a place to settle their differences, by the vote of the party. They are both going before that primary, and neither would withdraw because outvoted in an unofficial convention. Let each of them, as a faction, hold any sort of conference it pleases. But let the party meet, as the law provides, at the primary, and choose there who shall be the party nominees.

SUBSTITUTES FOR THE FAMILY.

Teachers' institutes and teachers' associations are coming to be favorite fields in which to exploit the new social views of professional lecturers and psychologists, but sometimes the views are not so new or so startling as they seem. On the platform as on the stage there is a trick of the trade in appearing to reach the danger line without actually doing so. Dr. Luther H. Gulick, a New York educator of much repute, is now in California, and in a recent association talk in Los Angeles he discoursed on the declining influence of the family and the home from the standpoint of one who regards it as a natural evolution and not wholly, if at all, to be regretted, because there is a hope that what will be substituted for the disappearing institutions will be something better.

The first impression made on a reader by a newspaper report of the talk is that of extreme radicalism, but that is due in part to the headlines, which are constructed upon the familiar principle of condensing in a few words all the thrill to be found in a lengthy oration. Some of the things which Doctor Gulick really said are these: The relations of the family unit to society have changed; many functions once performed by the family are now being attended to by the community in other and better ways; this is notably so in industry and in education; it is also true of amusements; in religion and morals there is the same tendency toward associated effort and away from the family unit. "The school," said the speaker, "brings about the selection of skilled individuals from the community who shall serve as models for our children, and since we are, on the whole, securing persons for school teachers who are far better patterns than the average parent, we are improving our social heritage. This is only another step in the specialization of motherhood."

"Specialization of motherhood" is a kind of spurious jargon of science which does not please. It would be better to talk about the elevation of motherhood. Motherhood is one of the things which cannot be specialized either physically or morally; it is the burden and glory of the whole race of women; there is no way in which it can be syndicated, or organized as a trust and performed by the few for the many.

Dr. Luther Gulick is not so much a destructive radical as he is a victim of a fallacy. He thinks he sees the family being supplanted in its functions and the institution itself disappearing, when there is merely a change of functions such as must have occurred often during the long, long period the family institution has existed. The family unit, being founded not alone on physical fact but on such moral facts as mother love and father love, cannot disappear or become of less importance than it is. The teacher fills a place of great and growing importance, but she is no more a substitute for the mother than the school-room is for the home.

It is safer to trust the instincts of such women as Alice Freeman Palmer and Jane Addams than the deductions of Dr. Luther Gulick. "The one great thing which this country needs," said the first named, "is more good homes." It is also what every country needs to-day and all the time. Miss Addams, in one of her thoughtful essays, makes clear the magnitude of Doctor Gulick's error in believing that a substitute is needed for the family group, when what is really needed is its improvement. Listen to the serene wisdom of the Chicago philosopher: "The family as well as the state we are called upon to maintain as the highest institutions which the race has evolved for its safeguard and protection. But merely to preserve these institutions is not enough. There come periods of reconstruction, during which the task is laid upon a passing generation to enlarge the function and carry forward the ideal of a long-established institution. . . . The family, like every other element of human life, is susceptible of progress, and from epoch to epoch its tendencies and aspirations are enlarged, although its duties can never be abrogated and its obligations can never be cancelled."

Elsewhere Miss Addams speaks of the deficiencies of the kind of education which "during the most formative years of life gives the young girl no contact with the feebleness of childhood, the pathos of suffering, or the needs of old age," and the most marked effect of which is to stimulate ambition in the direction of "intellectual accumulation." These words indicate the true and the false lines of progress, and under the latter heading fall the doctrines of any speaker who teaches that the family is an institution of diminishing importance. There was a time when one of the principal functions of the family was to defend the lives of its members against the daily attacks of their fellows, and there was another time, before the institution of schools, when education could be gained only at the paternal or the maternal knee. Those times, with their peculiar needs, have passed away, but the family as the protector of infancy and feeble age, the shield of domestic privacy, the main-spring of most of the private virtues, the greatest moulder of character and a hundred other things which are closely inter-related with the welfare of society must always be preserved if general demoralization is not to overtake the modern world.

McCarthy's Slanderous "Hedge."

Mayor-elect P. H. McCarthy, in his speech delivered last Sunday at the Mission Labor Temple, while pretending to advocate the issuance of bonds for the construction of a municipal railway on Geary street, really conveyed the impression that he had been "captured by the enemy" and was doing his best in his own clumsy way to square himself alike with his bosses and his followers. It was a difficult performance and very badly done, and in order to create a diversion, he attacked Messrs. Spreckels and Phelan, who are sincere advocates of the bonds, by saying, to quote the Chronicle of the next day, "The $720,000 set apart by a labor union administration to build this (Geary street) road has been stolen by the Spreckels and Phelan crowd. Now they are wearing badges on their coats advocating the Geary street road." And again: "I don't want the people to suffer for the Phelans and the Spreckels, who got their millions from the relief funds of the city, but I say if the people vote it down (that is, the Geary street bond proposition), it is up to the administration to find a way to build it."

The reference to the $720,000 was an item in the tax levy a few years ago which was illegally put there; and furthermore, the amount was inadequate for the purpose, and after a suit was begun by a taxpayer, the supervisors transferred it to other necessary purposes of the city government. The gentlemen named had nothing to do with it whatever.

The reference to the relief funds is incomprehensible. Messrs. Phelan and Spreckels were members of the executive committee of the relief corporation which had the control and disbursement of the funds. President Roosevelt, by proclamation, after the fire, directed that the funds be sent to James D. Phelan, chairman of the committee, and the trust has been administered with exceeding fidelity and good judgment. The federal government, through its experts, has periodically gone over the accounts and the American National Red Cross, of which William H. Taft is president, has given its hearty approval of everything that has been done. The reports have been made and are accessible to everyone, and it is a commendable fact that of the vast sum handled, nearly $9,000,000, every cent donated has been accounted and receipted for, and that there has been no loss by even the dishonesty of subordinates and the whole business of the relief corporation has been managed upon business principles. The gentlemen interested not only made large personal donations but gave over two years of their time, and it ill becomes the Mayor-elect to lightly make use of such intemperate language when there is absolutely no foundation in fact for what he glibly says.

The Infernal Sneer.

"I don't care whether Pat Calhoun or Rudolph Spreckels is boss," is the statement attributed to Mayor-elect McCarthy, in a speech on the Geary street bonds. It is to be hoped that the epigram was a mere explosion of oratorical fervor. Conceding that it would be pernicious to have any one boss, even Rudolph Spreckels, can any honest man seriously put Spreckels and Calhoun in the same category? The best that can be said of Calhoun is that he is a genial thief. The worst that can be said of Spreckels is that he is a somewhat irritating reformer. But are we to forgive the public crimes of Calhoun by reason of the grace of his private manners? Are we to forget the public services of Spreckels because his manner of rendering them sometimes grates on the nerves? Are we even to compare the man who corrupted this city of San Francisco with the man who redeemed it? Still worse, are we to have the indecency to insinuate that the whole thing is simply a contest of rival intriguers for power? It is a shame that a man elected mayor on a ticket that stood at least in name for an ideal should so sneer at the most vigorous manifestation of militant idealism California has seen. Remember Dr. Lyman Abbott's definition of the twentieth-century devil: "The twentieth-century devil is simply a mean, demoralizing habit of doubting, a sneering, scoffing mood; a cynical spirit which derides the virtue it cannot attain and the goodness it does not understand." "He sneaks about the world, dropping the poison of cynicism, the bitter distillation of doubt, into the cup of life, at the very moment when it is held foaming to the lips." This is the sort of a "devil" of which San Francisco has been too long possessed. It is a pity to find the mayor-elect speaking with that devil's tongue.

The Under Dog.

Every dog has his day, and just now the under dog seems to be getting his. Witness the articles on "Barbarous Mexico," which have at last given the peon voice and hearing. Witness the vain efforts of Hawaiian planters to scour the earth for some under-dog labor that would stay under. Witness the earnest investigations of the food supply of the people, in London and New York, undertaken in a spirit not of individual charity, to relieve suffering, but of intelligent regard for the progress of the human race. Witness the old-age pensions of England, and the automatic, even compulsory, insurance of Germany. The under dog is still under, but his appeal is at least heard, and Society is conscious that it has jurisdiction. Probably the under dog will always be in some sense "under." Nature formed him for that role. But social concepts and human sentiments no longer include the idea that our duty toward the under dog is to kick him down. Rather, we are learning that it is to our interest, as well as our duty, to help him up—to drag him up, if necessary—to a certain point, and to give him opportunity to climb as much higher as he can.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

"A single girl cannot be happy," scrawls Elizabeth Tobler, of Patterson, New Jersey, "before she turns her back upon a lonely world and takes her leap into eternity." Elizabeth was right. A single girl cannot be happy if she must look forward to a life of loneliness and celibacy.

What is more, she cannot be or become a perfectly normal woman and remain single all her days. The single life is the abnormal life, and the product of it is abnormality, the best that can be made of it. There are thousands of women in the hospitals for the insane the country over who are there for no other reason than that they were forced to live single, alone, mewed up, caged and cribbed, the rich juices of their souls dried into dust within their breasts; the mother instinct smothered, the free companionship with a man denied. Many an alienist, confronted again and again by this condition, has asked himself if, on the whole, it would not be better for society to sanction becoming a mother without becoming a wife, at least a time or two, rather than doom one to such a fate. Doubtless such a question can receive but one answer from those who value virtue per se, but it is notable, if regrettable, that some of the "wise men" have asked it, of themselves, at least.

Wives and mothers who are snugly housed, companioned and comforted, know little of the deprivation their single sisters suffer. One of them, advanced in years, confessed to her physician friend that her breasts had ached for the pressure of a baby's lips. Some there are who so devote themselves to others, to institutional work or to being the foster mother of other women's children, that they find happiness in service notwithstanding their spinsterhood, but not the same happiness that they would have found in wifehood and motherhood.

Whose fault is it that so many splendid women are left single? The fault lies at the feet of those who teach others to feel that poverty is despicable, that life in a cottage of three rooms would be a reflection upon the family and an affront to "our set," that early marriages are the acme of unwisdom, that housework is drudgery and that a life of independent dependence upon stenography, bookkeeping or a place as a saleslady is to be preferred to wifehood, home-making and child bearing. These are they who rob young women of the right to a home of their own with the result that many an Elizabeth, convinced that a single girl cannot be happy, takes her leap into outer darkness, and many another Elizabeth takes her leap into the guilty swirl of sin rather than live comfortless and alone.

Nor are these all the indictments to be found against those who postpone marriage to late in life when the husband shall have made his place secure in the world, own a home, or at least an automobile, have servants to wait upon the woman of his choice and a nurse to care for any straggling infant that may chance to come under that roof. Alas! no. The foregoing is not all.

With the man the postponement of marriage does not always, nor so very often, involve the postponement of gratification of desire. He does not so very often keep himself unspotted from the world. On the contrary his postponement of that God-given and sacramental relation is all too likely to bring him to the altar unfit to stand there, poison lurking in every cell of his being, lurking there to contaminate his companion when he takes her to his home and to contaminate their offspring. Whatever postpones marriage beyond twenty-five years of age is a social evil. Of all the hardships inflicted by an enhanced cost of living there is none fraught with greater evil than that of postponement of marriage to the thirties instead of the twenties. Elizabeth Tobler was right. A single girl cannot be as happy as she has a right to be.

Our Christmas Greeting to the World.

There is evidence that "the old folks at home" are remembered generously by their wandering relatives in this country. A report recently issued by Postmaster Morgan of New York City shows that there were sent abroad from that city, from December 1st to 18th inclusive, 485,151 money orders of the total value of $7,524,963. This was an increase over the same time last year of 140,519 in the number of orders and $2,298,125 in their value. The largest amount carried by a single vessel was borne by the Lusitania on its trip beginning December 8th, when the value of the orders aggregated $1,592,607. Seven foreign countries received sums in excess of a half million dollars each. These were Great Britain, with $1,913,009.43; Italy, with $1,732,131.21; Austria, $712,196.26; Hungary, $685,464.79; Germany, $577,177.18; Sweden, $551,658.62; and Russia, $522,662.07. The balance is scattered in decreasing amounts throughout the world. And it will be borne in mind that not all money leaves this country through the New York postoffice. Evidently these expatriates of the old world are not illiberal with their kinsmen.

The Moderation of King Edward.

From London comes the announcement, with a touch of unction in it, that King Edward "has been objecting to the unnecessary multiplication of wines at dinner," and, in short, to excessive drinking at any time. The announcement then proceeds to give an idea of what the monarch considers about the right thing at a moderate and abstemious "family party," and here it is: Four kinds of wine during dinner, claret, chablis, champagne and port being preferred; then, after dinner, a whiskey-and-soda and occasionally "a glass of rare old brandy." This is the royal theory of moderation, spelled without a capital letter. It will be noted that there are some distinctions between it and that which, over here, is termed "being on the water-wagon." In fact, the distinctions are so broad that if some of us should adopt King Edward's drink-menu we would "see things" before any great length of time had passed. Not all of us may approve of the ruler's schedule of libations, but it is a safe bet that we cannot fail to admire the capacity of his stomach. It must be a good one.

Spinal Anaesthesia Not New.

Spinal anaesthesia is the term which is applied to the injection of an anaesthetic directly into the spinal cavity, thus anaesthetizing the patient, while he still retains consciousness. There is prevalent an opinion that the discovery of this process is new, and it is a mistaken opinion. Spinal anaesthesia was discovered almost a quarter of a century ago by Dr. J. L. Corning of New York City, and the first operation was performed under its influence in 1900. The discovery is not new; it merely is being discussed to-day as never before. Another mistaken notion is that stovaine, the anaesthetic which reminds of the family heater, is a new discovery. It has been in use to some extent for years. The question that is agitating leading physicians is whether or not stovaine is superior to other anaesthetics, and much difference of opinion has developed, some eminent doctors contending that the loss of life under it is notably greater than under chloroform or ether. About this question the declamatory battle rages, and it has given the untutored public the impression that here was something new under the sun, when in reality there was not.

Whole Islands of Fossil Ivory.

In the regions lying in the arctic ice north of Siberia islands have been discovered which are so deeply covered with ivory that the first discoverers of some of the islands supposed that they were composed entirely of it. To be sure, it is fossil ivory, but it is merchantable, and considerable quantities of it already have been sold. One islet, which is known as Liakoff's island, appears as a mass of tusks and bones of mammoths, elephants, musk oxen and rhinoceroses, cemented together by sandy ice. The bottom of the sea about the islands also is strewn with these fossil remains. Scientists account for this condition as follows: Time was, they say, when the climate of the arctic regions was mild and inviting, and, beguiled by it, the great animals of long ago congregated there. This was before the reign of Theodore, guns were unknown, and so the great brutes disported themselves without fear until one day there came a change in the weather. It was quite a change. There came whirlwinds of snow, mountains of ice drifted upon them, and living became such discouraging work that they gave it up. In that frozen sepulcher their bones did not moulder, and so we have this fossil ivory; or so the scientists say, and who can advance a better theory?

Big Money In (Some) Horses.

Such readers of The California Weekly as pay any attention to horse-racing will be interested to know that, during the year which is just passing, thirty horses won a total of $475,000 on the race-tracks of the United States and Canada. First among these was S. C. Hildreth's Joe Madden, which won $49,905, and next to Madden was James R. Keene's two-year-old Sweep, with winnings of $41,323. Other leading winners, with the amounts they won, are as follows: Hildreth's four-year-old King James, $38,253; Keene's three-year-old Hilarious, $36,585; Hildreth's Fitz Herbert, $31,757; Keene's Maskette, $22,715; James MacManus' Rocky O'Brien, $22,070; C. C. Smithson's High Private, $19,010; C. L. Harrison's Waldo, $14,880; R. T. Wilson Jr.'s Olambala, $14,532; A. Koenigsberg's Rose Queen, $12,760; Hildreth's Firestone, $12,580; Woodford Clay's Ocean Bound, $12,545; B. Schrieber's Jack Atkin, $10,720; H. P. Whitney's Greenvale, $10,200. This includes all who won more than $10,000 apiece, although a number went but a little below that mark. Of these larger winnings, it will be seen that S. C. Hildreth took $135,495, while James R. Keene took $100,623, sums which are far more than offset by the losses of the "suckers" who haunt the tracks.

A Cent's Worth of Electricity.

A writer for Harper's Weekly has been making a calculation concerning what one cent's worth of electricity will do. The list of its possibilities is long and varied, as the reader may judge for himself, it running as follows: "One cent's worth of electricity will make four cups of coffee, or cook a steak, or boil two quarts of water, or make a Welsh rabbit, or operate a seven-inch fryingpan for twelve minutes, or an electric gridiron for eight minutes, or an electric broiler for six minutes, or run a sewing machine for three hours, or an electric flatiron for fifteen minutes, or a luminous radiator for eight minutes, or a heating pad for two hours, or a footwarmer for fifteen minutes, or a massage machine for four hours, or a curling iron once a day for two weeks, or a dentist's drill for an hour and a half, or an electric piano player for an hour, or vulcanize a patch on an automobile tire, or keep a big glue pot hot for an hour, or brand electrically 150 hams, or raise a passenger elevator five stories a minute, or raise 250 gallons of water 100 feet high, or raise ten tons twelve feet high in less than one minute." To all of which it may be added that what one cent's worth of electricity will do possibly might depend more or less on the price of electricity.

Larger Dirigibles Are Coming.

The largest of the Zeppelin dirigibles is 440 feet long, but it will be relegated to the intermediate class by a British naval airship now in process of construction, in England, by Vickers' Sons & Maxim. This British airship will be more than 500 feet long, of the Zeppelin type, and it is calculated that it will maintain a speed of forty-five miles an hour. A mighty ship of the air, but if information that comes from Germany is authentic, it would seem that it soon must go back to the infant class. Report has it that Albert Wetzel, an engineer, has completed arrangements for the construction of a dirigible which will be 984 feet long, 65½ feet wide, and may attain a speed of fifty-five miles an hour. The future owns no limitations, and so there is no foretelling what size airships hereafter may attain, but this German vessel—much more than three city blocks in length—is the largest at present in contemplation.

Another Pair of "Siamese Twins."

A pair of "Siamese twins" which are attracting the attention of the medical profession, and the laity as well, as did the well-known Siamese twins, Chang and Eng, were born about nine or ten months ago in Ikalis, Finland, and still are alive. These twins are girls, and they are united from the hips downward. In one of the girls the heart and liver are on the right side, in the other on the left side. Pulse, temperature and respiration vary in them, and they have no common sense of feeling except in the part where they are united. Martha and Mary are their names.

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES.

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHELF.
Some of Shelley's Poems.

In those poems by Shelley in which he drops the role of prophet or pamphleteer and swings aloft in sheer aerial intoxication of birdlike song our spirit joins him in unrestrained enjoyment. His poetry has a quality found in none other in English literature. All other English poets have an eye for rich color and for sensuous form. Shelley's vision is spiritual in the literal meaning of the word, his images are incorporeal, his passion is the passion of viewless winds, of crystal infinitudes of ether, of sweet sounds from disembodied, unseen larks. No other poet's song is so released from the bondage to substantial visions, none other mounts so airily to the freedom of the open heavens.

And yet this absence of corporeal images does not result in mere fantasy nor in the other alternative of bald intellect. Sense, music and passion are retained in the clear insubstantial realm which he inhabits. His poetry is like the light that shines from a sun too bright to look upon as a physical object, the light that diffuses the power of sight throughout the heavenly canopy and, on occasion, touches a vagrant cloud with the splendor of the dawn.

"HIGHWAYS OF THE PACIFIC COAST."

The full title of this book is "Highways and Byways of the Pacific Coast." It is the third or fourth of a series on American highways and byways by that industrious author and illustrator, Clifton Johnson. Mr. Johnson is more industrious than talented. He has patiently tramped the country roads of various parts of America, with camera in hand and note-book in pocket, photographing what he conceives to be the characteristic bits of rural life and scenery, and noting down pretty much everything that people tell him—stories, anecdotes, assertions about crops and the like—without any discrimination and with no appreciation of the humor of some of the yarns that are told to gull him.

The result is a rambling, purposeless, meaningless mass of unrelated text-matter, through which are thinly sprinkled photographic illustrations. These illustrations, in the book at hand, are simply grotesque. They suggest nothing that is typical of life in California; they contain no reproduction of the white glare of our sunlight—looking rather as if they were taken in a fog; they simply travesty the scenic beauties that lay directly in his path.

In his introductory note, the author assures us that "these Highways and Byways volumes are often consulted by persons who are planning pleasure tours." This is unfortunate. Also it is puzzling. We can't see why they should. (The Macmillan Company, $2.00, net.)

MORE ABOUT GENIUS.

Lombroso wrote of genius as a type of insanity. The following from his book on the subject is at least suggestive:

Many men of genius, like the insane, are subject to curious spasmodic and choleric movements. Lenau and Montesquieu left upon the floor of their rooms the signs of the movements by which their feet were convulsively agitated during composition; Buffon, Dr. Johnson, Santeuil, Crebillon, Lombardini, exhibited the most remarkable facial contortions. There was a constant quiver on Thomas Campbell's thin lips. Chateaubriand was long subject to convulsive movement of the arm. Napoleon suffered from habitual spasm of the right shoulder and of the lips; "My anger," he said, one day after an altercation with Lowe, "must have been fearful, for I felt the vibration of my calves which has not happened to me for a long time." Peter the Great suffered from convulsive movements which horribly distorted his face. Carducci's face at certain moments, writes Mantegazza, is a veritable hurricane; lightnings dart from his eyes and his muscles tremble. Ampere could only express his thoughts while walking, and when his body was in a state of constant movement. Socrates often danced and jumped in the street without reason, as if by a freak.

LINES TO ROBERT BURNS.

By Chang Yon Tong.

[The following verses were written June 13, 1904, half an hour after receiving an invitation to the opening, on June 24th, of the replica of the Ayrshire cottage in which the poet was born, erected at the World's Fair, St. Louis, the writer being the Commissioner of China to the Exposition.]

O! kindred soul of humble birth,
Divine, though of the lowly earth,
Forgotten thou art not to-day,
Nor yet neglected—here's thy bay!

Thy cottage-home, hid from the proud,
Nor thought of by the vulgar crowd,
In thine own time has claimed a place
On which the world's eyes now gaze.

Nor changed its homely rugged lines,
Where closely crept thy tender vines;
But men have changed; nor yet deplore—
Where once they spurned we now adore.

Thy life and work and destiny
Contain a meaning deep for me;—
Though fame be darkened by a fate,
The laurel wreath comes soon or late.

Thy splendid fame shall ever rise
With undim'd glory o'er the skies;—
To struggling souls a hope shall yield
On sailing seas and ploughing field.

I am a foreign, unknown bard,
Whose devious course is rough and hard;
But cheered at times by thy sweet song,
I sing away, nor mind the throng.

Like thee, I'll toil with manly hand,
Like thee, by manhood ever stand;
And, guided by thy spirit brave,
Shall wait for verdict at the grave.

ALTRUISM.

By David Starr Jordan.

"The God of the things as they are"
Is the God of the highest heaven;
The God of the morning star,
Of the thrush that sings at even;

The God of the storm and sunshine,
Of the wolf, the snail, and the bee,
Of the Alp's majestic silence,
Of the soundless depths of the sea;

The God of the times and the nations,
Of the planets as they roll,
Of the numberless constellations,
Of the limitless human soul.

For there is nothing small,
And naught can mighty be;
Archangels and atoms all—
Embodiments of Thee!

A single thought divine
Holds stars and suns in space;
A dream of man is thine,
And history finds its place.

When the universe was young,
Thine was the perfect thought,
That life should be bound in one
By the strand of Love enwrought.

In the life of the fern and the lily,
Of the dragon and the dove,
Still through the stress and struggle
Waxes the bond of love.

Out from the ruthless ages
Rises, like incense mild,
The love of the man and the woman,
The love of the mother and child.

TOLSTOY AT EIGHTY-ONE.

In spite of the reports of Tolstoy's poor health and approaching end the special correspondent of the Paris Journal writes that his first impression on seeing this tall, bright-eyed, vigorous old man with whom he was to have an interview was that he was in the presence of an extremely well-preserved man between sixty and sixty-five.

In spite of his eighty-one years Tolstoy goes riding every day and in all weathers. His hearing is very acute. He catches even a whispered conversation. He reads without spectacles and explains that he used to be short sighted and has therefore kept his sight.

Politics do not seem to interest him greatly. The subjects which attract him at the present moment are metaphysical questions inherent in different religions, the origin of life and the mystery of death. He does not fear death, for he believes in the immortality of the soul and the existence of God. Death, he says, is a bridge of communication between two shores.

Tolstoy told his French interviewer that he has many enemies. He said: "I receive every day horrible anonymous letters and they are a source of deep sorrow to me. I only want to live in peace."

The following is the account of the writer's mode of life, as given by his doctor: He rises at eight, often at six or seven; eats his meals with greatest regularity, drinks no wine, eats no meat, does not smoke, takes long walks or rides and spends his evenings with his family and the friends who come to see him. Generally he goes to bed at midnight.

LITERARY NOTES.

This year for the first time the Nobel prize for literature has been awarded to a woman, Miss Selma Lagerlof, the Swedish writer. Last year it was bestowed upon Professor Eucken of Jena University, the year before that Kipling received it and the year before that Bjornstjerne Bjornson. The prize is a purse of $40,000 and is awarded by the Swedish Academy, which is composed of eighteen members.

The last serious play by Clyde Fitch, "The City," opened at the Lyric Theatre, New York, Tuesday evening, December 1st. Its purpose is to show the effects of metropolitan life on an ambitious and prosperous country family which moves to New York from up-state. Furthermore, it is a defense of "The City," so dearly loved and so admirably interpreted by Mr. Fitch, as the crucible in which the essential good and bad qualities of men and women are most thoroughly brought to the surface. The play is in three acts.

Reginald Clarence, the well known bibliographer of dramatic data, has been working for twenty years on a stage cyclopedia which will contain a bibliography of plays, of which it has been possible to find any record, from B. C. 500 to A. D. 1909. In order to bring his remarkable work to completion Mr. Clarence has delved among ancient records and musty manuscripts in the British museum; he has studied the numerous works in the Guildhall library until his book contains particulars of nearly 50,000 plays, covering the whole range of stage productions—drama, comedy, farce, opera and comic opera.

John Howard Payne, the author of "Home, Sweet Home," who was born in 1791 and died in 1852, was at one time a student at Union College, and at a recent reunion of the alumni of that institution in New York city it was decided to start a fund for erecting a memorial to Payne. The plan is to get money enough for the erection of an imposing gateway to the Union College campus, opposite St. John's church in Union street, Schenectady. It will be remembered that Payne died while United States consul to Tunis, Africa, and that his remains were brought from there in 1882 and reinterred in Washington.

DR. GULICK AND THE CHILDREN

AN INTERESTING STUDENT OF PLAY AND CHAMPION OF PLAYGROUNDS.

Dr. Luther H. Gulick is in California, lecturing on municipal playgrounds. Doctor Gulick is an interesting man. He is what Kipling called "ginger colored," he is lean and active, his pale blue eyes are surrounded with humorous wrinkles that can quickly smooth out as the eyes steady themselves into intense concentration and earnestness.

Doctor Gulick's Training.

He has studied physical training all his life, in the most practical ways as well as in the higher reaches of theory and of historical comparison. He was born in Honolulu forty-four years ago. One year of his boyhood was spent in the public schools of Oakland. Later he graduated from high school at Hanover, New Hampshire, and later still from the medical department of the New York University.

His first connection with practical physical culture work was in the public school gymnasium in which he was an instructor. He then became secretary of physical training of the international Y. M. C. A. For three years he was principal of the Pratt Institute High School, in Brooklyn. Since 1903, and until this year, he has been physical director of the public schools of New York city. He is now in charge of a department of the Sage foundation.

Studies In Psychology of Play.

Throughout his educational experience, Doctor Gulick has studied the psychology of physical exercise as well as the physiology of it. Much of his time has been devoted to a study of children's games, and he has made many interesting discoveries in this connection. For instance, he found that, in all history, the only boys who ever developed games requiring team-work—the subordination of the individual to the mass—were the boys of the Anglo-Saxon race, with their football, cricket, and baseball. The boys of all other races played games in which the principle of the duel applied, such as hand-ball, tennis, or foot-racing, in which one boy was pitted against one other boy. Pursuing this investigation, he found that at no time in history had the girls of any race whatever developed team games.

Play and the Future Citizen.

Doctor Gulick concluded that the Anglo-Saxon ability for self-government and for commercial organization had its origin in a racial instinct which is first manifested in the team games of Anglo-Saxon boyhood, and by those games educated and strengthened. He concluded also that the absence of team games amongst girls arose from the individualistic relations of woman, whose interest is in her husband and her home and who has never had any motive to develop the social instinct of mutual helpfulness such as primitive men felt in their tribal relations.

The above is only an instance of the character of Doctor Gulick's independent investigations into the underlying motives of children's play and the effect of play upon the adult life of the individual and of society. These investigations included a study of children's dances in many lands, a study of the physical and mental problems of adolescence, and other kindred subjects.

Physical Director of New York Schools.

At the same time, Doctor Gulick has been constantly engaged in the practical labors of directing the physical cultural training of the school children of the largest American city, with the unrivalled opportunity this work afforded of examining the effects of such training upon large bodies of children and of the relation of the training to the problems of sanitation, public health and juvenile delinquency in a congested city.

Hence the message that Doctor Gulick delivers on the subject of playgrounds is a message from a man rarely equipped with both theoretical and practical knowledge of his subject. He is, besides, a physician, which adds to the weight of his opinions on a subject which, at bottom, is a matter of health.

Why Playgrounds Must Be Had.

He explains that the origin of the necessity for public playgrounds in cities lies in the modern specialization of life in all its functions. He points out that the public school takes the place of the old-time home education. That the board of health usurps the function of the old-time spasm of spring house cleaning. That the factory has banished the loom from the family fireside. In short, a large share of the family functions of the past have been replaced by public or corporate specialization and standardization.

Exit the Vacant Lot.

But, though most of these usurpations have been beneficial, two have not. Modern industry has routed the hand tools from the house, so that the boy to-day grows up in ignorance of any manual craft such as those that formerly trained the muscles and nerves and brain and character, and, incidentally, that gave the boy an interest and an occupation for his spare time.

The other evil of modern conditions is: the congestion of modern cities has annihilated the vacant lot, the playground of boyhood. He is left to choose between the city streets, where the "gang" tempts him to delinquency and where the policeman interferes with the freedom of his play; and the listlessness and physical ruin of indoor amusements.

Either alternative is bad. The solution that has proved practical—the only solution—is the municipal playground. The boy cannot afford the money or the time to find the country playground. The city must bring it to him. And it is probably an improvement upon the vacant lot, for, instead of the undirected and often purposeless play of the lot, on the public playground the boy finds games adapted to his size and strength and skill, baths to prevent colds after his play, the kindly interest of a trained adult director, and a complete absence of the evils of bad manners, bad language, and bad sportsmanship that often marred the village lot.

Doctor Gulick is especially insistent that the playground is not a new thing. It is, he declares, an effort to get back a most valuable old possession of childhood, not, to be sure, in its exact reproduction but in the form best adapted to modern exigencies of city life. The form is changed, but the original intention and use are retained.

The First Municipal Playground.

The first municipal playground was founded in Massachusetts in 1885. The objection to its introduction elsewhere has often been made that cities should not have to pay for the land and equipment of playgrounds, for the reason either that the playgrounds were not useful or that the city got no return of equal value with the investment. Massachusetts has answered these objections in ringing tones. Conservative and money-cautious Massachusetts, after twenty-four years of widening experience, last year put up a state law locally optional in its terms, to forty-two cities and towns of the commonwealth, and forty of them voted to spend for playgrounds the per capita tax levied under this law.

The District of Columbia, this year, scored an equally emphatic resolution of approval by pruning down other expenses in order to include $37,000 in the budget for playgrounds.

What Fifteen Cities Are Doing.

The following are the imposing figures that show what fifteen of the leading cities of the United States are doing for public playgrounds, these figures being furnished by the Playground Association of America, No. 1 Madison avenue, New York city:

	No. of Play-grounds, 1909	No. of Employees, 1909	Expenditures, 1909
New York, N. Y.	261	1,023	$123,000.00
Chicago, Ill.	29	311	500,000.00

Philadelphia, Pa.	73	200	30,934.46
St. Louis, Mo.	11	63	6,135.00
Boston, Mass.	77	75	55,000.00
Baltimore, Md.	50	137	45,539.18
Pittsburg, Pa.	28	247	22,650.00
Cleveland, Ohio	15	37	42,812.13
Buffalo, N. Y.	8	22	17,420.00
Detroit, Mich.	11	58	6,510.00
San Francisco, Cal.	5	2	35,000.00
Cincinnati, Ohio	12	13	12,000.00
Washington, D. C.	32	95	15,500.00
Newark, N. J.	24	136	19,000.00
Providence, R. I.	19	53	6,000.00
Totals	655	2,472	$941,500.77

RECAPITULATION.

Population	13,252,614
Expense for maintenance	$941,500.77
Employees on playgrounds	2,472
Number of playgrounds	655
Average per city	$62,733.38
Average per capita	$.07

It is unfortunate that San Francisco appears at the bottom of the list, both in number of playgrounds and in the amount of expenditure; and that Los Angeles does not appear at all. But it is encouraging to know that the interest of the public in California is being aroused. Even in Fresno, which is not yet by any means in danger of the congestion of San Francisco, for instance, one playground is already in operation and the public is intelligently alive to its utility and to the necessity for providing others as the city grows.

Doctor Gulick thus comes to California at an opportune time, and we are especially fortunate that his principal addresses have been made before the State Teachers' Association, for the work of the playgrounds is naturally a department of the educational system.

AEROPLANES FOR SALE.

The aeroplane business is brisk in France, orders are numerous and prices are good, though with a slight downward tendency.

Latham sold the monoplane he used at Blackpool for $10,000 and Leblanc disposed of his for $3,000; but these are special cases. Wrights, Voisins and Levassours (Antoinettes) cost about $5,000, but tend to become cheaper. Bleriot's are quoted at $2,400 with a motor of 25-30 horsepower. Santos-Dumont's Demoiselle brand with a 30-35 horsepower engine can be bought for $1,500. The Clement firm is making a new biplane with a 43 horsepower engine to sell at $3,500.

Most of the noted automobile firms are to build aeroplanes. It is a question if competition will seriously affect the prices for some time, for prices in the automobile industry continued to increase for the first ten years.

The Bleriot company has orders for 150 smaller cross-Channel type aeroplanes and twelve larger passenger carrying machines and expects to finish these and fifty more before the end of the year.

LONGEVITY AND SOUR MILK.

Dr. Elie Metchnikoff contributed to a recent number of the Century Magazine an article on the utility of lactic microbes, in which he said:

"Contrary to what many journalists have made me say, I have never, in any of my publications on the subject, asserted that curdled milk is able to prolong life."

But he adds:

"We have the right to suppose they (the lactic microbes) might exercise a favorable influence in favor of longevity. Only, before such a supposition becomes a confessed reality, many precise facts have still to be gathered."

Nevertheless, says the New York Times, it has been found that bacilli inhabiting the digestive organs secrete phenols in abundance, "and these poisons act on the arteries and bring about arterio-sclerosis, one of the main symptoms of premature old age." These bacilli of putrefaction die, they cannot thrive, in the presence of the microbes of curdled milk. The administration of the lactic ferments is successful in remedying many intestinal ailments, and has been approved by the best physicians everywhere. Dr. Metchnikoff's denial, therefore, is made rather in the interest of scientific accuracy than because the intelligent layman requires it. Those who have the courage to imbibe the sour Metchnikoffian brews may abide in the hope that it will keep their arteries pliable.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

When Our Good Deed's Done.

It is fine to feel that our good deed's done,
And never we faltered a bit,
And we're apt to say to ourselves, "My son,
It is clear that you really are lit,"
And we pat ourselves on the righteous back—
That is, in symbolical way—
And we feel we are near the top of the pack,
Or made of a superfine clay.
'Tis our human way,
I regret to tell,
When a trump we play,
In our pride to swell.

When our good deed's done, first we strut a bit;

Then we strike a bog of clay,
And perhaps, ere we know, we are mired in it
In the old and pitiful way.
Then our strut subsides, and our smile is dead,
And we notice we're not so sure
In the human class we are near the head
And ranked with the saintly pure.
Oh, to strut and swell
Is our good-deed pose,
But we shrink and yell
When we stub our toes.

I fancy the Maker of every man
When He placed temptation here
Did it as part of an infinite plan
The world of its pride to clear,
For if you and I knew never a fall
On the dark and rocky road,
We would swell and swell—'tis the way of all—
Till I fear that we might explode.
Oh, we mean so well
Till so ill we do,
And pride is a spell
That is lost in rue.

The Splendid Riches.

Which is the better, son, to build a fortune in shining pieces of gold or in the love of one's fellow men? The question is worthy of your serious consideration, for the world in general, in its attitude toward wealth and in its profound kowtows and servile salaams to its possessor, assures us that, in its opinion, the best of all fortunes is that which is registered in the clink of many coins. Is the world right? Do you agree with it? I do not.

The other night I was present at a "good cheer dinner" given by James H. Barry to his friends and associates of the Star press.
About one hundred people were there; people from many walks of life, of all political parties, divers creeds, and much variety of opinion, but they were as a unit in esteem and love for their host—esteem which he had merited and love which he had won—and nobody could have entered that room without recognizing the fact, for the atmosphere fairly pulsated with this kindly feeling.

Sitting there, I knew that I was looking on the utmost wealth which our brief lives can give to us, the splendid riches of a well-earned affection, and, when I pass the shadowy river,
I would sooner leave, as heritage to my dear ones, such wealth as this than all the stored gold of a Rockefeller; I think that it would bless them more. Who is he who loves Rockefeller? A little time ago E. H. Harriman passed on; who is it that loves and reveres his memory? These men, and their kind, store gold, and they store nothing more.
But to have earned and stored love, ah, that is
the splendid riches.

Son, look wisely about you, and you cannot fail to learn that the world's great standard of wealth is but a shoddy standard. Gold is a right useful thing, but its riches are paltry when compared with the great treasure of our brothers' love, and only he who is unwise shall fail to know that this is so.

And, by the way, if a bouquet to James H.
Barry be involved in this—well, he deserves it, and can you mention any reason why I should delay bestowing it until after he is dead and unheeded of life's blossoms?

The Philosophy of Rufus.

Some girls remind me of cold-storage eggs —warranted jest es good, but with a flavor of a leetle too much experience hangin' round
'em.

I reckon the diary of the best of human lives might be summed up in, He tried, he failed, he tried again, an' then he kept on tryin'.

Ever notice that it's a good deal the same with human bein's es eggs floatin' in water—
the rotten ones sink to the bottom.

Gener'ly speakin', we're consider'bly alike, brother: We want to see the right prevail so much that we'd do most anything 'cept sacrifice for it. Seems es if our neighbors orto do that.

If some children can honor their fathers an' mothers, all I've got to say is it's more'n
the old folks ever did fer themselves.

I look on the best an' the worst men I ever knew es merely varyin' samples of what I might have been.

I don't know how the women did it, but 'pears ter me they've got a good many generashuns further from the cave-dwellers than us men have.

You can git your name in the papers by breakin' in—either into Society or into a house, but both methods have their disadvantages.

I s'pose it's true that "earth has no sorrows that heaven cannot heal," but I wish it sounded less like a patent-medicine advertisement.

It all depends on the point of view. Fer instance, a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush—but not to the bird.

Man's the head of the family—if it happens to be goin' in his direction, but I've seen lots of 'cases where the family percession 'peared to be pintoed the other way.

In rememberin' that we all have human feelin's, I've 'bout concluded 'tain't right to make an exception of even telephone girls.

A Love Story—With Explanations.

They were sitting in the gloaming.

(Explanation 1—In reality, they were sitting in a rocking chair, but the best novelists generally make them sit in the gloaming, and so the expression is here used. The best novelists do not hold it over us so many.)

The night crept silently upon them.

(Explanation 2—The night generally does this. In fact, the writer does not recall an instance of the night rollicking in noisily and hilariously.)

Closer and closer to each other they drew until, at last, her golden hair was upon his shoulder.

(Explanation 3—In reality the hair was black, but, being of the best quality, it cost so much that it is appropriate to refer to it as golden.)

Then, and not till then, he folded her in his arms and called her "darling."

(Explanation 4—He has a hump. No man need wait till she has her head on his shoulder before beginning to call her treacle names. Otherwise how can the poor girl know that she will not again have to remove her hair—from his shoulder, of course.)

The clock ticked on.

(Explanation 5—It is impossible to say just how and why the clock got into this tale, but it is no more inexplicable than a great many other things you may have noticed in fiction, so let the clock go, as, of course, it should.)

Suddenly faltering footsteps were heard in the distance, the very atmosphere seemed permeated by a permeating permeation, quickly she removed her hair, and they rose.

(Explanation 6—Here the story should become intense, absorbing, but it was nobody but her father coming home from the club, and he had done so much absorbing that none is left for this narrative.)

(Explanation 7—The absorbing qualities of this story being terminated so early in the game, its conclusion will be postponed till some other than a club evening.)

A Theater Tragedy.

'Twas at the theater, and she
In front of me serenely sat.
Alackaday, and woe is me!
She wore a landscape-garden hat!
"Fair maid," quoth I, "in pity move
Your hat—'tis sweet—from off your head."
The gentle lass did kindness prove
By doing straightway as I said.

Ah, woe, and woe, and yet more woe!
My tears do trickle as I write.
I heard the people praise bestow,
But never once had I a sight.
Her hat was off—Ah me! Great Scott!—
Yet no less blindly sat I there,
For could I ask—no, I could not—
That she should then remove her hair?

A Brief Talk With the Boy.

You are a boy, Tommy, and you cannot help it. More than that—and some people would consider it worse than that—you do not wish to help it. Would you be a girl?
Well, I should say not! Makes you tired just to think of it, doesn't it, Tommy? Of course it does; it ought to make anybody tired.
Girls are all right enough in their place, but such a place! Sitting around in the house and looking sweet! Shucks! No wonder that you concluded to be a boy. Wouldn't anybody with good judgment feel that way? You bet he would!

Just between ourselves, Tommy, I do not mind confessing that I once was a boy, and if I had it to do over again I should make the same selection. Of course we know that a boy can't be pretty, but neither can a girl skin the cat on a trapeze, and so it is all the boy's way. To be sure, lots of folks object to boys, but, then, boys object to lots of folks, and so that's even. It is too bad, of course, to scare your mother half to death every day or two, but women are so queer, and a feller can't help it about them, and so there is nothing you can do about it. It's mighty odd, though, about women.

So go your way, Tommy, your own riotous, hoisterous way. Be a real boy—no "sissy" imitation—have fun with the cat, and your sister's dolls, sympathize with your mother in her queer timidity, and forgive your father for whipping you because you cut a hole in the dining-table to see if it was oak all the way through. Be a real boy-boy, for let me whisper to you, Tommy, that it is out of such boys that the world makes the men that are worth while, the men with red blood in their veins, the men who do things, and there never was a time when it did not have need of such men. Yes, go your strenuous way, Tommy, and with my blessing, although I am afraid it will not help you very much

The Things We Didn't Do.

Of course the One who made us
He knows His children all,
How they stumble on the journey
Till they totter to a fall,
But I guess that my the mantle
Of His pity we are hid,
And I reckon He'll forgive us
For the wayward things we did.

But at times, when I am thinking
Of the past, it seems to me
That His mercy will be tested
To the very last degree,
Not by deeds of human folly,
Nor by those of sin and rue,
But—let's say our mea culpa—
By the things we didn't do.

believes him."
"Why not?"
"Why, it has been demonstrated that he

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Editor The California Weekly.

Dear Sir:—I have bought your paper at the newsstand this year and feel convinced that you are ably filling an important need in the community—that of an open, honest, intelligent and independent newspaper and advisor on civic and political matters on just which matters the mass of our newspapers—special pleaders before the bar of public opinion of this or that "interest"—are unreliable and demoralizing.

Inclosed please find check for a year's subscription to The California Weekly and to La Pollette's Weekly and a copy of Hitchborn's Story of the California Legislature. You may consider me a "regular" subscriber.

Your work has just begun and I wish you a successful new year.

Yours sincerely,

GEO. D. LOUDERBACK.

Berkeley, Cal., Dec. 24, 1909.

Professor Louderback has touched upon a vital point in the policy of The California Weekly. To be honest and independent where most of the dailies and nearly all the Coast weeklies are both disingenuous and servile was one of the cardinal reasons for the foundation of this paper. It has been the sincere endeavor of its editors to live to that ideal. It is pleasant to hear from independent sources that honest intentions have been recognized. To add that we have been intelligent is to crown a welcome compliment. Our New Year's resolution is to endeavor to maintain the character of the paper and to raise its plane of intelligence and interest.

Editor The California Weekly.

Dear Sir:—I find that my boy, just past his twenty-second birthday, is just as much interested in the paper as I am, and feel certain that his political ideals will be much higher because of the wholesome impressions gained by reading the same.

Wishing you all the success that you may merit, I am,

Yours truly,

W. H. HAUERT.

Tollhouse, Cal., Dec. 23, 1909.

It has been an earnest wish of the editors of this paper that it might especially appeal to those whose youth makes them the most susceptible to appeals to the higher standards of civic duty and civic morality. Of such is the salvation of a democracy. Low political ideals learned in youth are the seeds of political corruption in later years. Our School for Citizenship especially tries to point a better way to the novitiate in citizenship. Mr. Hauert's message is hence doubly a pleasure: it pictures a father pointing out to his son the pathway of civic righteousness, and it assures us that we are, in a measure, realizing our ambition to carry a message to the young men.

Editor The California Weekly.

The position of a correspondent in your issue of the 17th inst. regarding the law of supply and demand as not applicable to industrial conditions would appear untenable if he were asked for a solution of the following problem: Given a state of things when a The legislature has fixed the length of a day's work at eight hours.

b Labor organizations have established five dollars as the pay for such day's work for a skilled mechanic.
c High wages and other advantages pertaining to the lot of wage-earners have, in connection with our favoring immigration laws, produced a condition where two men are seeking one job.

This is the problem—what will your correspondent do with it ignoring the law of supply and demand? He may say that such a condition of things is very improbable; but it has existed in the past and is more likely to occur in the future, as the area of our public lands, which until lately, always held an attractive open door to the self-reliant and energetic man lacking employment, is reduced to almost nothing, and this opening is virtually closed; and Greeley's advice to the man to "go west" holds out no hope, inasmuch as there is no longer any west to receive him.

As The California Weekly said in a recent issue referring to a different matter: "It may not happen in a decade, possibly not in a generation," but as surely as history repeats itself, so certainly this question will become a vital one. How will your correspondent answer it?

To the writer there seem but three alternatives:
First, the employer may choose to employ one of the applicants as more convenient for himself without any regard to the needs of the other, or Second, the unions may decree that four hours shall constitute a day's work and shall be entitled to full pay for it, or Third, with the hours for a day's work divided by two the same rule shall be adopted as regards wages.

The first proposition is opposed to present-day humanitarian ideas.

The second, if put into operation, would bankrupt three-quarters of the contractors in the building trades who generally have long contracts unfulfilled; and most manufacturing concerns not having unlimited financial resources; while such as could outlive the storm would clean off their own books and suspend operations; while the third, which seems the only practicable method of bridging over the temporary difficulty, frankly recognizes the necessity of yielding obedience to the law of supply and demand.

So long as human nature is unchanged and selfishness exists as the basic motive for exertion, just so long, when conditions prevail requiring its enforcement, the law of supply and demand will assert its authority whether the matter involved lies in the commercial, industrial, or the intellectual nature.

This, we believe, is not always to be so, for when "the true significance of living" shall be apprehended by all, and every man, instead of trying to unload a part of his burden upon the back of another, regardless of the weight the other is laboring to carry, is, in truth, lessening the burden of his neighbor, then the law of brotherly love will supersede all human laws and men will improve with alacrity the opportunity to supply the needs of others, instead of making those needs subserve their own emolument or gratification.

E. C. W.

We respectfully refer this to Mr. Kent for answer.

Editor The California Weekly.

Dear Sir:—Some friends sent me several copies of your journal and as an ex-Californian I was glad to find you taking the position that you do, on city, state and national affairs.

The enclosed extracts from the leading article in the Berlin Tageblatt of December 9th may be too late in reaching you to have news value, still I was interested and pleased to find a foreign journalist making such a correct diagnosis of American affairs.

Yours respectfully,

W. S. KULS.

Berlin, Germany, Dec. 13, 1909.
TRANSLATION

"It is said that in the same corner of the official office in the White House where, in President Roosevelt's time, a shining gun was accustomed to stand, to-day is placed a case well filled with judicial books. The merry fighter and wielder of the big stick who was not accustomed to mince words even in his official notices is followed by the peaceful and circumspect judge whose political principle is to reconcile opposition in wisdom and mildness. In this way a land governed by political machinery may be ruled for good or bad during a couple of years, but it is a question if that is the way a nation can be advanced in any direction. There is great risk of incurring displeasure on all sides. The President's message outlines foreign and some home matters in a very peaceful and restrained tone. The friendly smile which the President always wears on his official appearances as well as on the golf links, seems to be spread all over the message. Mr. Taft has already learned from his long circular journey, however, that his smile cannot banish the dissatisfaction gathering in all parts of the country.

"The staunch adherents of Roosevelt expect from Taft decided measures against trusts and the revision of the tariff, this time downward. The reactionaries in congress—the Cannons, Paynes and Aldriches—demand that he place himself resolutely on their side if he wishes to be re-elected three years hence.

"Roosevelt's cold-blooded successor evidently wishes to watch a little longer which way the hare runs and so he sent to congress a message in which, for the present, he carefully steers between the rocks on the right and on the left without making trouble for himself or for others.

"The campaign against the misuse of power by great trusts which Taft announced in his inaugural address early in the year has not been carried out. The attitude of the friendly President toward the trusts remains yet to be seen, but the quotations on stocks in Wall street show that they expect nothing disagreeable from him."—Berlin Tageblatt.

The point of view of a German newspaper is interesting for its very remoteness. How correct the diagnosis of President Taft may be cannot be known until the present congress shows how far his leadership will be followed and until his special messages fully reveal the qualities of that leadership. But of the interest of receiving a friendly communication from an ex-Californian 6,000 miles away The California Weekly has no doubts. The letter is duly appreciated.

WOMAN'S DESTINY.

By Elizabeth Barrett Browning.

... "Raise the majesties
Of thy disconsolate brows, O well-beloved,
And front with level eyelids the To-come,
And all the dark o' the world. Rise, woman, rise

To thy peculiar and best attitudes
Of doing good and of enduring ill;
Of comforting for ill, and teaching good
Unto the patience of a constant hope,—
Rise, with thy daughters!

... But, go to! thy love
Shall chant itself its own beatitudes
After its own life working. A child's kiss
Set on thy sighing lips shall make thee glad;
A poor man served by thee shall make thee
rich;
A sick man helped by thee shall make thee strong;

Thou shalt be served thyself by every sense
Of service which thou renderest."

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Too Obvious to be Probable

The obvious situation on governor is that there is to be a three-cornered fight, with Curry and Gillett representing the machine, and some Lincoln-Roosevelt League candidate representing the reformers. Also, there may be some "scattering" candidates, perhaps strong enough personally, but hopeless for lack of organized support. It is, for instance, thinkable that if Belshaw did not receive, or did not seek, the Lincoln-Roosevelt League indorsement, he might still run as an independent candidate affiliated with the reformers. That at least was his original intention. Stanton might play a similar role, on the side of the machine. But the main fight would still be three-cornered, with the advantage all on the side of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League candidate. That, it is evident, is the obvious situation. But, just because it is so obvious, it is hardly conceivable that it would be permitted to develop in that way without at least some effort to prevent. The danger of dividing the machine forces is as obvious to the machine leaders as it is to every one else, and it is to be assumed that they will avoid it if they can.

Machine Hedging On the Governor

At this writing, Governor Gillett's candidacy is still hanging on the determination of Mrs. Gillett. Pending that determination, the governor has been seeking its answer, all the way from Imperial to Shasta. Mrs. Gillett was in none of these places, and it was hard to resist the suspicion that somehow other oracles than hers were being consulted. However, it is known that Mrs. Gillett is very seriously opposed to the governor's running for another term, and if the determination is really left to her uninfluenced preference, Gillett will not run. The governor's own preference is to run. He likes the job, and would be glad to continue in it. Also, he has been very strongly urged, by the whole pap-sucking brigade, and by a large element of the "organization." Another element, including some of the governor's closest friends, is opposed. It is among the possibilities that the strategic situation may increase the numbers and influence of this element.

Knight's Bloviating Is Not Serious

The culmination of George Knight against the candidacy of Gillett is not to be taken too seriously. Knight simply blew off steam, one night, and the next morning "stood for" the interview. There is no need to suspect a "program." Knight does not know how to take program—not even his own. He is never quite sure himself what he is going to do next, and no one else can count on him at all. He is very fond of demonstrating his independence of the machine by adducing instances when he jumped over the traces. They are numerous and spectacular. But, also, they are merely temperamental. As an instance on the other side, it will be recalled that when Knight made a speech for Dan Ryan, for mayor, he promised not to say anything about McGowan, for district attorney. He really meant to keep the promise, but somehow slipped a switch and got on the wrong track. His latest utterance against Gillett probably betokens nothing more serious than a personal grudge or a Humboldt split. If the machine were looking for a voice it would seek a more discreet one than Knight's.

What "Organization" Really Consists of

It is perhaps interesting to recall that in a very important sense George A. Knight is the official Republican party of California. The "organization," which arrogates to itself the name of "Regular Republican," exists literally by the fiat of Knight. The government of the Republican party in California has hitherto been a self-perpetuating autocracy. The delegates to the convention, to be sure, have chosen the state central committee, and that committee is, therefore, only one degree removed from being as representative as the delegates themselves. That is not very representative, since most of these delegates were appointed by their own committees, instead of being elected at the party primaries, but it is at least representative in form, and partly representative in substance. Such a committee, electing its own officers and choosing its own executive committee, would at least remotely resemble other American institutions. But the whole thing is an empty form. The state central committee of the Republican party in California has no functions whatever. All its functions are exercised by an executive committee, not chosen by it nor from its membership. This committee is appointed by the chairman of the convention, and it in turn picks the chairman of the next generation. So the authority is transmitted, without at any point being referred to the people for their consent. The chairman of the last state convention was this same George A. Knight. He appointed the present "organization," every man of them a well-drilled machine servitor. The appeal to Republicans to be "loyal to the regular organization" is an appeal to be loyal to that system and obedient to George A. Knight.

Labor Gravitating Toward Chas. F. Curry

A local union of railroad firemen, having its situs in Sacramento, has come out with an official declaration that it is for Charles F. Curry for governor, if we may believe the daily papers; but we rather suspect that the papers are in error, since labor unions as such disclaim being in politics. All of the members of this particular union may be for Curry, but it is not probable that the union has declared for him officially. However, the gravitation of the labor union vote toward Curry is an unmistakable sign of the times, and much as Mayor-elect McCarthy may wish to hold that vote for Governor Gillett, he will have small success in the endeavor. Some of the most irresistible movements have least basis in reason, and therefore it would not be very surprising if C. F. Curry, whose name stands for no known principle of labor unionism, and who has done nothing to entitle himself to be considered a reformer of abuses against which labor unions are contending, should be the favorite of that class of voters. Of course he has cultivated the labor unionists as voters, the same as he has other classes of voters; he has tickled all sorts and conditions of men in order to get their votes; and yet, somehow, the tradition appears to have gone out that this selfish, calculating politician is the special "friend of labor." The same kind of popular tradition attaches every now and then to a Cataline, a Robespierre and other extraordinary characters.

Labor for Good Government Ticket in Los Angeles

In this same connection it is worth mentioning that in the late city election in Los Angeles, which will long be recognized as one of the most epoch-marking elections we have had in California, the districts in which the workingmen's vote is strong went against the machine and in favor of Alexander and the Good Government ticket. This fact was pointed out by the Los Angeles newspapers during the days following the election, and there is no question that it is significant. One of the favorite tricks of the machine, that consummate master of tricks, is to start some story to create a belief that the welfare of labor voters rests in voting for the machine ticket, and when no better bit of flim-flam is available, it is contended that reformers are naturally kid-gloved people—aristocrats who have a natural aversion to all who labor with their hands. But neither this nor any other artifice sufficed to keep the workingmen from voting for good government, while in several instances precincts in which the wealthy have their homes returned majorities for the machine ticket. It is true that dislike for the Los Angeles Times, which was the chief advocate of the machine ticket, may have influenced some labor voters, but lack of sympathy with machine politics was the principal influence—at least, we hope so.

Is Stanton Out For Governor?

The Sacramento Union prints a signed article by Edward Insley, who is its managing editor, in which he quotes current opinion in Los Angeles to the effect that Speaker Philip A. Stanton of the assembly will soon come out as a candidate for governor. This is hardly intelligible unless the belief prevails there that Governor Gillett will not run, because Philip is too good an organization man to run unless he has the support of that combination, and he knows he cannot expect it if the governor is in the field. Although Stanton has shown brief spasms of independence on a few occasions, he has never made a hit with the anti-organization men in Los Angeles, and there would be absolutely no sense in his candidacy, as he well knows, save with the support of the machine. Maybe it is the governor's long hesitancy in declaring himself, maybe it is something else which they think they know, that leads the friends of Stanton, and apparently Stanton himself, to believe he will be in the fight. For Stanton was interviewed by the voracious Insley, and to him it was said by the possible candidate that he anticipated making some kind of announcement in a couple of weeks. Meantime he was going East to consult a medical specialist, for although the Los Angeles doctors who attended him through his recent illness think he is in trim for a campaign, he wants their judgment corroborated before he starts in. This shows the speaker in the light of prudence and might furnish a suggestion to his rivals; every sagacious candidate for gubernatorial honors should at the outset procure a physician's certificate and a life insurance policy. But in the event that Governor Gillett decides that he will not venture will the organization permit Stanton or any other aspirant to come between Curry and the goal of success?

Which One Will The Machine Drop?

Considerable California state politics is done in the city of Washington, as we all found out when the present governor's first nomination for the office was given him around the banquet table there, some four years ago. The Call's special correspondent, who is in a way to hear what is being said in the capital, reports that it is current talk there that the candidate will be Gillett, if he consents to run, and if not it will be Curry. In this connection it may be added that a good deal nearer home than Washington it has been the opinion of most of the shrewd ones that it would be contrary to all rules of railroad policy, and not to be believed, that both Gillett and Curry should be allowed to run and compete with one another, when it is all but certain that to do so would be to defeat both. So far, let it be remembered, there is but one organization candidate—Secretary Curry—before the people, and he is being given an excellent opportunity to try out his strength. This is something which Mr. Herrin insists that a candidate shall do before he is picked up and adopted officially by the organization, and it is within the bounds of possibility that the present anomalous situation has been arranged especially to give Curry the chance to develop his strength and show whether he looks anything like a winner. If he does, he will presumably be adopted, and in that event Governor Gillett will get the tip in time to decide that he has had all of the gubernatorial honors he wants. But if there are too many signs that the serious-minded Republicans of the state would not stand for a nominee of Curry's characteristics, then Gillett is in a

Watching Government In the Home County

The showing of bad business methods made through grand jury investigations in Alameda, San Mateo and other counties has been extended to Sacramento, where a report was recently rendered which ought to make the taxpayers wince and the office-holders seek to dodge. It is the old story of lax ways and lavish expenditures with small results; contractors selling supplies at extravagant prices; the supervisors personally participating in the profits in a manner which more than suggests graft; lack of proper accounting methods, and inefficient enforcement of the laws intended to surround the transactions of county governments with adequate safeguards. It is shown that in certain instances articles bought by the county under contract cost 300 or 400 per cent. more than the same supplies could be bought for in the open market. Many bills were audited and paid without being itemized. One of the county supervisors is in the livery business, and his firm has rendered large bills against the county for livery hire. But the most extraordinary incident is that of a firm of small contractors, one of whose members is drawing a county salary as a constable, while the other does the same as a deputy health officer; one of the partners secured a good sized contract to build roads for the county, and the other was appointed an overseer to watch his partner and insure the work being properly done. Sacramento county is no worse, or no more unfortunate, than many other counties, in some of which similar methods in the transaction of public business have been exposed while in others the methods no doubt exist but have not been exposed as yet. California has the same experience as eastern states in finding that local government, near home as it comes to the taxpayers, is not watched any closer than government at a greater distance. The remedy to which they are turning in some of the states is state supervision of county affairs to this extent, that forms of accounting are devised by a state commission, are installed and their administration watched. An attempt to do the same in California may be expected if these revelations go on.

Sweeney Tackles A Bigger Job

John W. Sweeney retires to-day from the office of secretary to the Playground Commission of San Francisco, in which office he has done most of the practical work that has been done to put the playgrounds into usable condition. But this achievement is less noteworthy than the gallant fight he made during the last campaign to assist in electing the Good Government ticket, a fight made at great personal sacrifice and at the cost of some of his intimate friendships. Mr. Sweeney has been a useful citizen of San Francisco where his shrewd judgment and knowledge of labor conditions have been potent aids in the organization of reform political movements. He leaves the playground work to tackle a bigger job, the job of beating General Otis and the open shop in Los Angeles, as organizer for the international union of pattern makers in the iron trade.

When Bwana Tumbo Gets Back Home

Conflicting reports come from Washington as to the probable attitude of Theodore Roosevelt, when he returns to the United States. One very persistent report, spread with much positiveness and alleged to be based on knowledge, is that he will issue a "ringing appeal" to the country to stand by Taft and the G. O. P. According to this report, the course of President Taft, in refraining from interference with the election of Speaker Cannon, was taken with Roosevelt's advice and approval, and is only preliminary to an onslaught next time, when victory will be possible. Roosevelt recognized that the belligerent methods, which were so successful in arousing the people, were the very thing to prevent success in getting concrete action out of congress. Therefore he approved and still approves the course of

THE INJUSTICE OF SHIP SUBSIDY

A REPLY TO MR. GEORGE W. DICKIE'S PLEA FOR MAIL SUBVENTIONS.

By ABBOT KINNEY.

Mr. Dickie's articles on American Shipping published in your journal, are interesting and give information on the subject.

The impression left on the mind by these articles is that the one way to re-establish the American merchant marine on the ocean is by some form of bounty, bonus or subsidy.

The reasons given for this opinion are:

1st—Higher cost of steel ships in the United States than in other countries.

2nd—Higher cost of labor on American ships than under foreign flags. These two reasons creating the general fact that ocean shipping under the American flag is a losing business; and 3rd—That the United States navy, to be efficient at sea, needs auxiliary steamers and colliers.

Let us take these reasons up seriatim.

Trust Cause of High Steel.

1st—One cause of the higher cost of steel ships in the United States is the higher cost of steel. This higher cost of steel is due to a special privilege held by the American steel trust through the tariff. This monopoly can, and does sell American steel to foreign countries at a less price than the same grade of steel is sold for to Americans. The steel trust successfully competes with foreign producers and undersells them in their own markets with freight added. The special privilege held by the steel trust delegates to it the public power to tax the American people limited only by the tariff on one side and the trust combine solidarity on the other. This handicap to ship building in America can be removed by abrogating this special privilege.

Another cause of the higher price of ships is the solidarity of interest and action amongst the largest American ship builders. These are now mainly supported by government contracts and are reported and believed to generally stand pretty well together on prices. They have actually sold steel ships to foreign countries in competition with the world's builders of ships.

Another cause is alleged by Mr. Dickie to be the higher cost of labor in the building of ships. This cause is also alleged as a handicap in the necessary labor in managing ships.

Dilemma of Per Capita Wage.

If it is true that a higher per capita wage causes a higher cost of labor in production or service, we are confronted by one of two conclusions. Either the general profit derived from labor at the per capita cost prevailing in the American ship building centers is so much greater in other things than it is in ship building, or in managing ships that the enterprising people who employ labor—left to their own free choice and without holding the delegated public power to tax, or receiving taxes forced from the public directly and paid to them in bonuses or subsidies—find their profit to be in other things than ocean shipping.

The proposal of a subsidy, then, is that Americans should be taken from present profitable employments and, at the public cost and by public taxes, be induced to go into a confessedly losing business.

The other horn of the dilemma is that the governing factor in the cost of production or of service is the per capita wage paid.

If this is true, then the class conflict has no end. Far more than this; humanity under this doctrine has no hope except in some revised form of communal society in which the state owns, controls and directs all things and all persons. As this communal form has been independently worked out in various places and at various times and everywhere failed in providing acceptable and progressive conditions for mankind, we may say that the case of the per capita wage being the governing factor in the cost of production or service leaves humanity hopeless.

An Eternal Class Conflict?

Our society must then be in an eternal class conflict, in which the employer's interest is always to cut down wages and per capita pay with the ideal of the cheapest production; "human slavery" and no wages at all on the one side, and fighting labor organizations on the other side.

The interest of the employer and the wage-earner being always diverse and at swords' points, the special privileges created by the so-called protective tariff could not evade this class war in America. The tariff beneficiaries are the creators of the American class conflict. They have not kept up wages or sought to do so. In fact, one of the original reasons advanced for granting to them the public power to tax their compatriots was that the per capita cost of labor in the United States was higher than it was elsewhere. This is the same reason advanced for taking public taxes and giving them to private persons or companies to induce ship building and ship owning.

The claim that such a use of the public taxing power is justified by the general good that the holders of special privilege would do the country and the people is a claim that always has been advanced by all persons holding the delegated public power of taxing, as under the protective tariff or as in receiving direct bonuses or subsidies derived from the public taxes.

Fortunately it is not true that the per capita cost of wages is the governing factor in the labor cost of production or service.

Governing Factor In Labor Cost.

The governing factor in the labor cost of production or service is the individual energy and capacity of the laborer compared to the per capita wage. It is not the per capita wage alone.

There is a natural law of wages as there is a natural law in all things.

That law is that in the long run the individual wage must correspond to the product or service of the wage earner, leaving a wage for the capital hired and a wage or reward for the employer. With natural and free opportunity and free competition the natural law is bound to assert itself. Under such conditions, society or the state has the certainty of internal peace and the individuals of society have unlimited opportunity to improve their productive power. The risk in enterprise is mainly with the capital hired and with the employer, and not with the laborer. This fact should not be forgotten.

Many civilizations—and all of the extinct ones—have obstructed or destroyed the natural law of wages. This is now being done in the United States. The decay of the state through the decay of its individual units has always been the result. They are all down and out. This is true of all communal social organizations. They all violated the natural law of wages.

Necessity for Labor Efficiency.

It must be plain to any person of fair intelligence who gives attention to the subject of efficient labor, that a laborer in any line, to be efficient, must have a certain amount of physical and mental vigor.

To secure this condition in the laborer, there must be sufficient nutritious food, sufficient sanitary welfare in the clothing and housing and some modicum of hope and interest in the personal benefit of the work for the laborer. The hours of labor for the highest labor efficiency are limited. To exceed these hours is to injure the laborer and bring on premature incapacity with direct injury to the state.

Where wages are insufficient to secure any of these needs, it is certain that the lack of interest the laborer has will diminish his or her efficiency and it is equally certain that inadequate food supply and bad sanitary conditions must diminish physical power to work.

Excessive labor hours will also reduce efficiency and safety.

There is, then, a point below which wages cannot fall without diminishing or destroying the efficiency of labor and consequently increasing the cost of labor in product or service. Per capita wages can then be very low and yet the labor cost of product can be prohibitively high.

This explains how it is that the high wage countries supply the low wage countries in general with the higher grade of products and take from them in exchange mainly those things that from climatic and other reasons they have a practical monopoly of. Of these things, we may mention coffee, pepper, spices, cocoa, cocaine, Indian hemp, mahogany, bananas, cane sugar, etc.

Even Slave Labor Not Cheap.

Even in slavery this limit to cheapening labor has been so generally recognized that we may almost say that it has been universally recognized. The slave holder provided sanitary housing, adequate energy-producing food, enough clothing to prevent loss of vitality in the worker, and generally suggested or permitted some amusement.

In addition to this, the slave holder cared for the worker when injured or sick, and in nearly all cases took care of and fed and housed and clothed those too young or too old to work.

The one thing, speaking in a broad, general way, lacking in producing efficiency in slave labor was the lack of any provision to awaken or stimulate the intellect or the individual ambition or interest.

The result of slave labor was, and always is, excessive labor cost in production or service. No slave labor country ever competed in the price of product with an economically advanced state on an otherwise similar plane of economic evolution.

This striking fact is confirmed by the experience of cotton raisers in the Southern States since the Civil War. The labor cost of raising a bale of cotton is less under the present free labor of the South with wages, or a share in the crop, than it was under the no-wage system of slave labor.

The false theory that the labor cost of any product is based on the per capita wage is a great source of the troubles between employers and employed. To whom this damnable doctrine does the most harm, it is difficult to say. The doctrine that the cheaper the per capita wage, the lower the labor cost of product or service is one of those false opinions that has a general acceptance to the certain injury of the stability and strength of any state.

The security of property is inevitably undermined by that theory. It is so palpably untrue that its continued iteration can only be attributed to the moral disease created in the United States by the great special privilege holders. The state should surely cease to delegate to these over-grown powers the opportunity and technical right to tax their fellow citizens. Such or like special privileges have in all cases and in all times, created a minority of enormous wealth and a great mass of population living from hand to mouth. The result has always been the decay of the state and the misery of the masses.

"Equal justice to all and special privilege to none," is the one sound doctrine of political economy and of political morals that should never be broken down.

Trials of Privilege in Shipping.

The doctrine of special privilege has already been adopted several times in the United States to bolster up the American merchant marine. The result of the effort to apply these special privileges to the free ocean was to create some of our most blatant graft congressional scandals. None of these shipping bonuses or subsidies gave growth or vitality to the American merchant marine. All they did was to create a new lobby with its traditions and deals and vices.

Mr. Dickie's suggestion is to grant a part of the public taxes derived from the body of the people to certain private interests to build and conduct steamship lines by contract and for a long period of years.

He enumerates the lines and service to be in private hands and to be supported at public expense. These subsidized steamships would amount to very little compared to the great merchant marine of the British Empire under free trade and a square deal.

Such a plan of subsidy action would discourage or shut out free American competitive and un-bountied shipping enterprise. There is no reason to think that the proposed shipping subsidies would create any but subsidized lines and ships.

Mr. Dickie's English Example.

The English case Mr. Dickie cites is on an entirely different basis. The English subvention to a number of large and fast steamships not only carries an obligation to carry the mails, but also, and mainly, places those vessels at the command of the British military administration for the transport of supplies and soldiers to any threatened or endangered part of the widely scattered British Empire. There appears to be no provision for colliers. The first need of the American navy is for colliers. It does not appear that the proposed use of the public taxes for the proposed lines of American steamers would in any way fill this need.

The British contract affects so small a part of the British merchant marine, and it is so plain that it was a strictly military move and without any idea of creating a merchant marine—something already thoroughly established in Great Britain—that it does not seem to be a sound precedent to set up for the creation of a merchant marine for the United States.

The French experiments on this line have certainly been a costly failure.

Temper of Public Toward Privilege.

In addition to the above views against the use of public taxes for private benefit and for a claimed indirect public benefit, the present temper of the American public in regard to such use of the public taxes should be considered.

The opinion is growing that the public taxing power, or the public taxes, should never be given to private interests.

The abuses growing out of special privilege have become so glaring in this country, and are so generally recognized, that it is now difficult to secure new delegations of the public taxing power to private interests. It is still more difficult to procure the gift of public taxes direct to private interests.

The easiest way, therefore, to obtain government-supported steamships is to advocate the government ownership and management of such transportation enterprises.

Whatever policy may be adopted to advance American maritime interests, it is clear that the existing handicaps to these interests should be removed.

State, county and city taxes should be taken from ships engaged in foreign commerce.

This is a mere matter of plain justice. American ships in a California port and engaged in foreign commerce receive no more or greater police service or commercial advantage than foreign ships, or the ships from another state.

Injustice of Local Tax on Shipping.

While such a ship is on the high seas or in a foreign port, such public service as is rendered to it, is rendered by the United States ambassadors, ministers plenipotentiary, and counsuls and by the United States navy, and not at all by California or any of its cities or counties. A tax on a ship engaged in foreign commerce by California or by the city and county of San Francisco can render to it no service in return for the tax. It is, therefore unjust.

Such a tax as California and its ports now impose on American ships engaged in foreign commerce is not imposed by other foreign local governments and not even by other American seaboard states with important shipping interests. There is either no such tax or one nominal compared to the California tax.

This local and state taxation in California on American ships in foreign commerce has proved to be a prohibition to such ownership.

We find that, regardless of the local ownership of the few American ships left in the foreign business, none of them are registered in California. Owners will register in England, or Honolulu, or Belgium, or in New York state, or anywhere, except in California. Not one important sea-going ship trading to a foreign port is believed to be registered in California. This tax is a prohibition tax.

Obscene Literature and Ships!

Another prohibition in the national laws prohibits the importation into the United States of obscene literature and ships.

This pleasing and patriotic classification has been more effective in preventing the importation of ships than it has been in preventing the importation of obscene literature.

No other country commits this folly, as to ships.

The result of their prohibition is to invite the creation of a steel trust and a ship building trust, if none such now existed.

Our people can pay the tax and the fine for purchasing things similar to the American protected products abroad. There is, therefore, some limit to the delegated power of public taxation held by the great trusts. Only in obscene literature and ships is the protection of the trust complete. Even in this, there is the possibility of smuggling in bad moral things, while there is no chance at all to smuggle in a ship.

There are a number of other things in the federal navigation laws that are handicaps and discouragements to shipowning, and that urgently demand change.

These laws, as a whole, are a relic of barbarism. Every civilized country has abandoned the American procedure in these maritime matters.

England abandoned a similar line of policy to its great advantage first of all and in the early forties.

Give shipping enterprise a square deal and try that before resorting to the trades, lobbying and scandals of subsidy.

Post and Montgomery Sts.

THEY had parted in anger five years before. The motherless girl and the busy, imperious father had often clashed over the discipline of governesses and chaperones. These pale and proper females had tried conscientiously enough to earn their wages but they could not understand the odd, passionate and self-willed girl committed to their charge. Their usefulness as guardians and mentors was exactly limited to the fact of their sex. It did not extend to the insight and patience of the mother in whose stead they stood.

The end had come when the last of the line of these ladies who attempted this difficult relation demanded that she be allowed to open and censor Ruth's correspondence. Miss Allen was the last person to whom such a charge would naturally be committed. The cold and precise annals of her life included no chapter of romance, and Ruth was at the age when that is the most interesting chapter in the book. Miss Allen made the demand and Ruth indignantly, rudely, spurned it.

That night the father came home to a house full of dissension. Mr. Van Altren was used to the emergencies of business. His practical mind seized the details of a situation quickly; his executive habit made him declare his instant and unalterable decision. "No" was never repeated at 59 Wall street, and Mr. Van Altren harbored a secret pride in the smoothly working mechanism of his office. With such a habit of mind he met the situation at home. He heard Miss Allen's brief and formal statement of the case. It was plain that to override Miss Allen would be to encourage insubordination and to weaken the executive responsibility of Ruth's manager. His answer was as incisive as a military command. Ruth must yield.

To-night, as he sat alone in the wide house beside an open window, and after the lapse of five years, it did not seem so plain. The practical side of it appeared as simple as ever, but the happenings of those five years had left a doubt of this having been merely a practical problem. Unknown quantities had entered into it, causing unimagined results. Ruth had not acquiesced. She had denied the justice of his parental authority, she had pleaded, she had wooed his consent with caresses, she had wept. Finally, she had risen in a mood he had never seen before, of tigerish wrath and defiance, and had left him in his library, a very angry and badly confounded gentleman.

The next morning she was absent from the breakfast table. A note in her room announced that she was of age, that she had left her family roof and that she would not return. Within the following month Mr. Van Altren had made sure of her safety, across the continent in a small California town, and Miss Allen had joined the shadowy memory of her predecessors, thanking her stars that she had been delivered from the task of lion tamer, as she phrased it.

Mr. Van Altren had admitted no thought of reconciliation to his mind. He had kept himself informed of Ruth's whereabouts and waited for her to return in contrition. He waited in vain. Two years later he had been enraged to learn of her marriage, described by his agent, a young lawyer in the western town, as being a union with "a fairly prosperous German rancher who has recently taken out his first naturalization papers." Mr. Van Altren had thereupon promptly dismissed his agent with a curt note and a large final check, and from that day received no word of Ruth.

But to-night as he sat by the open window a mood of wistfulness, almost of regret, came on him. The night was hot and he sat in darkness, looking out across Fifth avenue, where the carriages and automobiles streamed by, across to the trees and somber shadows and dim lamps in Central Park. The roar of the city's traffic, beating against his ears like the roar of a surf on the beach, was a sort of companionship, impersonal but familiar. But at his back he felt the vacancy of the mansion's rooms and the isolation of his splendid mastery there. Even the companionship of the city outside held no intimacy for him. The only things that suggested any personal relation to himself, to the self of his wistful mood, were the stars that shone above the glamour of the city and above the darkness of the trees. They, at least, shone also above his own flesh and blood, even though she were far in that West which was as foreign and as savage as the Congo to his eyes. He rose late from his solitary watch by the window, and with a new resolve in his mind. He would make a coup, as he had often made in business; he would enter this dark continent of the West and wrench from it the one object in it that held his heart's desire.

He took a train for the West the next morning. Chicago had been, always, to his mind the limit of the habitable world. Thence, as the train rolled through the rich green of Missouri and Kansas cornfields and mounted the solemn slope to the continental divide, he felt a contemptuous disregard of his first frontier. But when he encountered the long stretches of desert in New Mexico, Arizona, and California, a new feeling of interest arose in his mind. These mighty distances of silence and the huge bowl of unbroken sky appealed to the sense of power and space in his own soul. Here was an arena he could understand, the strong man face to face with a tremendous mood of Nature.

The train set him down at Fresno, then a small town. His earlier feeling of disgust rose again. Flat, dusty, hot, inelegant, the town seemed to him to have the rawness of impossible barbarism. How Ruth could have endured this place after her breeding in New York, he could not understand. He was destined to sterner shocks. His inquiries as to the location of the ranch of one Henry Schmidt brought the information that it was twenty miles to the north, in the wheat country. A lively team and driver took him at once toward it.

Riding through the "hogwallow" land north of Fresno in the heat of a summer day is hot work. Mr. Van Altren sorely resented it. He was in no mood to appreciate now the vast level spaces, undulating in miles of wheat to the northern horizon, unbroken by tree or house or fence; nor to feel the thrill that rises in the heart of the native at the sight of the great range looming smokily toward the zenith at the east. His humor was one of irritation when he reached the ranch of "one Henry Schmidt."

This was almost the hardest shock, the ranch with its broad wheat fields flowing in every direction, its windmill, its few struggling sprouts of trees, its unpainted house and its far more pretentious barn.

The meeting with Ruth was the climax of the rising scale of his disillusionments. Clad in a loose calico print dress, with a blue sun-bonnet shielding her eyes, her face tanned by the sun, she was a striking contrast to the Ruth he remembered, of the trim figure and rich attire and rosy cheeks. She greeted him cordially but not effusively, and as, after kissing her and holding her at arm's length, he looked into her eyes, he saw that they no longer danced as they had done of old, but looked steadily, with a grave interest that saw not only objects but apparently what lay behind the objective view. He was surprised and shocked, too, to see two little urchins clinging to her skirts, around which they peered at him distrustfully.

The interior of the house, whither Ruth led him, was a relief. The bareness of the rooms was lightened by some touches of her old instinct for beauty. Even the cheap furniture was a little glorified by a skillful arrangement.

But Mr. Van Altren was not at ease. He felt suddenly that he had come on an absurd mission; he had come to ask a woman, no longer a headstrong girl, a wife with children, to leave her husband and to follow an old man who happened to be her father back to the East. These sunburnt lads, with their uncouth wildness, had no place in the scheme of a Fifth avenue mansion. He talked indifferently of indifferent things. Maybe the husband could be bribed to settle on a farm upstate in New York. He would see him first, and perhaps suggest it.

Schmidt came in after a while for his supper.

"Henry, this is my father, Mr. Van Altren. Mr. Schmidt, papa."

They shook hands. The elegant figure of the New Yorker looked strangely out of place before the magnificent physical specimen which belonged naturally to the scene. Schmidt was six feet six and broad shouldered and muscular. His boyish, good-natured face clouded as he shook hands.

"You are welcome, sir. It iss my home where I say it. Elsewhere, no."

Mr. Van Altren flushed, but quickly recovered. He spoke slowly.

"You are right, sir. I ask your hospitality only long enough for an evening's talk with my daughter. I shall return to the East to-morrow."

After supper, Schmidt and Mr. Van Altren smoked together on the back porch, while Ruth cleared up the dishes. When she came out, removing her apron, Schmidt arose.

"I shall sleep. Goot night."

He entered the house, his huge bulk filling the doorway as he passed through it. Ruth sat down by her father and they watched, in silence, the harvest moon rise, golden and magnified, over the eastern rim, and diminish and turn to silver, bathing the landscape in the softly dazzling light of a Californian night. The solemnity of great spaces and the mystery of vast solitudes fell deeply upon father and daughter. His cigar seemed a desecration; with an unconscious emotion of reverence, he let it die and fall. At length he spoke:

"Daughter, I have been a hard man, used to the harsh dealings of business. I forgot once that home is not business and that girlhood is not subject to the rules of Wall street. I was wrong. A week ago I sat alone in New York, under these same stars, and felt as if the world were a vacant place without you at my side. I want you there; I need you; I have come here with repentance for the past and with the assurance of my devotion for the future—come to take you back with me, to be the strength of my old years—I'm getting old—to give you everything you want, money, time, love, everything. I ask only forgiveness and love in return. We'll go back to-morrow and begin again, with a better understanding, forgetting the past, or remembering it only as a warning to me. To-morrow, Ruth, we'll go, won't we, child?"

He had begun slowly. He ended rapidly, intense with earnestness. He held out his hands to her—he had risen—pleadingly. Ruth sat with her hands folded in her lap, her eyes looking past him, over the undulating miles of wheat, past the silver moon, beyond the stars. She shook her head slowly.

"No. I'm sorry for you, father. Don't mistake my meaning. I would gladly do anything I could do to make you happy. I know what happiness is, and—the lack of it. Forgive me, I shouldn't have said that. But you don't understand. This is home, that is my husband in there, those are my children. You gave me money, you gave me an education, you gave me the luxuries of life, all the amusements that money could buy. I had my fling, at the theatres, with fine clothes, at dances, everything society and money could give. I was fortunate beyond thousands. I had my own way, too, in most things—too much my own way. Henry does not allow it. He is strict. I must do my work, I may not spend, I must bring children into the world, I must serve them and him."

"You think that makes me unhappy. I should have thought so in those days. It does not. I am content. No, more than that, much more than that—I am very happy. I am a wife. Where he goes, I will go. What he commands, I will do. His is the will in this household. He may be selfish, at times. Good; my happiness is to be unselfish, to make sacrifices. I have a temper, as you know. It is my happiness to know that he will not permit it to appear. I am naturally indolent; it is my happiness to know that my children must be cared for, that I must work.

"You will say this is all paradox, all contradiction. You don't know women. You tried to rule me only once. Rebellion was easy. He rules always. Submission is easier. Still contradictions. But when my first born came I went where no man goes: I went down into the valley of the shadow; I went to the gate of death and stood there, how long God only knows, and there I saw far beyond those farthest stars. Men go near to death and return, but they go unwillingly. I went for love of the child that lay at my breast when I returned. I came back a different woman. I came back without fear, and brought the vision with me. When I am weary, I know—I have seen—the place where weariness ends. When I am rebellious, I know the place where all things are at peace. When I make sacrifices, they are nothing, for I have seen those who made them in this world, and their infinite reward.

"The man in there asleep—his love led me to that brink, his arm was under my head when I shook hands with death, his arm drew me back, his face was in mine when they handed me the child. He is rude, he talks brokenly, he has no elegance nor frivolous pleasures to offer me. But he is a man all through; he is my man. He would not leave this place."

Far off the bark of a coyote called lonesomely across the wheat. The night wind rustled the undulating miles, making silvery waves and breakers of the stalks. For a long time neither Ruth nor her father spoke. At length she arose and led him to his room. He stooped and kissed her as he had not saluted any one since the night her mother had gone and had not come back. He held her in his arms a moment, and kissed her again. Unconsciously he spoke as if he were again in New York.

"Please ask George to have my carriage ready at eight."

Political Table Talk—Concluded.

Taft, and will say so, when he gets back. So depose numerous witnesses, who profess with much positiveness that they "know." Against them is the asseveration of other witnesses equally numerous, equally positive and equally credible, who allege that Roosevelt had already lost faith in Taft before he left the White House; that he said so with tears in his eyes, and that he promised, when he left, to come back and get into the thick of the fight. These witnesses predict that the former president will return and put himself at the head of the insurgents, in a spectacular fight against the conservatism of the administration. It is a case of contradictory reports, all based on credible evidence. Possibly both have a basis of truth, with the choice between them depending on a big "if" which both forget to mention.

UP AND DOWN THE STATE.

The Oxnard Courier reports that considerable damage was done to orange and lemon trees in that vicinity by recent heavy winds.

A company has been organized for the purpose of growing oranges on a 260-acre tract of land near Orosi, Tulare county.

A large number of the interior newspapers of California issued attractive holiday editions.

It is reported that an electric line soon will be constructed from Stockton to the mining regions of Calaveras county. It will pass through a very fertile part of San Joaquin county.

H. H. Muller and Robert Walker have purchased the Vallejo Times, and hereafter it will be managed by them.

The electric railroad from Lodi to Sacramento has been completed as far as the Mokelumne river.

TAFT ON THE GRIDIRON.

The latest jinks of the famous Gridiron Club, composed of Washington newspaper correspondents, is thus reported by the New York Sun:

President Taft was the Gridiron Club's guest of honor at the club's December dinner, held tonight in the banquet hall of the New Willard Hotel. Mr. Taft sat at the right of President Henry Hall of the club, and on Mr. Hall's left was Vice-President Sherman. At the several tables, arranged so as to give semblance to the shape of a gridiron, were members of the Diplomatic Corps, Cabinet officers, Senators and Representatives in Congress, Governors of States, public officials, officers of the army, the navy and the Marine Corps, editors and writers, financiers and many men of national prominence.

Members of the club posing as politicians gathered in front of the place where the President sat and sang the song which gave President Hall the opportunity of introducing Mr. Taft in an appropriate manner. There was a solo and a chorus to the tune of "I Love My Wife, But Oh You Kid." This is the way the chorus went:

We love, we love, we love Roosevelt,
But oh, you Taft,
He's gone away to Af-ri-ca,
But oh, you Taft.

He said he would come back again
And thereupon we laughed,
We love, we love, we love Roosevelt,
But oh, you Taft.

One of the skits had to do with President Taft's expressed desire for beef and cabbage after he had been fed to surfeit with fancy dishes on his recent 13,000 mile journey. An Alaskan restaurant keeper, sent to Washington by Governor Clark of that Territory for the purpose, appeared with his chef to get pointers for entertaining the President on his expected visit to Alaska next year. When the President's desire for plain foods was made known to the Alaskans they promised with enthusiasm to execute orders at once, just to show what they could do. The chef went to the kitchen and took the orders from his boss, who was an adept in the slang nomenclature of cheap eating houses.

Captain Archibald W. Butt, Mr. Taft's military aide and the guardian of the President's digestion, made known through a club member that "a distinguished guest who didn't want his name mentioned" would like a plate of hash with red peppers and tabasco sauce. "Roosevelt's policies for one!" shouted the restaurant keeper to his chef.

Postmaster General Hitchcock asked for something he enjoyed very much in the last political campaign, when he was chairman of the Republican national committee. It was breast of chicken with wings attached and boiled dumplings. "Angel with the dough!" guests heard the loud voiced chef verifying it back in the kitchen with "Charles P. Taft for one!"

Speaker Cannon wanted to get his teeth on something that would remind him of Representative Murdock of Kansas, the red-haired insurgent leader of the House. "One red-headed duck and let the blood drip!" was the order to the chef. Then there was Attorney-General Wickersham, who sent word that he had a taste for lobster with the claws removed. His order went to the kitchen as "One busted trust!" "Oh, sugar!" was the chef's comment.

At one point in these proceedings a French waiter threw the hash order on the floor because he objected to having it called "Roosevelt's policies."

"Git his name and we'll have him fired!" demanded the restaurant man.

"He says his name is Pinchot," answered the chef.

"Oh, that makes a difference; they'll never fire Pinchot," the restaurant man declared.

"Here's a picture that my aunt painted," said Mrs. Keppouse, showing a visitor through the flat. "It's a pretty frame, though."—Newark Evening News.

PERSONALIA

In his petition for an injunction against houses that are infringing upon the five-foot shelf idea, Dr. Eliot divulges the fact that before taking up the scheme he secured the unanimous approval of the president and fellows of Harvard University, even for the use of the name of "The Harvard Classics."

The Rhodes scholarship from Pennsylvania for 1910 has been awarded to A. P. Kelso, Jr., of Pittsburg. The successful candidate is a graduate of Washington and Jefferson university, and is now a senior in the Western theological seminary. He is a son of Rev. A. P. Kelso of Dehradun, India, and is twenty-three years old.

The Rev. Dr. S. Manheimer, professor in Hebrew in Union College, dropped dead December 18th, in Cincinnati, while in conversation with Dr. G. Deutsch, his colleague in the Hebrew college faculty. Heart disease was the cause of death. He was one of the best known figures in Jewish educational circles throughout the country.

George W. Breck, who for the past five years has been director of the American School of Art in Rome, has just returned, and has taken a New York studio. One of the important things executed by him while in Rome was the group of mosaics for the facade of the Episcopal Church there, completing the work started by Burne-Jones. The mosaics are said to have a high character of design well within the normal limits of the material.

Lord Morley, who is now past seventy years of age, is described by one who saw him recently as much enfeebled physically. His speech on the budget a fortnight ago was delivered with a weak voice, although it was fully up to the Morley standard in intellectual power. The burden of governing India the past four years has been exceedingly wearing upon him, and it is probable that he would not continue at the Indian office under another administration, should the liberals win the elections.

Joseph Lomax, long a resident of Laporte, Ind., now making his home with his daughter in Indianapolis, celebrated his 100th birthday on December 19th. His faculties are unimpaired. His health is excellent. Mr. Lomax for many years was a partner with Wilbur F. Storey in the publication of the Chicago Times. He is credited with being the oldest Scottish Rite Mason and Knight Templar in the United States. He was born in North Carolina, December 19, 1809, going to Indiana in 1816.

President Nicholas Murray Butler of Columbia, in his annual report to the trustees, offers the following comment on the elective system, which, first applied by President Eliot of Harvard, has influenced in some degree the curricula of all American universities: "The free elective system has broken down wherever it has been tried. It is now everywhere to be superseded by a definite and controlled plan of study which will not attempt to fit one curriculum to every student, but which, rather, will make as many curricula as there are students, that each may satisfy his own intellectual needs and receive the training which it is best for him to have, while having his own individuality studied and respected." This follows hard upon the announcement that the new head of Harvard will discontinue the elective system in the very house of its origin.

The Rest Is Understood.

The Wayside Philosopher—Suppose you hear two men talking, one says, "He did," and the other says, "He didn't," who are they talking about?

His friend—Peary, of course.

"But suppose one says, 'He will,' and the other says, 'He won't,' who are they talking about then?"

"Aw, come off! What's the use of dragging President Taft into our conversation?"

SHEAR WIT

"Sir, your son has just joined a college fraternity. These college fraternities—" "Never mind about breaking it gently. What hospital is he at?"—Washington Herald.

"Josiah, what is the house of lords?" "It's one branch of the British parliament. You've heard of the House of Commons, haven't you?" "Ye-es." "Well, the Lords are the uncommons."—Chicago Tribune.

"Prisoner at the bar," said the portly, pompous and florid magistrate, according to the London Daily News, "you are charged with stealing a pig, a very serious offense in this district. There has been a great deal of pig stealing, and I shall make an example of you, or none of us will be safe."

"So you run your own motor car!" "Certainly," answered Mr. Chuggins. "Wouldn't think of trusting its delicate mechanism to a chauffeur." "And you know just what to do in case anything goes wrong?" "Yes. Push her up to the side of the road and telephone to the repair shop."—Washington Star.

The editor wrote: "About 60 per cent. of the total revenue of civilized nations goes for military expenditures." The intelligent compositor, who was a married man, and who had something on his mind, set it up: "About 60 per cent. of the total revenue of civilized nations goes for millinery expenditures."—Yonkers Statesman.

A Berlin financier, who had celebrated his eightieth birthday about a quarter of a year previously, felt very sick. His business friends visited him and tried to cheer him up. "You, with your strong constitution, will come out of this sickness all right," said one. "God will leave you with us until ninety at least." The sick financier smiled and said: "Why should he wait to take me at ninety when he can have me at eighty and one-quarter?"—American Hebrew.

An elderly lady from the East, with a passion for botanical studies, goes into the cowboy's country, builds a small house, and begins her work of collecting specimens. Absorbed one day at her work far out on the prairie, she sees a cowboy riding toward her as for life. When within call, he cries out, "Your house is on fire!" What the botanic lady expected in way of news is unreported, but she said to the cowboy, "Oh, is that all?" Whereupon the amazed ranchman exclaimed, "Well, God bless my soul, Madam, that's all I think of at the present moment, but I'll look around the country and see if I can find something to interest you," and rides away.—"As Others See us."

Leslie M. Shaw, ex-secretary of the treasury, was discussing with a correspondent a financial muddle, says the New York Tribune. "They lied," said the famous financier, "but as with Hugh Ralston, of Castana, their lying was absurd. When I was in the banking business in Charter Oak there was a young coal heaver of Castana who courted a Charter Oak girl. His name was Hugh Ralston, and he pretended to be a banker. But one afternoon the girl happened to visit Castana, and she saw Hugh hurrying home for supper, as black as the ace of spades. He would have dodged past without speaking, but the girl held him up. 'Why, Hugh,' she said reproachfully, 'I thought you were a banker!' 'Ah,' he said, 'we've had a terrible day of it to-day, cleaning all the ink wells.'"

A teacher in a Birmingham school was endeavoring to explain the term "booking," as applied to our railway system, says London Tit-Bits. "Now," he was saying, "can any of you tell me the name of the office at which railway tickets are sold?" "The booking office," replied one of the lads. "Right," responded the teacher. At the moment his eyes fell on a small boy at the end of the class who was evidently paying very little attention to what was said. "Did you hear that, Spry?" he demanded. "Wot, sir?" asked that youth, innocently. "As I thought, you were not listening. We will suppose your father decided to have a day's holiday and visit the seaside. What would he have to do before he could take his seat in the train?" Without a moment's thought the youngster electrified his teacher by replying: "Pawn his tools!"

THE REVEREND FATHER O'KEEFE.

BY J. H.

(For The California Weekly.)

At the place where that exquisite view is,
As up from the ocean we came,
We stopped at the Mission San Luis
By the river that bears the same name;
'Tis there that a man that I knew is—
And this is my purpose, in brief:
To tell how we talked,
As we quietly walked,
With the Reverend Father O'Keefe.

Near the door was a brother confessing
A man with a very dark look;
He must have been years in transgressing,
The long time absolving him took.
They were dipping and kneeling and blessing,
And some showed the traces of grief:
And the man of mild mien
Who's the soul of this scene
Is the Reverend Father O'Keefe.

Where the soft-filtered sunlight was playing,
Some standing, some kneeling, some prone,
Near the altar the brothers were praying,—
Diego, Juan, Pedro, Anton,—
In attitudes painful, dismaying—
The cross and its stations in chief;
"With practice they're not Such a difficult lot,"
Said the Reverend Father O'Keefe.

In grim, incontestable token,
The graves of two centuries lay,
The most of them ancient and broken,
Some wet with the tears of to-day,
Where women walked softly, low-spoken,—
The reaper had garnered his sheaf.
"The dead who rest there
Have no need of our care,"
Said the Reverend Father O'Keefe.

He showed us the tiles he was baking,
He showed us the wells he had bored,
The arches and walls he was making,
The cloisters already restored,
The echoes of decades reawaking,
"For Time, that old arrogant thief,
Had stolen as much
As he ever dared touch,"
Said the Reverend Father O'Keefe.

I showed him a five dollar billet:
He knew it; he took it; he said:
"I thank you and bless you, God will it,"
With a bend of his body and head—
"The earth is the Lord's, we but till it;
This bill, like the fruit and the leaf,
The rains and the dews,
It is ours but to use,"
Said the Reverend Father O'Keefe.

The bell told the time for our going,
The altar grew distant and dim,
With a look that was kindly and knowing,
He hitched up his robe around him.
His hooded brown habit full-flowing,
And tucked the bill into a reef:
"The money is thine,
But the use, it is mine,"
Said the Reverend Father O'Keefe.

'Tis a truth and I cannot refuse it,
I learned from that five-dollar bill,
In giving it I did not lose it,
But banked it down there on that hill;
It is mine, but the man who doth use it,
In spreading belief and relief
Mid the men of his day
On the San Luis Rey,
Is the Reverend Father O'Keefe.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Duties and Powers of the Governor.

No officer, not even the President of the United States, it is believed, has a greater variety of duties to perform, nor does any one have a greater diversity of interests called to his attention in the course of a year. In addition to making appointments by the hundred, or, including notaries public, by the thousand, signing and vetoing bills, approving land patents, granting or refusing pardons and commutations, extraditing fugitives from justice, issuing proclamations and responding to innumerable calls for his appearance on all kinds of public occasions, the governor is required to give a large amount of time to the work of boards and commissions of which the statutes make him a member. In the State Board of Examiners, State Board of Education, Capitol Commission, and Lunacy Commission he is chairman and his presence at many of their meetings is indispensable. Indeed, in the first named, which consists of only three regular members, he is often required to perform a large amount of routine labor in the auditing of claims, which, of course, is an unreasonable arrangement. In the Lunacy Commission and the Board of Education, or in its important offshoot, the text-book committee, he is brought in touch with a good many really serious questions of policy.

This is still more the case with the Advisory Board of the State Engineering Department, a newly-created branch of the government, which possesses the power of direction in the erection of state buildings, construction of roads, river improvement work and, in fact, nearly all public improvements prosecuted by the state. In this one department alone contracts amounting to millions are let, and engineering and architectural problems arise for solution. The governor may not have much first-hand knowledge of these things, but his position gives him the controlling voice in deciding them. Then, in addition to these boards, there are scores of others, great and small, of which he is either legally or in practical effect a member; to attend all their meetings would take more time than the governor has at his disposal, but there is no one of these boards, however unimportant, whose affairs may not, at any time, come up to the governor through formal or informal appeal.

"He is to supervise the official conduct of all executive and ministerial officers" is one of the declarations of the Political Code in relation to the governor. It would be difficult to explain the exact nature or limits of the authority thus conveyed. Ordinarily the other elected state officers, whose duties are defined strictly by statute, pursue their way without interference by the governor, who seldom knows the details of affairs in their offices; a gubernatorial investigation of one of the other offices is rare—almost unknown—but the right to call for and make it no doubt exists.

It is different with the vastly ramified affairs of the state institutions—prisons, reform schools, normal schools, university, asylums for insane, home for feeble-minded and a good many others, all of which are governed by boards whom the governor appoints. These boards and commissions are mindful of their creator, and most of them honor him as men ought to, but often do not, honor their God. It is their confirmed habit to "pass up to the governor" new or difficult problems and more especially their internal dissensions and troubles. Over many a conflict of which no word comes to the ears of the public, the governor exercises the authority of arbitrator.

The portion of his time which a governor can spend in actually doing things is limited as compared with that which he must spend in talking or writing about them, but this does not show misdirected effort, because it is through his innumerable conferences that the governor affects the acts of a multitude of other people who are doing things. There are few members of the legislature who do not go to see the governor either before they introduce a bill of importance or as soon as it has been started on its way; the governor's control over legislation commences not merely as soon as the legislature meets but long before, because he has scarcely been elected when there are senators and assemblymen seeking to know his "program" and either to follow it or to modify it. Every day of the session the governor holds a continuous levee for anxious members who never forget that the fate of their measure is in his hand. Concurrently with all of this activity, citizens from the most distant parts of the state are coming to the capital daily, sometimes singly and sometimes in delegations, to advocate or oppose bills, and all of them seek to interview the governor. And, then, the governor's mail in legislative times! But it will require a whole chapter to tell what comes in the governor's mail

Medal for Late Architect.

The gold medal of the American Architects, awarded to the late Charles Follen McKim, was presented to his long-time partner, William R. Mead, at the memorial exercises in the Corcoran art gallery in Washington. Honor was paid to him for his large services to architecture, and especially for his work in making the nation's capital beautiful by his labors in planning the esthetic recession of the city and the renewal of the White House.

Hail and Farewell!

TO-MORROW, THE NEW MAYOR of San Francisco takes the oath of office, and the old retires. It is the last day of the lull of peace which intervenes between election and the inauguration of a new regime. In those amber days the rancor of partisanship against the outgoing administration softens, and the regrets of disappointed friends are forgotten. At such a moment it is well to say that the departing mayor has done his best and done it with sincere devotion and much courage. It is also pleasant and just to say that the retiring supervisors have wrought with equal courage and devotion, and that they leave as their monument a large body of constructive legislation of enduring benefit to San Francisco. The city government of to-morrow comes from other stock, with undetermined talents. Change always wounds, and a fresh crop of critics will begin to bud to-morrow night. Mr. McCarthy and his friends and Mr. Fickert and his friends have a large opportunity for service. They will have an equal measure of responsibility. To-morrow they have their day. So, hail, McCarthy! And farewell, good doctor!

Water.

THE HETCH-HETCHY BOND ELECTION will be held next Friday. The supreme importance of the issue to be settled then urges every one who is convinced of the necessity for acquiring that source of supply to use every effort to convince his friends that they should be of like mind. The California Weekly is so convinced. We print this week an article by Mr. Haven, the assistant city attorney of San Francisco, which refutes the charge that the bonds, as they will be issued if voted, exceed the legal limit. It also explains why the purchase price of Spring Valley is necessarily higher than the valuation used by the city in determining water rates. We have held over for next week Dr. Charles R. Brown's third article on modern labor unions to make space for this urgently timely article. San Francisco will not soon again have such an opportunity to acquire a perpetual source of pure water. Her citizens must not let this chance go by. Vote the bonds!

A Suggestion to Freeholders.

FOUR CALIFORNIA CITIES now use the no-party ballot in municipal elections. Three of these cities chose reform administrations at their latest elections. Mr. Heney recently declared his conviction, as the ripe judgment of his long political experience, to be that this ballot is the most effective weapon with which the hands of the soldiers for good government may be fitted. The sentiment of a large recent gathering of progressive citizens, informally expressed, was that the adoption of this ballot by these four cities is the most significant concrete achievement of the reform movement in California. Many other cities are now planning to amend their present charters or to adopt new ones. Here is a suggestion for their boards of freeholders.

A Sigh of Relief.

THE FIRST OF THE PRESIDENT'S special messages goes to congress too late for comment in these columns. It, and its promised successors, will be the first definite measure of Taft. They will disclose the qualities of his statesmanship, and before the next week is past we shall all know whether the smile has hidden an encouragement to the progressive forces in congress and in the executive arm of the government, or whether its light shines only for the pure reactionaries and the "good dogs" of the Aldrich-Payne-Cannon-Ballinger organization. Either way, it will be a relief to know. The recent months have been full of uneasy doubts and growing perturbations. That only one week lies between us all and the opportunity to weigh the President by his own scales is cause for gratitude.

Snow Men.

THE OLDEST INHABITANT had his innings in many parts of California the other day. He emerged from an obscurity that must be peculiarly galling, because California is still too youthful to take much stock in the Oldest Inhabitant. After emerging he announced in oracular tones that "this is the first snow in this town in twenty-eight years." Which is probably true and is certainly a remarkable record in an easterner's eyes. But the young inhabitants were more to be congratulated. It was the first snowstorm of a lifetime for them, probably the last for many. They made the most of it, as in Fresno, for instance, with dozens of snow men. Which is, perhaps, the most striking fact of all, that there they should have snow men at one end of the season and sun-cured raisins at the other. Versatile California!

The Graft Recessional.

A TRUST COMPANY MORALLY IN PARTNERSHIP with a house of ill-fame, and a notorious gambler re-elected to the directorate of an exclusive club, are regarded as symptoms of a diseased spot in the business and social body of a city by the committee appointed to investigate graft and graft prosecutions in San Francisco. Two other symptoms, by them described, are the president of a bar association re-elected to head that association after the disclosure of doubtful professional relations with a traction franchise which was investigated by the grand jury, and the published confession of the San Francisco Chronicle that it sold its news columns to disseminate the false and injurious impression that a court decision was adverse to the widow who was one party to the suit. We hardly conceive that there will be any fault found with that committee's conclusions. We would add, however, that, though the moral delinquency is about the same in all these instances, the greatest evil of the four, in its effect upon the public, is the venal distortion of the daily news.

Subsidized Burbank.

SHOULD BURBANK BE SUBSIDIZED? The Carnegie institution has been subsidizing him, and now comes rumor that the subsidy is to be withdrawn, on the ground that Burbank has been "commercialized" by his exploiters. The charge may be true, but the remedy is not to withdraw the subsidy. If any man is worth putting beyond the concerns of personal care, it is Luther Burbank. But he needs a guardian to protect him from his fool friends. Burbank, be it remembered, is neither a scientist nor a business man. He is a horticulturist, with a unique and valuable genius. But he is "good stuff" for promoters to exploit in other capacities. So the book men got at him first, and had him get up a set of volumes, good enough in themselves, but spoiled by the methods by which they were exploited. Then the Law Brothers undertook to incorporate him as a business institution. The thing to do with Burbank is to let him alone and make others let him alone. He can only work in his own way. Let him work that way, and supply him with means to do it. And surround him with a fence, booster-tight and promoter-high.

THE COMPLETE REPORT OF THE GRAFT COMMITTEE IN THIS ISSUE.

NOW FOR THE WATER BONDS.

As the flight of the sparrow is to that of the eagle, so is the importance to San Francisco of the Geary street railroad bonds compared with that of the water bonds on which the city will vote January 14th. Though we are disposed to believe the Geary street election went the right way, it might have gone the other way without seriously jeopardizing the future of San Francisco; but the same cannot be said of the water issue, which is vital.

Now, if ever, the citizens of this metropolis are called on to act upon the larger views of public policy. There is a wisdom of the little and a wisdom of the great. The former is the better for everyday affairs, which are made up of petty details, and its axioms are keep out of debt and pay as you go; don't rush into experiments; don't pay too much for your whistle. The greater wisdom is called for when purchasing something more valuable than whistles, or when determining the policy which shall guide a city for a century. A rule which is good for the question of an hour may be inapplicable to a century's problem, and there is a certain point at which daring becomes the only real prudence. The California Weekly is profoundly impressed with the belief that the hour of San Francisco's fate is going to strike January 14th, when the Hetch-Hetchy and Spring Valley bond issues will both be voted on.

A discussion of the Hetch-Hetchy question in all of its phases has been had in the columns of this paper, and as we have heretofore declared, we are convinced that not to seize the advantage of a Sierra water supply while it is available would be an irremediable blunder. No one can say that if this opportunity should be neglected, another would offer, considering how rapid is the march of development in the utilization of the limited water supplies of California. It requires some courage to vote a debt of $45,000,000 upon a city, but to follow the promptings of timidity would in this case be to take the greater risk.

We are no less clear that the buying out of Spring Valley, and thus closing a long chapter of profitless strife and scandal, is a necessity. The advantage of getting rid of the greatest corrupting influence in the city's politics and of insuring the inauguration of a municipally-owned water system under the most favorable conditions would be enormous. It is said that the price to be paid, $35,000,000, is excessive by several millions, inasmuch as not long since the combined stock and bond values of the corporation were not over $27,000,000. This claim is probably true, and at any rate we will assume that it is, in order to make more distinct our point that the bold course is now the only prudent one.

It might be different if there were any probability that the Spring Valley could be bought out for $27,000,000, but we do not believe there is the slightest. Already its stock has increased in value, and everyone knows that it is never possible to buy out numerous holders of securities without inflating prices in so doing. Once upon a time San Francisco could have bought out Spring Valley for a half of $35,000,000, but would not do it because the price was too high; another period of waiting would be followed by similar consequences.

A municipality in a business deal of this kind must be governed by about the same policy as is manifested by a large private corporation. A railroad company in buying ties or steel rails will not pay a dollar more than the commodity is worth in the market, but every railroad seeking an important terminal or an advantageous depot site is compelled to pay more than the land is worth, and it does so with its eyes open, because it knows that though the land owner receives more than the property is worth to him, it is acquired for less than it is worth for railroad purposes. great railroad which should wait to purchase for merely what the ground is worth would never get anywhere.

This city has suffered in the past from the penny-wise and pound-foolish policy, but it is time to stop and act upon larger views. By voting for both Hetch-Hetchy and Spring Valley bonds the projects can be consolidated and the aggregate cost reduced to $58,000,000, which is not an excessive water debt for a city of the population and prospects of San Francisco. Los Angeles, when it voted $23,000,000 for the Owens river water supply, took a bolder step than San Francisco is called on to take now, and we hope the northern city does not lack the faith in its destiny which the southern city manifested.

THE REPORT ON GRAFT.

To-day The California Weekly prints in full the report of the mayor's committee on graft and graft prosecutions in San Francisco. This committee was appointed by Mayor Taylor, October 12, 1908, to find and make public the truth which had become obscured by partisan and venal distortion in the newspapers, or lost in the mazes of court records. This clarification of fact was plainly a necessity. The citizens of San Francisco have a right to know the truth about their public officials and about their quasi-public corruptionists. The appointment of an official committee to discover and publish the truth is, however, probably without precedent. But the character of the members of the committee, all men of first rank and more than ordinary professional and business success, and the character of the report they have presented, amply justify the mayor's act.

This report is an extraordinary document. It is an attempt, and a successful attempt, to write a chapter of contemporaneous history while the passions of conflict are still flaming and while all the men concerned, but one, still live as neighbors of the authors. That such an attempt should be made is extraordinary enough. That it succeeds in preserving the calm judicial viewpoint, the dispassionate aloofness of statement, of a critical history is more remarkable.

The report succeeds even beyond this. All the essential facts are given, and nothing that is not established fact is given. But these facts are so chosen and so related in the text as to draw a living portrait of one phase of the social and moral life of the community, a portrait so vivid that the reader sees the events and characters and customs as in a novel. This is one of the most difficult feats of the historian, and it is a notable achievement that a committee of business and professional men should have done it so well, or that they should have done it at all.

The report reviews the history of graft and graft disclosures as far back as the Wallace grand jury of 1891. It divides the municipal graft into three classes: grafting on vice, grafting in franchises, and grafting in rates for public utilities; and describes the conditions of business and morals that preceded and caused each kind of graft. The moral condition of San Francisco, its debonair acquiescence in the existence of gambling and the social evil, is faithfully portrayed, and the sequence of moral laxness and grafting in vice is clearly indicated. The history of the class war between labor and capital in San Francisco, its debauching effect upon public servants, and the history of the street railways are all sketched in, and the sequence of hatred and greed and public corruption is established. The history of the public utilities corporations, and the loose methods of rate-making, are recounted, and the sequence of confusion in methods and corruption in the public service is indicated.

Getting down to the disclosures of the Oliver grand jury and the subsequent indictments, arrests, immunities, perjuries, libels, violence, trials, and politics of the last two years, the report preserves its judicial temper and its strict adherence to indisputable facts. This review is a masterly piece of work. It is also a complete vindication of the motives and acts of the prosecuting officers, Mr. Langdon and Mr. Heney, and of the motives and acts of Mr. Spreckels in supplying the financial support of the prosecution.

In conclusion, the committee offers several constructive recommendations pointing the way toward permanent reform of the moral condition of the city and of the conditions of the public service. These suggestions are offered by the committee with due diffidence, and with the realization that public opinion must be the final arbiter of progress.

We commend this report to our every reader, and suggest that it be studied in full, that it be read with a chastened spirit. Its own temper is of sorrow rather than of anger. We predict that it will sober passions as well as clear the mind. For the future, it will be a reminder and a guide. Perhaps the most useful service of our well-intentioned mayor, who will leave office to-morrow, will prove to be this same document which he caused to be prepared.

DEMOCRATIC PROSPECTS.

Norman Mack's National Magazine has two very significant parallel articles on Democratic Prospects by W. J. Bryan, titular leader of the Democratic party, and Woodrow Wilson, its ablest member. Certainly, if there is any Democratic party, these men know what it is, and if there is any Democratic opportunity, these men know where it is.

Bryan's article, as might be expected, is clear, definite, positive, brilliant, but superficial, impractical, and wholly oblivious of the existence of a twentieth-century world. Wilson's is superficially more vague and academic, and shows a certain aloofness from the processes of popular political thought, but it shows constructive ability of a large order, and a clear-headed comprehension of the fact that eighteenth-century maxims are inadequate to twentieth-century problems.

Bryan frankly recognizes that the prospects of a Democratic congress are very slim, and that their slimness has been made by Democratic blunders. "Aldrichism" and "Cannonism" presented the opportunity, but the Progressive Republicans took it up, while the Democrats threw it away. The Progressive Republicans may fight for a tariff reform that is still protectionist. The Democrats must fight against every protection whatever, and they are committing suicide by not doing it. Democrats opposed reductions proposed by the progressive Republicans. This "puts our party on the defensive when it urges tariff reduction." Also, Democrats repudiated their platform and denied its binding force. "A platform that is not binding is a fraud."

Democrats defended their demands for higher tariffs by claiming they were "revenue tariffs." But "a revenue tariff is a tariff collected for the purpose of raising revenue, and without regard to the question of protection. There may be incidental protection under a revenue tariff, but a tariff is not incidental when it is planned for and demanded on the ground of 'justice to the producer of raw material.'" "The moment a Democrat begins to talk about protection to local interests in his district or state, he ceases to be of any aid as a tariff reformer." "It might as well be understood, the sooner the better, that Democratic protection is not a bit superior to Republican protection, and that protection, whether Democratic or Republican, inevitably invites bargaining, trading and corruption. The Democratic party has thrown away one-half its chance of victory by its failure to stand unitedly against every proposed increase and in favor of every proposed decrease." The other half of its opportunity it may seize, by adopting a square free-trade platform, announcing it as a contract, binding a Democratic congressman to vote against protection even for the industries of his own district, and announcing, specifically, the following policy: Free wool, lumber, wood-pulp, paper, hides, leather, harness and shoes, oil, iron ore, coal, binding twine, cotton ties and bagging, and all trust-made articles, and material reductions in woollens, steel manufactures, cotton goods, and all necessities of life. No tariff rate, except on liquor and tobacco, above 50 per cent. ad valorem, and all rates above 25 per cent. to be reduced one-twentieth each year, until a 25 per cent. rate is reached, "the purpose being to reduce the tariff gradually to a revenue basis, and thereafter to collect tariff for revenue only." If a Democratic congress is secured, and adheres to this platform, there is a chance in the next presidential election. But if there is a bare Democratic majority in congress, and it is divided on the tariff, as the Democrats were last time, and as the Republicans are, "our prospects of success in 1912 will be greatly reduced." Which is a euphemism for saying they will be nil.

These are the Bryan conditions for reviving the Democratic party. Every person with the slightest knowledge of the practical situation knows they are grotesquely impossible. Therefore, according to Bryan, the Democratic party is on its death-bed. It has taken poison and rejects the only antidote. Its only other hope, opposition to Aldrichism, and a constructive policy of protectionist tariff reform, the progressive Republicans have pre-empted.

President Wilson is less pessimistic and more intelligent, but he, too, would revive the Democratic party by first destroying its only historic excuse for existence. He sees the Democratic opportunity in the charge of Republican alliance with special interests, representing less than the whole people. He does not mention, as Bryan does, that this is precisely the opportunity which the progressive Republicans have seized first. As a historian, Professor Wilson would cut loose from Jeffersonian and Jacksonian Democratic history. "Most of the old formulas of our politics are worn threadbare, and have lost their significance, having been formulated for another age which had other and very different problems to settle, and which settled them with a sincerity which we can imitate only by translating our principles into new forms and statements." Thus, instead of "the least government possible," we must recognize the modern extensions of the scope of government; and, as to states' rights, it is no longer possible "to discriminate the interests of the several states as they could once be discriminated. Interests once local and separate have become unified and national. They must be treated on a national scale, in a national spirit, and by the national government." We should "be shy, not of governmental power, but of its organization in the wrong way and its use to the wrong ends."

So, coming to concrete issues, Professor Wilson would repudiate the special-interest protection of Aldrich, and return to the protectionism of Hamilton (shades of Jefferson!). He would withdraw protection from the adult industries, that do not need it, extend it, only as needed, to those which require it, unless they are purely artificial industries, better left to flourish elsewhere where they are natural, and he would wisely apportion the incidental protection of a revenue tariff, to develop our national resources. The change, in any case, he would make gradual and harmless.

On the trusts, he would give up the effort to control them by the "regulation" enforced by fines. "Regulation" means control without responsibility, and must inevitably lead to control with responsibility, which is government ownership, and is to be avoided. So in the interest of individualism (a Democratic doctrine, for once) Professor Wilson would let the owners of the corporations run them, but he would compel publicity and personal responsibility; he would make it possible to ascertain what person was responsible for each act of a corporation, and if the act was against the law, he would lock up that person.

Here are the Democratic programs of the only two men who represent modern Democracy. One is the only vital Democratic candidate for president, during the whole of the modern era. The other is the only constructive thinker of national reputation among the Democratic leaders. If there is a Democratic party of the present or the future, it depends on these two men to make it.

And, of these two men, the one counsels suicide and the other absorption. The one would cling to the corpse of a dead Democratic doctrine, and go to the grave with it. The other would cut loose from everything which has made the Democratic party Democratic, and make it, so far as his suggestions are acceptable at all, indistinguishable from progressive Republicanism. He would make Hamilton its patron saint and Crammings its modern exponent. In the face of the only great opportunity which the party of negation has known in this era, when there is actual negative, destructive work to do; when the incumbent organization of the Republican party is assailed and is destined to be destroyed by the most vital and progressive element in the Republican party itself, the Democratic party's only possible leaders confess that it is impotent to embrace the opportunity. Either the work of the Democratic party is finished, or it will require some prophet wiser than Woodrow Wilson and some leader more capable than William J. Bryan to find it a work.

Another School for Citizenship.

The California Weekly dislikes to admit that there can be a better School for Citizenship than the one it has been running week by week since the first issue of this paper, and yet it is constrained to take off its hat to the Rev. Dana W. Bartlett of Los Angeles. He is the man who, as a portion of the work of the League of Justice of that city, has been conducting a school of instruction in civics for Russian immigrants in the slums of Vignes street. Heretofore these immigrants received their political training from the saloon-keeper and the dive-keeper, with results which repeat those attained under the same conditions in all other large cities. Every untrained immigrant on his way to be a citizen of the United States is bound to go to school to somebody, and upon who that somebody is—whether a slum politician or a better kind of school master—will principally depend whether that immigrant turns out to be a grafter or a respectable voter.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

"When I get old and bent and gray," declared David Warfield, "and the audiences of the East, the North, the South and the West no longer care for my characterizations, then I am coming back to dear old San Francisco and coming to stay."

Of course the great actor was letting his heart talk then and not his head. His heart will tell him that when he returns to the home of his boyhood, full of out-lived fame and far-spent years, the home of his boyhood will turn out to greet him in love and kindness, but his head will say not so. Of a truth his head will know that the friends of his boyhood, those who have watched with pride his rise to fortune and to fame, will mainly have gone to their long rest and that the comradeships of youth will be out of the question with even such as are left. The Golden Gate will be where he left it, and the Marin hills with Tamalpais lifting itself up farther on; there will be unrivalled marine views glimpsed from vantage points along Pacific avenue, and the far-spreading east bay cities will be flanked by the Piedmont hills. Goat island will be there and Alcatraz and Angel and the shadow-mottled waters of the bay. These will be ever young and ever old, as the humor changeth, but there will be little enough else of home in the home-coming of any David when he shall have grown old and bent and gray.

And yet what is more natural than the thought that, when white with years and bent with honors, we are all of us to come home to stay. Exactly the thing we cannot do—stay. We come home to die, not to stay, and happy that man whose fading sight may look out upon scenes that were dear to his childhood. It is part of that becoming as little-children without which no one can enter into the kingdom.

How much truer the actor spoke than he thought! As long as theatres are packed to hear him, as long as the wave of prosperity carries him higher and higher and farther and farther, as long as he sees new worlds to conquer, new victories to achieve, the home coming can be pushed aside, put into the far and dim distance, deferred until there is nowhere else to go, till the form is bent, the visage chiseled, the hair made white and thin over the temples—then the steps turn to the Father's house and the world-weary wanderer comes home to stay.

David Warfield spoke as the world speaks. He outlined nature's due course. Why should we be concerned for any home-coming so long as things are coming our way? Why should we become as little children when the altar fires of genius are flaming within us and the rich red blood tingles to our finger tips? It isn't natural.

But when we turn to vital statistics we read a different story. It is not impossible that our gifted actor friend might find more names familiar to him inscribed on headstones at the cemeteries than on door plates of San Francisco homes. Somehow the home-coming does not always, nor very often, wait for the bent form and the whitened hair. More often it comes like a bugle blast in the very hurly-burly of the day's stress and struggle, while the wave of prosperity is at its height and crowds are gathering, eager to see, hear and applaud.

An Old Home Week in every year has come to be almost an American institution. With all deference due the delightful Warfield, isn't that the better idea? Isn't it better to keep in touch with those things that keep fresh within us, such things as make for an undying childhood, that we may not have so far to come when our home-coming is made imperative, else it may not be so easy to become as little children on short notice, with such scanty preparation as a crashing automobile, or a runaway car, may afford? If we have given a deeper significance to the great actor's home-coming jest than he intended at least we have not given a deeper than a prudent taking thought will warrant.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

The Cut of National Forest Timber.

The annual report of the United States Secretary of Agriculture shows that during the year just ended the receipts from timber cut from the national forests amounted to about $700,000, an average of about $2 per thousand. Of the timber thus sold Montana supplied 86,000,000 feet, or 24 per cent; Colorado, 44,000,000 feet, or 13 per cent; California, 39,000,000 feet, or 11 per cent., and Idaho 35,000,000 feet, or 10 per cent. In each instance the cut was but a minor fraction of 1 per cent of the stand—for example, in California it was but one-twenty-fifth of 1 per cent. In addition to the timber sold more than 100,000,000 board feet were given away to settlers, schools and churches within the forests. Over 18,000,000 feet were thus given away in Idaho, while from nearly 17,000,000 down to a little less than 10,000,000 feet were given in Montana, Colorado, Utah, New Mexico and California. Wyoming and Oregon followed with between 6,000,000 and 7,000,000 feet apiece. When it is remembered that the timber thus given away is worth about $2 per thousand feet, it will be realized that Uncle Sam has been quite generous with his nephews and nieces.

More Hungry Children in London.

When children are compelled to go hungry it is a reasonable presumption that starvation is standing at the doors of the families to which they belong. Remembering this, it is not reassuring to learn that the number of such children in London is increasing with a rapidity probably never known before—certainly never known since men have begun to keep the statistics of charity. A week or two ago the London county council found itself compelled to set aside $125,000 to provide meals for school children whose parents cannot feed them. This was in addition to the $186,000 already devoted to that purpose for the year terminating March 31, 1910, and the total of $311,000 takes the place of $150,000 which it was estimated would be sufficient for the purpose. This is one way of showing how the hungering children have increased, and here is another which is even more startling. Five years ago 5,000 children needed state assistance, four years ago the number had increased to 6,000, last year it was 35,000, and this year it is 47,000. That is, the number of unfed little ones has multiplied itself almost ten-fold in five years. Black figures and blacker facts, are they not? Either the Almighty has failed to provide his children with a sufficient food supply or man often diverts it from the channels in which it should move—which is the more reasonable supposition?

Indiana Keeping Books for All Officials.

Soon Indiana will be in position to furnish an illustration of what the state can do in the line of keeping—or, at least, overseeing—books for all county, city, town and township officials in the commonwealth. The new accounting law now in force, and it applies to every office within the gift of the people. Under its terms the books of every official in the state will be investigated by expert examiners who are appointed by the governor. These examiners will work in pairs, and in order to avoid all appearance of partisanship, the pair in every instance will consist of a Republican and a Democrat. Ten dollars a day and expenses while at work will be paid to each one of them, and they will be paid by the city, county, town or township to which the office investigated pertains. It is hoped and believed that the plan will result in the prevention of graft as well as in the discovery and rectification of errors due to ignorance rather than to corruption. Recognizing that the examiners may be under peculiar temptation from men whose ill doing they might expose, Governor Marshall is exercising great care in selecting only men of high character for these positions.

Peculiarities of the Atmosphere.

Since scientists have been sending up sounding balloons, with self-registering thermometers, a great deal heretofore unknown has been learned about the earth's envelope of air. Most notable among these new discoveries, perhaps, is the fact that the atmosphere is divided into three distinct strata which are very differently characterized. The first of these strata, lying next the earth, is that of warmth and whimsical winds, and it is about two miles in thickness. This, of course, is the stratum concerning which man has been fairly well posted ever since the time when he first began to breathe. Immediately above this stratum is another, about six miles in thickness, which is characterized by two features, first, extreme cold, a Fahrenheit thermometer showing a temperature as low as 167 degrees below the freezing point, and, second, the air responds to the whirl of the earth, and a strong eastward wind forever is blowing. Above eight miles a third stratum begins, and its striking peculiarity—one not to have been expected—is the fact that it is warmer than the second stratum. However, it is not excessively warm; fans are not needed there by aeronauts, as the temperature still falls to from 122 to 140 degrees below the freezing point. The winds here again blow from any and all directions. This stratum continues to a point 18 miles above the earth's surface, which is as far as man knows anything about the atmosphere in which he lives, breathes and has his being.

Land About Messina Gradually Sinking.

One sees but little relating to Messina, the unfortunate, in the newspapers in these days, but the city and surrounding country still are in precarious condition. Earthquake shocks have been felt there daily ever since the great catastrophe of more than a year ago. Nor is this the worst of it, although the fact is disquieting enough, for slowly but certainly the land along the coast in that vicinity is sinking into the sea. Already it has sunk about a foot and a half, the steps formerly leading from the water to the promenade are submerged, and the peninsula which served as a natural breakwater for Messina is under water where it has not been built up. The moats of the citadel are flooded, and the railroad embankment between Messina and Catania, which was built two yards from the ocean, now is lapped by sea waves. Among the common people there is fear that Messina and vicinity eventually will be submerged, but this fear apparently is not shared by the authorities, as they are going ahead with the work of reconstruction.

Roman Wall of London Uncovered.

It is not customary to find the wall of a city, supposing it has one, by descending into an artificial cave or hole in the ground, but this is a privilege which now is extended to the people of London and their visitors. The Society of Antiquaries of the great city has succeeded in unearthing and preserving a fragment of the wall of London constructed by the Romans long centuries ago. The fragment lies near Newgate street, and consists of a curved bastion 50 feet long, 20 feet high and 8 feet wide. The materials composing it are stone and brick, and, as they are bound together by that Roman mortar which well nigh withstands the ravages of time, it is in a condition of remarkable preservation. As the wall is several feet below the present surface of the ground, it will be reached by descending stairs and viewed only by artificial light.

Reform of German Criminal Code.

A commission of experts, after four years of investigation, have recommended several features of reform of the German criminal code. Prominent among their recommendations is "imprisonment without dishonor," which would permit an offender to wear his own clothes and provide his own food in prison. Yet another recommendation is fines payable in installments, by virtue of which a person fined may have three months in which to pay in installments, or he may work the fine out by free labor. In case of murder, the number of cases in which less than the death penalty may be imposed is largely increased. The age of criminal responsibility is increased to 14 years. In general the proposed reforms trend in the direction of greater leniency and larger charity.

Oldest Vessel Now in Use.

The oldest ship now in use in the world, is owned in Denmark, and it has seen a wonderfully long service. It is a sloop named Constance, and was built at Aero in 1723, 187 years ago—more than a half-century before the Revolutionary war, and almost three-quarters of a century before the world learned to tremble at the mention of Napoleon's name. The Constance has been twice restored, but her body has not been touched, and still hale and hearty she carries cargoes of flour between the small ports of Denmark. Judging solely by her present appearance, she yet might be good for another century or two of useful work on the waters about Denmark.

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES.

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHELF.

John Muir's Works.

To have retained, together with the scientific spirit of the nineteenth century, the primitive skill and physique and delicate senses of the aboriginal savage, and to have joined with these an authentic gift of literary genius, is the almost unique distinction of John Muir. Probably no other man has had such an experience as he has had—a lifetime of adventurous exploring combined with the soundest scientific investigation of geology and botany; certainly no man has had such an experience who wrote of it more humanely, more appealingly, more eloquently than he. The bulk of his writings is small; indeed, one of the tragedies of literature is the fact that this one of the writers of real genius has drawn so slightly upon the literally unbelievable quantities of literary notes in his possession.

But that small bulk of published matter contains some of the most beautiful descriptions of Nature ever written. At times the narrative is humorous, at times grave; again it rises to trumpet calls of rhetoric, of passion, of poetry, that are almost matchless. Each little gem of diction is the diamond compressed from the carbon of years of experience and observation and devotion, suddenly made translucent, glittering-faceted and shot through with shafts of light by the artist touch of the author. Quite apart from his secure position as a great naturalist, John Muir's writings place him serene upon a high pedestal of enduring fame as a genius in literature.

SHORTEST PLAY EVER ACTED.

The smallest play ever acted is a complete five act tragedy entitled "Rosmunda," written in Italy more than sixty years ago by the poet Giovanni Ventura, and produced with much success in its diminutive form at both Turin and Milan. The playlet is full of action, as can be seen:

ROSMUNDA.

Tragedy in Five Acts by Giovanni Ventura.

Persons of the Play:

King Albion, Rosmunda, daughter of King Kunimond and wife of Albion. Peridens, a slave.

Act I.

Albion, giving Rosmunda the skull of her father filled with wine—Drink! It is the skull of your father.

Rosmunda, horrified—Oh!

Albion, commanding—I wish it!

Rosmunda (drinks)—Woe unto you!

Act II.

Albion, affectionately to Rosmunda—Why so sad?

Rosmunda—Can I be otherwise?

Albion—What is past must be forgotten.

Rosmunda—Do not touch me!

Albion—You hate me?

Rosmunda—How can I?

Act III.

Rosmunda examines closely a stiletto, then calls—Slave!

Peridens comes and kneels before her—Queen!

Rosmunda, passionately—I love you!

Peridens, astonished—Oh, my God!

Rosmunda—Come with me. (Embraces him.)

ACT IV.

(From adjoining room, where King Albion sleeps, snoring is heard).

Rosmunda hands the stiletto to Peridens—Go—kill him!

Peridens, hesitating—The King?

Rosmunda, quickly—The rival.

Peridens, with determination and courage—He shall die.

(Goes determinedly to the sleeping apartment of Albion.)

Act V

Albion, with stifled voice, off stage—Help! Rosmunda, listening—Die! Die! Die!

Peridens rushes into the room with the bloody stiletto in hand—He is dead!

Rosmunda snatches the stiletto and holding it up to heaven, yells—Now, you drink, father—now, you drink!

(Curtain.)

At one time very short plays were popular in Italy and Germany. This one is the shortest and perhaps the best of them. It is really an excellent acting play.

PATAUD AND "CHANTECLER."

The latest guess at the date for the production of "Chantecler" is January 10, says the New York Times. Even that is doubtful, for there continues to be friction between the autocratic Rostand and his principal interpreters.

The author desired Guitry, on whom the heaviest burden of acting will fall, to take a month's rest in order that he might enter the cockpit, so to speak, in the best of form on the crucial night, but Guitry refuses.

Another of Rostand's annoyances has been the fact that he had originally given the watchdog in the play, the part Jean Coquelin is to take, the name of Patauti, and that on the electric light king becoming so prominent, he saw himself obliged, in order to avoid ridicule, to rebaptize the canine personage. He is now called Patou. Rostand has refused to permit the scenes of the piece to be cinematographed.

STAGE AND BOOK FOLK.

Nance O'Neil, the actress, has just made a sensational success in "The Lily," produced under the direction of David Belasco.

Mrs. Atherton's next novel, it is announced, will be cosmopolitan in tone. The characters are drawn from two distinct environments, the diplomatic world and the operatic stage, and it is the upper circles of both that Mrs. Atherton treats of. In what, for lack of a better term, may be called "high life," the various nations meet on nearly common ground.

Winston Churchill's forthcoming novel will mark a distinct change in his manner and material. Hitherto Mr. Churchill has written historical novels in the larger sense. It is true that "Mr. Crewe's Career" is laid in the present, but in manner and spirit and aim it falls in the class of historical novels. The new book, however, is distinctly a love story, in which politics, both present and past, is of slight importance.

Californian Poets' Corner

MORN AT NAZARETH.

By Joaquin Miller.

I think I see Him now at morn.

Before the sudden burst of day,

Above the silver fields of corn.

Where He has gone apart to pray;

I think I see Him looking thoughtful down,

Beyond the corn, beyond the waking town.

Beyond the silvered mists that rise,

From all night toiling in the corn;

The mists have duties up the skies;

The skies have duties up the morn;

Whilst all the world is wondrous fair,

To make the fair world still more wondrous fair.

More lordly fair; the stately morn

Moves down her walks of golden wheat;

Her guards of honor gild the corn

In golden pathway for God's feet;

Her purple hills she crowns in crowns of gold,

And majesty before the Lord is rolled.

AMERICAN HUMOR.

With Mark Twain beset by sorrows and old age and illness, one is reminded of the decline, almost the extinction, of the pioneer American humor, and is made to wonder what distinctive form of humor will take its place.

For the humor of Mark Twain was a type. He merely happened to possess the genius for putting into literary form the kind of humor that thousands of men of his day put into mirth-provoking tales told at the country store or by the village fireside in the West. His is the humor of the man who lived under great stress of circumstances, awed by the rugged strength of Nature on the frontier, a humor that men leaned to for relief from the ever-present sense of struggle and privation. It contains the exaggeration and the philosophic resignation by which men mock at the trials they have endured and make light of their struggle.

The kind of life that produced this humor has passed with the lost frontier. The trials and privations of life now come in other guise, in cities and in rural life far less simple than the old. What is the humor that this generation will evolve out of its complex, machine-ridden, convenience-glutted, metropolitan existence? The humorist of this new age has not yet risen. George Ade is funny, but he has caught the spirit of the times only in spots, brilliantly though he has illumined these. Mr. Dooley's whimsical, shrewd humor is as brilliant, but no more nearly universal, or, more properly, representative. Togo's pidgin English is even less representative.

So we may hope for a greater humorist than any of these, another Mark Twain; and yet not another, for the times have altered as the man. To Mark Twain, thrice blessed and beloved old man, the reverence and affection and gratitude of all who read. To the new humorist, of the new era, a welcome when he comes; but he will have to earn much to earn the regard held by the last of the older giants of mirth.

TWIN'S MSS. IN DEMAND.

Mark Twain's recently announced determination to write no more books is of interest to autograph collectors, especially to those whose hobby is the collecting of distinguished authors' manuscripts, says the New York Times. There is quite a demand for Mark Twain items, and whenever a manuscript of his turns up in the auction room there is lively competition for it, and it almost always fetches a good price. There was hope among the younger collectors and those of limited means that if Mark Twain kept on writing for publication his later manuscripts might come under the auctioneer's hammer, and, if the wealthier or older collectors were satisfied with what they had already obtained, some of the good things might fall to their own lot, but this announcement would seem to put an end to such a hope.

There was further evidence at Anderson's recently of the popularity of Twain among collectors. Manuscripts of his are seldom offered for sale, but there were two in this collection. One of them was the original manuscript, in his handwriting, of "The Invalid's Story," better known as "The Limburger Cheese Story." It is signed in full "Mark Twain." There is also a memorandum in his autograph reading: "Insert these twenty-three pages manuscript (Invalid's Story), making the insertion at page 90 of the small book, entitled 'Punch, Brothers Punch.'" The manuscript is in cloth binding with a specially printed title page on Japan vellum paper, and portrait of the author. Dodd, Mead & Co. had to bid $150 to get it.

The other item was the original manuscript of "The Regular Toast, Woman, God Bless Her," delivered by Mark Twain at the New England Society dinner, December 23, 1882. It is in this address that Twain describes the dress of the African savage woman as "just her complexion." This was also knocked down to Dodd, Mead & Co. for $100.

PICTURES OF AMERICAN FEUDALISM

By E. FRENCH STROTHER.

The example of the zinc trust was described on this page two weeks ago. The other example of American industrial feudalism with which the writer is familiar is the city of Manchester, New Hampshire, where a much less sodden, but no less oppressive, form of practical feudalism exists.

II. A PICTURE FROM NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Manchester is the seat of the largest cotton textile industry in America. Here the Merrimac river descends swiftly in a long series of falls and rapids. Both banks of the stream, for a distance of three miles, are lined with solid rows of four and five-story brick cotton mills, whose looms and spindles are operated by the water power developed by the river. In these mills, 14,000 men, women and children, work from six in the morning until six at night. The wages paid are lower than those paid at Lowell, Mass., they average about as low as the lowest wages paid in the textile industry.

"On the Corporation."

With an inconsiderable exception, all these mills are the property of The Amoskeag Corporation, or "the corporation," as it is invariably called in Manchester. The Amoskeag corporation is very old; it is owned almost entirely by Boston capitalists who rarely visit Manchester. They operate the mills through the "agent," who is the resident manager and whose authority is absolute in the mills and whose power subtly pervades the whole life of Manchester, with its 75,000 inhabitants. When the writer investigated conditions in Manchester two years and a half ago, Colonel Straw was the agent. Colonel Straw's father before him had been the agent. Colonel Straw's son was in training to step into Colonel Straw's shoes as agent when Colonel Straw shall vacate the office, which will be when Colonel Straw is dead.

A Feudal Parallel.

Here, then, was a curious—though not at all improper—literal parallel of the old feudal succession. Colonel Straw, original, handed down to Colonel Straw, incumbent, who will hand down to Colonel Straw, the third, this industrial barony. Each of these owes allegiance, not to a feudal king or prince, but to an incorporated financial oligarchy, residing in the New England financial capital of Boston, and designated as The Amoskeag Corporation.

This, however, is merely the form of the feudal analogy. The substance is yet to be described.

The Amoskeag Corporation originally owned practically all the land within a radius of several miles in and around Manchester, and it still owns a large proportion of it. It owns a large share of the neat houses in which the operatives of the mills live. The residence of any citizen of Manchester is always designated in the common speech as being "on the corporation" or "off the corporation," those who live "on" being renters of company lodgings. The dividing line of "on" and "off" is the mercantile street that parallels the river and bisects the city. Below this street, all is "on," and the uniformity of architecture easily distinguishes the district. All above this street is "off," and here the merchants, professional men, and independent citizens live in dwellings of their own architectural choice.

Contrast in "Company Houses."

The corporation dwellings and lodging houses have nothing in common with the hideous dwellings on the dump in Carbon county. These New Hampshire houses are of tasteful design, built of substantial brick, set back in green lawns and shaded by noble elms. They are comfortably fitted up inside, plainly and on a small scale, but substantially. Sanitation is carefully provided for, and strictly enforced.

The corporation rents these houses at more than ordinarily reasonable figures. The wages paid in the mills are lower than the average wages paid elsewhere in the textile industry. But the corporation sees to it that it is a living wage. About one-third of the operatives live "on the corporation," and their rate of rentals determines the rate "off" as well as "on." Any private landlord who attempts to exact higher rents is met with immediate competition from the corporation.

A Comfortable Living Wage.

The corporation keeps down the cost of living in other ways. If a coal dealer tries to use a coal shortage to raise the price of fuel unreasonably, the corporation promptly enters the coal business and sells fuel at reasonable prices. It does the same in every line of household expenditure. The result is, that the low wage of the Manchester operative is more than a living wage; if he is thrifty, it is a saving wage.

All this is good, even though it is a calculating business scheme to reduce cost of production by keeping down the cost of labor. It immediately puts life on a liveable basis for 14,000 people; on a much better basis than it is in Carbon county.

But life in Manchester is upon a feudal foundation for all that. It is a benevolent feudalism, but feudalism, not democracy. For instance:

No Strikes in Fifty Years.

There has not been a strike in the Amoskeag cotton mills in fifty years. Why? For two reasons. One reason is the benevolent oversight of living conditions described above. The other reason is that there is not a labor union in the entire body of operatives. That is to say, there is not an operative who will publicly admit he belongs to a union. He does not dare to admit it. There are a few unions in the mills, but their meetings are held clandestinely, their members are unknown, their officers dare not approach the agent as the representative of a union.

No Unions Allowed.

The unions, then, do not exist because the corporation does not permit their existence, and because the corporation would discharge any operative known to belong to one. A decisive defeat of the unions fifty years ago has not been forgotten. It would have been ignored long ago but for the constant recognition of the imminent, overshadowing, and locally omnipotent power of the agent to crush the man or men who might try to resurrect unionism. This exercise of power on the part of the corporation, to prevent by menace the exercise of a perfectly lawful and recognized right of free citizens, is distinctively a relic of feudal substance. And this sense, on the part of the operatives, of their helplessness under the menace of that power, is equally a relic of the state of mind of the feudal underling.

Another instance: No man seeks political preferment in Manchester without first directly or indirectly sounding Colonel Straw as to his acceptability to the corporation. It would be futile to stand for election against the agent's wishes. The votes of the male operatives in the mills go the way the agent wants them to go. This cannot be directly proven, but the matter of course statement of it as a fact by every class of men with whom the writer talked—doctors, lawyers, editors, merchants, and operatives, both "on" and "off" the corporation—leaves no reasonable doubt of its truth.

No Tariff, No Job.

In this connection, a quadrennial phenomenon is corroborative evidence. At the approach of every presidential election the corporation shortens hours and lays off operatives. The word is passed down from the company office that the protective tariff is the author of the company's being, and that any interference with its sacred schedules means the closing of the works and the idleness of all hands. The Republican party is the guardian of the tariff, and Manchester is expected to show its usual overwhelming majority for a Republican president and congress. The hint has never failed to work, not only with the operatives, but also with the merchants "off" the corporation, for they live only as the operatives prosper. This phenomenon was described to the writer more than two years ago; its repetition last fall was noted by the writer in the daily papers, read in California, announcing the shortening of hours and reduction of force before the election, and the resumption of full time and full force shortly after Taft's election.

From this large use of political power to the humblest local aspirations, the agent's authority extends. A school teacher, even, gets or fails to get appointment in the public schools by reason of the acceptability of herself and male relatives to the corporation. This example was cited to me by a high official of the city government whom nobody accused of unfriendliness toward the corporation.

Influence Upon Children.

The children of Manchester grow up under conditions that constantly remind them of the all-pervasive power and importance of the Amoskeag. Even their school hours are regulated to fit the convenience of the corporation. Instead of the almost universal American school hours, from 9 to 12 and from 1 to 3:30, the hours in Manchester are from 8:30 to 11:30 and from 2 to 4:30. The change is made to allow the children time to go home and get the noonday lunch for members of the family employed in the mills and to take it to the mills.

There is a compulsory education law in New Hampshire which, as elsewhere, is often violated. But in Manchester practically all violations are in the interest of the one corporation. The influence of the school hours and of the one source of employment and of the one contributing cause of a violated law cannot fail to affect powerfully the minds of the growing generation, who will be the next operations, with the sense of the power of The Amoskeag Corporation.

Two Saturday Nights a Week.

Even the hours of business for banks and stores are arranged with reference to the hours of labor in the mills. In nearly all American cities, the shops and the savings banks are opened on Saturday night. But in Manchester, a majority of the women and children, as well as the men, work in the mills from six to six. Thus more opportunity for shopping than one night of the week is necessary; all the banks—commercial as well as savings—and all the stores in Manchester are open on Thursday night as well as Saturday night.

The industrial feudalism of Manchester is feudalism graced by many evidences of altruism or of enlightened self-interest, as one chooses to look at them. But the conditions of life in Manchester are unwholesome. It is unwholesome for an American citizen to feel that he may not assemble with his fellows in a craft without the certainty of discharge from employment. It is unwholesome that the agent of a corporation can dictate political preferment—grant or withhold it at his pleasure. It is unwholesome that the votes of practically all the operatives in the largest plant of a great industry can be swung by a covert threat from a corporation. It is unwholesome for children to grow up in a community to feel that one corporation has more power for good or evil over their destiny than the power of the suffrage, than the power of associated craftsmen, than the power of the church, even; to grow up to feel that they, as individuals, are helpless so long as they live in that community.

A Warning to California.

These facts and this state of mind are the evidences of a practical system of feudalism. They are a menace to free institutions. The state of mind of the operatives of Manchester is the state of mind of the feudal serf. If these things persist through the coming generations until American life becomes as stable, and the residence of Americans as

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

There's Not a Doubt About It.

There is not a doubt about it, for they all allow it's true,
And the deacon's been suspected ever sence
—it's shockin', too!
At first I some mistrusted, but I guess you'd certain be
If it came to you directly in the way it came to me.

The deacon told the parson,
An' the parson told his aunt,
An' his aunt she told Mis' Bartles,
An' Mis' Bartles told Mis' Grant,
An' Mis' Grant she told her husband,
An' Bill Grant he told his son
That he'd better tell Tom Higgins
How the shameful deed was done,
An' Tom Higgins told his sister,
An' his sister told Mis' Blee,
An' Mis' Blee she told my cousin,
An' my cousin then told me;
An' all scandal is a evil that I greatly depercate,
But I reely cannot doubt it, for it come to me
so straight.

They say the deacon's claimin' that the story isn't so,
But where there's smoke there's allers fire's
a maxim that I know,
And when the neighbors meet and talk, ad-
mittin' that it's tough,
Whatever else may lackin' be, there's verbal smoke enough.

For, settin' 'round together,
Tom Boggs he told it Sam,
And Sam he told it Hiram Keech,
Who told it Peter Lamb,
Who told it to his sister,
Who told it then to Grace,
And they both allowed the deacon
Should be 'shamed to show his face.
An' they told it to their mothers,
As all modest girls should do,
An' they blushed at the admission
That "They say it's reely true;"
An' of course I'm pained about it, an' as shocked as I can be,
But I wouldn't dare to doubt it, for it come so straight to me.

"Getting Into Society."

Don't worry about "getting into society," Mabel, for unless you were immured in an uninhabited wilderness you could not keep out of the kind of society to which you belong. If you did not go to it, it would come to you, as long as like attracts like.

Are you vain, frivolous, desirous of being on exhibition though there is nothing about you (except clothing) that is worthy of a second glance? The vain and frivolous will find you, and you will find them.

Are you coarse, somewhat vulgar, inclined to laugh when a blush would better become you? Such are the ones whom you will attract, and to whom you will be attracted.

Are you sweet, pure, modest? Thank heaven, that kind are about us, and they will greet you as rightful members of their splendid sisterhood.

Is your utmost thought embodied in a fashionable gown? Such "thinkers" are not rare, and the password, "fashion" will admit you to their dress circle.

Have you an intellect that moves, a soul so broad that it covers more than the atom termed Self? Now, God be praised, there are others of this kind, and they and you will know and find one another.

Again, Mabel, "getting into society" is about the last thing in the world concerning which you need worry. That for which you are fitted will receive you with open arms—you scarcely could escape it if you would—and it is the only society in which you could be content. The thing to worry about is whether you are fitted for good society, and if you fancy that it is the capitalized Society of tinsel pretence you thereby demonstrate that you are so far from understanding what good society is that you cannot be fit to be of its fortunate membership.

The Opinions of Rufus.

I'm less disturbed 'bout what "they say"
than I would be if I hadn't found out that I'm a part of the "they."

I don't know where I go when I die, but neither do I know where I go when I sleep, an' I reckon the One that cares for me in one case won't forgit me in the other.

Some people's frowns an' scowls remind me consider'ble of gramma's doughnuts—they was almost entirely fer home consumption.

Lots of times a man's adherin' to his pa's party an' creed is more of a tribute to the pa's infloence than 'tis to the son's good sense.

The parson said a man orto go by his conscience, but I've known some men to go so far by it that they never found it again.

Lots of women promise to "obey" the men they marry. Yit there's folks that claim women ain't got no sense of humor.

Some folks' relegion reminds me of my Uncle Hiram's jackass: 'Twas a great hand to bray, but wan't wuth a dern for workin'.

I b'lieve this life is just a schöol, but I'm willin' to admit that I shouldn't mind seein' some changes in the graduatin' exercises.

I s'pose the reason Paul wanted the women to keep silence in the churches was 'cause he thought there ought to be a place of that kind somewhere.

There's two classes of men—them that think, and them that think they think, an' the last kind ain't so very alfred lonely.

Dignity an' an overcoat are some alike:
Lots o' times a good-lookin' article covers a mighty poor specimen of a man.

They're one thing I've noticed 'bout cats:
They're the only animals that can swear reel hard without usin' a single word of any human language.

Father Time Interviews the Youngster.

"Yes," said the roly-poly youngster, "he was old, feeble, badly banged-up and practically useless, and so I kicked him over the precipice."

"Hey! You—what?" said Father Time.
"Kicked him over the precipice. Guess you'll find his shattered remains down below, if you're anyway interested."

"You ought to be prosecuted."
"All right, but I've got a pull, and I've got money, and Heney isn't prosecuting attorney now, and, anyway, I can prove that he deserved his fate."

"What had he done?"
"Lauded for discovering the north pole a man who had not discovered it."

"Nothing criminal in that. 'Twas merely folly."

"Fired a man who, at his own expense and large personal sacrifice, had convicted four grafters and had others on the anxious seat."

"That's shameful ingratitude, but no legal crime."

"Loudly proclaiming himself a Christian, he had devoted to the construction of dread-naught's money which should have gone to starving poor."

"Heathenish, but not warranting the precipice route. Anything else?"

"Oh, plenty, but see here, old duffer, this is my busy day."

"But had he done no good?"
"Lots of it, but none that I cannot continue as well or better."

"You ought to be prosecuted, but—this is San Francisco?"

"That's what."
"And you have a pull?"
"Sure, an elegant one."

"And plenty of money?"
"You bet!"

"Well, old Father Time has been meandering along this walk too long to butt into many improbable things. You may deserve prosecution, but somebody else must tackle the job."

So the old gentleman blandly meandered on.

How Could Saint Peter Know?

Long Branch, N. J., Dec. 25.—George
Edwards of this city, who had undergone twenty-five surgical operations within the last eighteen years, died to-day. Edwards was forty years old. He died of exhaustion. The ailments for which he had undergone operations ranged from appendicitis to cataract of the eyes.—Press despatch.

The last piece of him was dying, and its tide of life was low,
While the doctors stood beside him with a carving-knife or so,
For they said, those sage physicians, "He is doubtless passing, but
It were sad should he escape us while there's something left to cut.
Haply there is left a fragment of his anatomic list

That we heretofore have slighted, and have consequently missed."
Then they dropped the tears of sadness on their knives and saws galore,
For they knew, where he was going, they could operate no more.

The dying fraction muttered, of the light of life bereft,
"It can matter very little where you bury what is left.

You might hide it 'neath the daisies with the toes you helped me shoo,
Or out there where my appendix long has made its lowly bed.

Oh, it really does not matter. You may place
it anywhere,
And I trust I'll find the pieces all collected
Over There.

Take my hand, the one—that's—left me—"
Then he ceased, to their dismay,
And the doctors, weeping sadly, laid their carving tools away.

Once again his eyelids flickered, and the doctors stooping o'er
Said, "We think that we could save him with one operation more.

If enough were left for carving—" Hush!
The shattered fragment sighed:
"I am passing—what is left me—out upon the farther tide.

Soon in little scraps and pieces I shall reach the hidden shore,
But one question puzzles sadly, and it troubles more and more.

Tell me, doctors, ye who carved me, make a quick and sure reply:
How in thunder will Saint Peter know which part of me is I?"

It was o'er; the life had flitted, but the doctors answered not,
For they had to carve a patient whom till then they'd quite forgot.

The "Crank" and the Wise Man.

A certain man discovered a great truth, and another man was first of those who believed
in it.

Wherefore did all other men flagellate these two and denounce them as cranks and fools and unworthy of consideration.

(For if one sees a truth that we cannot see, then must we hold that he is a crank or admit that we are but dullards, which were unbearable.)

Then, as time passed, did that white light which shines about all truth beat its way unto even the blinded eyes of the mass of men, and thereupon they recognized it;
wherefore it is evident that they are Wise Men.

But he who had discovered and he who had first believed in the truth, they were forgotten, or, if they were remembered, it was by those who muttered, "What astounding cranks they were, to be sure."

For the truth that the "crank" proclaims, this we at last accept, but that he is wiser and sees more clearly than we, this shall not be forgiven.

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Editor The California Weekly.

Several of your correspondents having seriously mistaken my position and having misread my diffident remarks, have proceeded "to take a fall" out of what they misunderstood my position to be.

I was contending that in economics, many things that we were taught as absolute and mathematical, were rather human and relative—"Supply and Demand" among the number. The questions of Supply and Demand must always be taken into account, but they are by no means the self regulating automatic devices that they were supposed to be in the days of laissez faire.

The demand for anthracite coal carries the price extremely high in these days, but who has the hardihood to claim that shortage of supply has anything to do with that price? Monopoly and the railways step in to hold that price at what the consumer can be made to pay. With the importation of alien labor held down to the lowest standard of living, the wages paid coal miners bear no fluid relation to the shortage of farm hands in Kansas, or fruit pickers in California. Here the process is reversed, the factor of "Supply" is open, the factor of "Demand" is monopolized.

To take up your correspondent's question regarding a trade not subject to monopoly:

He has as premises, (a) an eight-hour day; (b) a five-dollar daily wage; (c) an over supply of labor. If the labor union is open to all of the craft the work or the pay must be shared until some readjustment can be made. The problem of the unemployed has certainly never been solved by the "Law of Supply and Demand." If the lack of work is due to a prohibitive charge by labor for service, demand is thereby curtailed and lower wages or different employment must be sought. But the bidding of man against man in accordance with his necessities results in intolerable conditions breeding misery and industrial war. Under such conditions women outbid men and children outbid women, so we pass laws corrective of the "Law of Supply and Demand."

In the packing industry of Chicago the employment is monopolized, the labor supply is excessive and purposely kept so. The yards are thronged with men seeking employment by the hour. Pace-making wears out the most efficient the less efficient barely live. The employers say it's all a question of supply and demand. What would your correspondent do in that situation?

No one could be foolish enough to ignore the elements of Supply and Demand in the attempt to make a living, nor could any one ignore the changing human factors of style, taste or legislation that must be taken into account. We are struggling with a few known and many unknown factors to work empirically toward a more generally tolerable modus vivendi. In so far as political economy makes these hard problems seem easy, it is necessarily fallacious. Deduction from uncertain premises leads nowhere, and there are none to certify the premises.

A great university offers a prize to the undergraduate who shows in an essay the clearest knowledge of the "Elements of political economy." It would be equally sensible to offer a prize to the mining student who can see furthest into the ground.

If any quest requires a comprehension of ethics, civics, sociology and an experience acquired from association with all manner of men, it is the search for what may look like the "elements of political economy." The contestant cannot secure his knowledge from the encyclopaedia, for no two books any longer agree. The prize was started in the Laissez Faire days, and was awarded to the devout follower of Jevons. Some day it will be taken by an orthodox socialist, perhaps by a philosophic anarchist, and one will be about as near right as the other in this changing, complicated world of men.

It would appear to the Casual Observer that human beings are factors to be considered in political economy, along with mathematical formulae and deductive logic. If the average undergraduate is qualified to clearly disclose the nature of man and his individual and social duties the colleges are doing a work that is perfect from an economic standpoint, and the elements are easily described.

WILLIAM KENT.

Kentfield, Cal., Dec. 31, 1909.

If we understand Mr. Kent right, his position is not an attack upon the attempt to create a science of economics, nor an attack upon the intellectual value of a standard of economic values such as the so-called "laws" lay down. It is rather a plea for a humanitarian viewpoint toward the practical relations of men, toward their physical and moral well being, toward an active effort to alleviate economic inequalities, all things that a purely scientific state of mind will overlook. It is a plea that we do not greet the hungry, illiterate laborer, striving for better things, with the stone of a mathematical formula.

The Editor The California Weekly.

Dear Sir:—Referring to an article on your page 86 of your issue of December 31st, near the top of third column, I note the statement in an article by Doctor Gulick, that "Los Angeles does not appear at all" as maintaining children's playgrounds. I am wondering if you are unaware that in fact Los Angeles is one of the foremost cities in this movement, and if you wish exact data and opportunity to correct this bit of misinformation, you can get it by writing to Mrs. Willoughby Rodman, Chairman Playground Commission, Los Angeles, Cal.

I take the liberty of bringing this to your attention, because, being a subscriber, I consider it a matter of duty to correct a misstatement in a paper like yours, which I believe endeavors to be always fair and truthful.

Very truly yours,

E. T. PARSONS.

San Francisco, Jan. 3, 1910.

The natural inference to be drawn from the sentence quoted by Mr. Parsons is unfortunate, and is an error. To reconstruct the sentence more carefully it should read, "It is unfortunate that San Francisco appears lowest on the list; it is unfortunate that Los Angeles does not appear at all, for purposes of comparison." We note a similar slip in Mr. Parson's letter, which may persuade him to forgive our slip of the pen: He speaks of our article "by" Dr. Gulick; as the article plainly shows, it is an article "about" Dr. Gulick. However, we appreciate both Mr. Parson's interest and his courtesy in calling an error to our attention. We are always glad to receive criticisms.

COLLIER'S ON HICHBORN'S.

"Peanuts.

"In the California legislature last year a majority stood for good government. Considerable bad legislation, nevertheless, was passed and few bills of a so-called reform nature became law without being remodeled to suit the machine. Why was this so with a well meaning majority? The opponents of the machine, new to their duties, were mostly unskilled in the details of legislation. Least of all did they seem to understand the importance of the preliminary organization of the two houses. The machine members had their work mapped out before the legislature met. The reformers, on the contrary, allowed the machine forces to elect a speaker through the timidity of some of the house members, who feared possible failure and subsequent punishment in the loss of local appropriation bills. The machine speaker appointed committees according to prearranged program, and needed legislation was chloroformed in committee. In the attempt to pass the race track law it was discovered that the clerk of the senate enrolling and engrossing committee had been a recent employee of a notorious California poolroom. The bill for non-partisan judicial nominations was held up in committee until the day before adjournment and defeated in the rush of the closing hours. Other bills were improperly entered by title on the journal in the hope of thus having them declared unconstitutional. These reflections, and much more of interest to every one interested in politics, may be found embodied in a little volume called "The Story of the California Legislature of 1909." Its author is Franklin Hichborn of Santa Clara, Cal. If every legislator elected in each state next year would peruse this volume, the machines might sooner be dismantled. Even the pettiest politics is a science. Emerson thinks that success in government and in a peanut stand have much in common. Even the peanut business must be learned."—Collier's Weekly of December 25, 1909.

THACKERAY WITH A COLD.

The saying that "A little nonsense now and then is relished by the wisest men," is borne out by a letter of William M. Thackeray, sold recently at auction. It was inserted in a first edition of "William Makepeace Thackeray," by Anthony Trollope.

Thackeray's letter was written while he was suffering from a cold in the head. It is:

A most appreciative cuss,

The Sun gets up to look at us,

But when he strikes the West instead

He gets so bored he goes to bed.

'Tis true that first the East he tries,
Takes just one whiff that "puts him wise."
Then, feeling that he needs a rest,
He hastens to the splendid West.

[The significance of this report, aside from the obviously fair and judicial temper of it, lies in the character of the men who prepared it. The chairman of the committee is Mr. William Denman, a leader at the San Francisco bar and son of the founder of the public school system of the city. Mr. Alexander Goldstein has a wide reputation for honestly won success in business and for a large public spirit. Rev. William K. Guthrie is one of the foremost clergymen of the Presbyterian church in California. Mr. William Kent is a successful business man, who has also had a wide practical training in reform politics in Chicago. Dr. Henry Gibbons, Jr., is the dean of the Cooper Medical College and one of the most distinguished members of his profession. Mr. Will French is the editor of The Labor Clarion, and is recognized as one of the ablest and most conservative of the local labor leaders. Father Crowley, who concurs in the recommendations, though unable from sickness to attend the later meetings and hence sign the findings, is universally beloved for his rescue work, and honored by all men of every faith who know him. Such a committee is securely above any suspicion of wilful misstatement, hasty judgment, or the charge of being disgruntled or irresponsible agitators. Their stake in the community is too large for these things.—Editor The California Weekly.]

San Francisco, December 31, 1909.

Honorable Edward R. Taylor,

Mayor of the City and County of San Francisco,
San Francisco.

Dear Sir:—On the 12th day of October, 1908, your Honor addressed a letter to each of us, requesting an investigation into the circumstances giving rise to the series of criminal trials which have since been known as the "Graft Prosecutions."

It is our understanding, gathered from your letter and, more particularly, from the subsequent conferences with you, that our functions were, to make an analysis of the crimes for which indictments were brought by the Oliver Grand Jury, particularly with reference to their classification as bribes or extortions; to gather such evidence as we could find concerning the classes of persons taking profit from the criminal or vicious enterprises uncovered by the investigation, the extent to which the public has been debauched or deceived into according political, social or commercial prestige to such persons; and the obstructions that the state has met in attempting to uncover the crimes or punish the offenders. In other words, what was desired was, primarily, a collection of the more recently manifested symptoms of a deeply seated disease in our body social and politic, in the hope that it may lead to a true diagnosis and the discovery of a cure.

Acting under your warrant, we have called for conference with us men from many classes of the city's social, industrial and political organization. The response has been, on the whole, extremely willing, as soon as the invited persons have been convinced that we were not trying to secure evidence for the pending criminal cases and that we were not seeking to procure any further indictments.

The accompanying report is made up from the statements of these persons, the examination of the city and county records, the confessions of those charged with crime, and from various matters that have come under our own observation. As such a committee has not power to summon witnesses, no attempt has been made to determine what particular persons connected with the various quasi-public corporations engaged in bribery, actually collected and handled the money.

No one of the many persons we have interviewed has seriously questioned that all but one of the larger of these corporations, by some chain of agency, did pay moneys for favors done or promised. In view of the confession of Abraham Ruef who, as the attorney for nearly all of them, delivered the money to the officials, and of their ratification of the bribes by the acceptance of the benefits, we have taken the guilt of the corporations to be one of those facts established beyond a reasonable doubt.

The reader of the report must always bear in mind that we are considering a disease in the community, and that the description no more pictures the workings or organization of the whole corpus of the people than a treatise on tuberculosis describes the structure or healthy functions of the human body.

The trust officer who invests trust funds in a house of assignation is not a fair representative of San Francisco bankers, nor is the example a fair one of his daily banking activity. The president of an exchange of merchants who becomes bondsman to the prostitute because it may help his sale of liquors to the lower class saloons, is not a fair sample of her merchants. The manager of the gambling stands of a race track who becomes a director in a social club of gentlemen is very far from a fair illustration of his fellow members.

Yet each is, in our opinion, a fair illustration of the symptoms of the disease which you have commissioned us to describe.

Nor is it to be inferred that San Francisco alone is a victim of the malady. The evidence is conclusive that a like evil exists to a greater or less degree in all of the larger American cities. It is to San Francisco's credit, however, that she had been the first to show the moral courage to attack the persons responsible for the condition, regardless of their social, political, or financial power—and in some instances regardless of the fact that, in other respects, they are valuable members of the community.

We have to regret that sickness and absence from the city has prevented the Reverend Father Crowley from participating in most of our sessions, and hence in our final report.

In further response to your suggestion, we have appended certain general recommendations which, we believe, may be of value. The evils disclosed are firmly established in so many of our institutions that no single remedy can be expected to eradicate them. The school house, the club, the church, the bank, the business establishment, the political caucus, and the newspaper office, each must feel the force of an enlightened public opinion, and be levied upon for its contribution in the struggle which in its last analysis is but a phase of the eternal war between man's civic consciousness and his private greed.

WILLIAM DENMAN, Chairman,
WILL J. FRENCH,
HENRY GIBBONS, Jr.,
ALEXANDER GOLDSTEIN,
WILLIAM KIRK GUTHRIE,
WILLIAM KENT.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE

The Earlier Investigation by the Wallace Grand Jury—The Adoption of the Charter.

The history of municipal wickedness in San Francisco dates back to the days of the discovery of gold and its population by gold seekers and adventurers from all parts of the world. The story of the Vigilance Committee of 1856, with its violent and extra legal efforts to suppress the demoralizing reign of crime then controlling the city, is well known; and the struggle against corruption in public affairs had been continuously active, in one form or another, from that time to this.

However, until the empanelment of the Wallace Grand Jury in August, 1891, we find no attempt made at a comprehensive search under forms of law for the causes and persons ultimately responsible for the class of municipal dishonesty now known as "grafting." This Grand Jury was empaneled under Judge William T. Wallace, then on the Superior Bench, but formerly a Chief Justice of the State. They were sworn on August 20, 1891, and reported September 23, 1891. The first pages of this report show there was, at that time, the same relation between a plutocratic organization of special privilege and the office holder, the politician and the public, that was disclosed by the more complete investigation of the Oliver Grand Jury in 1907.

REPORT OF THE GRAND JURY.

"To the Hon. W. T. Wallace, Presiding Judge of the Superior Court of San Francisco:

" This body was assembled and sworn by the court as a Grand Jury on August 20, 1891. It began work at once, appointed sub-committees, and arranged for frequent sessions. Very soon thereafter Stephen T. Gage, one of the directors of the Southern Pacific railway, and Richard Chute, a salaried employe of the same company, declined to obey the subpoena of the Grand Jury.

" Their attorneys asserted that we were not a legal body exercising official authority, and when brought before his court, Judge Murphy sustained this view.

" By other processes the question was carried to the Supreme Court, and Creed Haymond, general solicitor of the Southern Pacific railway, attacked the validity of the Grand Jury before that tribunal.

" The Supreme Court, after some days' deliberation, decided that we could subpoena and compel the attendance of witnesses. But these harassing delays consumed a month or more, and in the interval

"we could do very little as it was thought proper to be sure that we had the rightful power before it was exercised with necessary firmness. Then came a period of about six weeks without other legal checks or impediments. During this time we were free to delve into the arcana of rascality and dishonesty that fronted us everywhere. We made all efforts to fulfill our duty, and heard many witnesses. We collected an immense quantity of evidence tending to show venality and money taking by various officials both municipal and legislative. We found that agents and brokers, who were fully recognized as such, went freely to persons interested in legislation and agreed to defeat or pass measures.

" Many persons other than those in office were implicated, and we began to wonder to what heights our researches would lead us. A number of men, presidents and directors of corporations, who had paid moneys either direct or through agents and brokers, had consented to make a full and unreserved confession in case we were adjudged by the highest legal tribunal in the state a lawful Grand Jury.

" These people may be deemed by some moralists more culpable than those to whom were paid the price of dishonor, upon the principle that if there was no booty there would be no thieves. The corporation owners defend the payment of this tribute in saying that the legislators and supervisors are highway robbers who have to be bribed; for otherwise, by adverse enactments they threaten the destruction of the financial interests involved. But in some instances these financial interests have been obtained in an improper manner, and a just enforcement of the statutes would cause the forfeiture of the acquired privileges.

" And if it be not so, who shall say these corporations are justified? What remedy can cure the injury to patriotism and free government that makes worthless rascals out of men who would have been perchance honest if they had not been tempted? Not even our vacuous laws admit any difference between the buyer and seller of men's consciences.

" Neither by law nor by that abstract sentiment of what is fair and right to man and man, is the tempter better than the tempted.

" The millionaire sitting in his luxurious office rotund with the wealth filched from the public coffers by unclean franchises, may hold up his hands and say, 'Preserve me from these bandits.' But is he less culpable than the poor devil of a senator or assemblyman that has incurred debts during his candidacy which he is unable to pay? Who finds himself for the nonce lifted to a position which he knows is evanescent, and is tempted by wines, banquets and money? They are all alike guilty and criminal. But be that as it may, the tongues of these corporation owners for the present are silenced. For there came again legal intervention to thwart the Grand Jury."

The report was signed by the following Grand Jurors:

CHAS. HOLBROOK,
JAMES DENMAN,
H. L. DODGE,
IRVINE GRAHAM,
WILLIAM CLUFF,
P. J. KENNEDY,
JOHN A. LENNON,
C. W. McAFEE,
J. H. MUNDY,
MARK SHELDON,
W. S. ZEILIN,
REUBEN TUCKER,
WM. M. CUBERY,
JEREMIAH LYNCH,
BARCLAY HENLEY, Foreman.

It is apparent that the problem of the relative immorality of bribe-giving and bribe-taking, and the holding of profits of the bribery had become, even at that time, one of public consideration.

The "legal intervention" which came again "to thwart the grand jury" followed the indictment and flight of Buckley and the summoning of Senator Stanford to testify to the part played by the Southern Pacific in the politics of the city and state. The Supreme Court of the state, by a vote of four to three, held that the grand jury was improperly constituted, because of an irregularity in the appointment of the elisor.

Among other matters considered in the report, was the following:

" The Mayor is helpless. He can do nothing. He is only a chief "clerk. He has the appointment of his personal staff and no more. Like Prometheus bound to the rock of the Caucasus he sees these 'vultures eating the vitals of the city and can only cry out against 'the revolting deed.

"The Mayors of San Francisco have been generally reputable men. But could they, have they, stayed this dirty slime of corruption? It requires a rare order of courage to denounce those with whom one is in daily official and social contact. What, then, is the remedy?

"It is in a new charter, granting above all, enlarged powers to the Mayor, and for the exercise of which he would be directly responsible. He ought to be really, as he is nominally, the Head of the City Government. He should have the appointment of all subordinate officers whose election is now vested in the Board of Supervisors. His powers should include also the appointment of Park, Police and Fire Commissioners. For the Mayor's office is executive while the Boards of Supervisors are legislative, and to the executive, from the President and Governor down, is granted the power and the right to appoint, while the legislature in certain cases confirms."

Acting on the suggestion of this report, Mayor James D. Phelan subsequently appointed a committee of one hundred citizens to draft a charter which should attempt to remedy the administrative defects of the loosely drawn "Consolidation Act" and other statutes then constituting San Francisco's organic law.

It was apparent from the debates of the Committee of One Hundred that they did not expect to eliminate entirely from our Government the evil of grafting. What they attempted was to so re-organize and concentrate the functions of government that the responsibility for dishonesty or inefficiency could be readily traced and public opinion intelligently applied for the removal or reforming of the offending officer. The result of their deliberations was a draft of a charter which, after the formality of a consideration by a freeholders' convention, was adopted by a vote of the people. It is interesting to note that the machine organization of both the Republican and Democratic parties strongly favored the old system of concealed responsibility and actually fused on the ballot to support a set of candidates for the position of freeholder who were antagonistic to the charter proposed.

Mr. Phelan was the first mayor elected under the charter and with him an excellent board of supervisors. It is admitted by practically all the witnesses we have had before us that the government during this and Mr. Phelan's succeeding (and last) term was excellently administered, both in its legislative and executive branches.

The War Between the Laboring and Capitalistic Classes and the Development of the Schmitz-Ruef Machine.

During these years, there had been a gathering of forces for the struggle between the then newly organized unions of laboring men and the combination of capital employing labor. The last year of the Phelan administration saw the first engagement between these two classes in what was generally known as the "Teamsters' Strike." With the merits of this controversy we are not concerned, but the breach between employer and employee was widened by the conduct of both parties. The teamsters claimed that their organization to prevent the employment of non-union men was justified because without it they were unable to resist the attempt of the employers to lengthen the hours of labor and hold down the wage.

The employers' organization refused to recognize any right of the employees to organize and also refused to listen to any arguments presented on behalf of the employees by agents of the unions. The denial of the right to band together for the purpose of collective bargaining with capital, solidified at once the somewhat loosely combined forces of the unions. Certain acts of deliberate and cold-blooded cruelty and violence towards the non-union, strike-breaking teamsters, drove into the capitalistic organization many persons who otherwise would have remained neutral in the struggle.

This alignment of the citizens, based on bitter class antagonism, has shown itself in the political life of the city ever since. In the succeeding election for the mayoralty, all administrative and political questions were entirely lost to view. Eugene E. Schmitz, the Union Labor candidate, whose campaign was skilfully handled by Abraham Ruef, was elected by a large plurality.

The election of Schmitz afforded ideal conditions for municipal corruption. The voters who elect or vote against a candidate because he represents a class in a class war, regard him solely as a class representative. They overlook the method in which he performs the ordinary functions of his position and are absorbed entirely in those official or extra-official acts which favor or injure the apparent interests of their class. No form of charter or legislative enactment can be devised to carry a government successfully under such conditions. However, while the charter was powerless to prevent an election on class lines, it entirely vindicated the wisdom of its framers in the clarity with which it exposed the responsibility for the corruption and the facility with which it lent itself to the substitution of an entirely new and clean administration when class antagonism had quieted and administrative questions again became paramount.

During the first two Schmitz administrations, a majority of the board of supervisors was elected from incumbents of the Phelan regime, and no scandals have been discovered in the legislative branch of the government during that period. The second election of Schmitz, in 1903, found the laboring men still strong in his support, and his plurality should, in the main, be attributed to the class antagonisms again skilfully fomented by Ruef.

The activities of Ruef on his own behalf, were shown to have begun in the profitable stimulation of the vicious industries of the town almost immediately after Schmitz's first election. These earlier enterprises were consummated through the aid of the various municipal commissions, all of which, with the exception of the board of education, are subject to removal by the mayor without trial.

In the summer of 1903, Ruef had already begun to reach out beyond mere grafting on vice. We find him approaching Rudolph Spreckels with a scheme to so shape the relation between labor and capital in San Francisco, that no bank would dare bid a fair price for the municipal bonds to be offered for sale in the fall of that year. Ruef's plan was to precipitate a street-car strike at the time of the receipt of the bids, thus enabling Mr. Spreckels to buy in the bonds without competition, at a low figure. The day this proposition was made, Mr. Spreckels met Mr. Thomas Driscoll and Mr. Edward Tobin at luncheon, and told them of his experience with Ruef and his intention some time to organize and drive such men out of power in the city, and, by perfecting a good government organization, keep them out. Up to this time Mr. Spreckels had taken no special interest in civic affairs, but the boldness of Mr. Ruef and the viciousness of his proposition opened his eyes to the duty of men in his position to use their influence for better city government. It was this incident, he says, which turned his mind away from a career devoted exclusively to business.

The citizens still living, who had in the nineties organized for the overthrowing of the Buckley regime, were not blind to the conditions existing, but their appeals seemed to fall on deaf or unwilling ears. By their efforts both the Democratic and Republican parties were brought into fusion in 1905, and the campaign of that fall brought forth a full discussion of the evils of the administration. A final rally was held the night before election, at which Mr. Francis J. Heney told, in plain language, of certain bribes which were subsequently made the subject of indictment, and pledged himself to return to California and assist in prosecuting the guilty persons, of whom Mr. Ruef was one, should a third election continue Ruef in power.

Mr. Heney had just tried a remarkable series of cases, twenty-one in all, against a large body of men engaged in looting the federal government of its timber properties in Oregon and elsewhere. As a result of his prosecutions a vast conspiracy to defraud was disclosed and thirty-four men (amongst others a United States senator), were convicted, but three of whom maintained successful appeals. These trials were all in the federal courts, where the orderliness and dignity of procedure precluded the suggestion that the judgments were the result of any improper methods. All this prestige, however, failed to obtain for Mr. Heney sufficient attention among the voters to make any impression on the election results.

Nor was the support of Schmitz due to any failure on the part of the press to make public the character of his administration. For many months prior to the election of 1905, the Evening Bulletin, under the editorship of Fremont Older, had been raising the cry of corruption. That paper painted a picture of the viciousness of the city government which, in its shocking verity—though amply justified by the subsequent investigations of the grand jury—gave offense to many good citizens, that is to say, to many good persons who were quite willing to stay blind apparently, at any cost to their inner self respect.

The third election of Schmitz showed a decided change in the character of the vote he received. In the portions of the city where the more prosperous merchants and capitalists lived, men who by instinct and interest would be most unlikely to support a Union Labor candidate, he received a very considerable plurality, while in the "labor" districts his vote showed a decided falling off.

It was for a time suspected by many that the sinister strength of Schmitz in the wealthy quarter of the town, whose support could not have been offered because of any belief in the principles of the Union Labor party platform, was due to tampering with the voting machine. It could not be believed that the financial leaders, the bank managers, the great merchants, and the more pecuniarily successful of the professional classes, were in sympathy with an administration pledged to an extreme labor platform and about which the odor of corruption was already discernible. The discovery of the participation of many members of these classes in municipal corruption, or their sympathy with it, by the Wallace Grand Jury, fourteen years before, had been forgotten.

As the reason for the majority of the Union Labor leader in the residential quarters of the town given over to the capitalist and his class, only became apparent upon the exposures of the Oliver Grand Jury, we leave to that chapter the explanation of what, on its face, is a political contradiction.

THE FAILURE OF THE SCHMITZ-RUEF RING TO CONTROL THE DISTRICT ATTORNEY'S OFFICE, AS SHOWN BY LANGDON'S RAIDS ON PROTECTED GAMBLING RESORTS—HIS INDEPENDENCE THE MORE SIGNIFICANT BECAUSE OF THE GAMBLING SPIRIT IN SAN FRANCISCO.

Amongst others on the Union Labor ticket, was William H. Langdon, who was elected District Attorney. Ruef, not fully realizing the number of his friends among the richer classes and, no doubt, feeling Schmitz's declining popularity with the laboring people, had sought to strengthen his ticket by placing on it Mr. Langdon, then Superintendent of Schools, who had a large following both inside and outside the school department.

It became apparent very shortly after his election that Mr. Langdon's hold on the sympathies of the average voter was largely based on much more of moral character than even the wiser political observers had given him credit for, and that whatever votes his name may have brought to the Ruef-Schmitz organization, Langdon did not intend that that name should be sullied by the corruption of the Schmitz administration. Shortly after taking the oath of office in January, 1906, he began a series of raids on the many establishments of the professional gamblers operating under the protection of the Ruef-Schmitz Board of Police Commissioners.

The significance of Langdon's raids becomes apparent when we consider the remarkable attitude which a very large portion of the community bears toward the vice of gambling. Men of recognized prominence in the social and financial life of the city openly admitted their proprietorship and participation in gambling ventures of the most sordid character. The proprietor and manager of the Emeryville race track, the largest and most widely demoralizing gambling establishment west of the Rocky Mountains, a man who was also one of Schmitz's bondsmen, has been elected since the fire to the directorate of one of the oldest clubs in San Francisco. This organization has long occupied a commanding position in the social history of the city. It has among its members the greatest number of the owners and managers of the various large quasi-public corporations of the state, and probably of the whole West, men who are real leaders in finance and trade, and creators of industries. While occupying the position in their governing body to which these gentlemen had elected him, the whole state arose in arms and, after a violent campaign in which was exposed the daily toll of embezzlement, suicide and ruin he had caused, compelled the legislature to pass a law aimed at closing his gambling stands. With these high lights thus thrown on the character of his business, and despite his intimacy with the indicted mayor, he was again chosen one of the directors at their next election.

The slot machine is a gambling device whereby a saloon-keeper or cigar man wagers liquor or cigars against his customers' small coin on the turn of cards mechanically shuffled. This contrivance was licensed by the supervisors. It was installed openly on the street in cigar stands and stood on practically every bar in the city. At first the objections of the innocent were quieted by the suggestion that the device was a mere "trade stimulator"; but the lines of men and boys standing on the sidewalk waiting their turn to wager with the shop, and playing their coin long after their immediate need for tobacco had been supplied, soon made it clear that its purpose was mainly to appeal to the gambling instincts of people of moderate means. To the more thoughtful, the suicidal policy of an American city licensing a machine to stimulate the nervous, high strung American to the use of alcohol or tobacco, was as abhorrent as the denial that the city was licensing gambling was absurd.

The large profits of these machines were divided between the high rents of the landlords and the proprietors of the stands, after paying the salaries of the considerable body of persons employed to supervise the playing. It is true that some landlords refused to become silent partners in such discreditable enterprises. The exceptions, however, were few and the numbers of such gambling plants in the city ran into thousands, standing educators to the children on the streets in the easily learned vice of seeking to acquire the property of somebody else without giving an equivalent.

It would seem that the banks, the supposed conservators of thrift and saving, would be the first to protest against the evil. On the contrary, we find that when the civic sense had been awakened to the point where the supervisors were considering a bill to abolish the machines, the majority of the large commercial banks of the city signed the following petition:

"TO THE HONORABLE BOARD OF SUPERVISORS of the City and County of San Francisco,
State of California.
Gentlemen:—The undersigned of the City of San Francisco, respectfully request of your Honorable Body that Bill No. 782, passed "to print on Monday, April 5, 1909, be amended so as to limit the "number of slot machines in use at any one place, to two (2); that "the use of slot machines to be licensed be limited to the stimulation "of trade in merchandise dealt in by the owners of the machines; that "all so-called 'play-backs' be prohibited; that the granting of licenses "for slot machines be placed under the supervision of the Police Department in order that gambling may be prohibited; that the time "for the issuance of licenses to any person, firm or corporation shall "be limited to the period between July 1st, 1909, and January 1st, 1910, "and that all licensing of all slot machines shall be discontinued on "January 1st, 1910, instead of July 1st, 1909, as provided in the said "Bill—Number 782, all of which provisions are incorporated in a proposed amended Bill which will be submitted to your Honorable Body "with this petition.
We are moved to make this request by reason of the fact that the "less than three months remaining until July 1st, 1909, is not sufficient "in which to allow the cigar dealers of this city and real estate owners "from whom they rent their places of business, to so adjust their business relations as to prevent the unavoidable and serious hardship that "will result to all parties concerned, if the Bill is put in force at that time.
Many Tens of Thousands of Dollars are invested and leases running "into the Thousands of Dollars per month have been made upon the "basis of the use of those machines as they were used prior to the "fire and for the past fifteen years, and to entirely upset these arrangements, made in good faith by all parties, a large majority of whom "have never used their machines as gambling devices, will mean ruin "for many very worthy people, who are in no sense law-breakers, and "are among our most respectable citizens.
The mere fact that certain persons have violated the law and used "their slot machines as gambling devices, should not move your "Honorable Body, in your effort to reach and prohibit their schemes, "to work a hardship to a much larger number of honest persons.
Believing that you are actuated only by the best motives, and "that you desire to do the greatest good to the greatest number, we respectfully submit this Petition in the hope that it may be granted."

It is claimed that because on an average day's play the so-called "honest" machines netted the house about a fair price for the drinks or cigars lost by it, the institution was not a gambling device. This equally shallow contention is answered by the fact that the same player does not play against the house all day. While the luck may average even for the house over a period of time, this is due to a balance of the cigars won by some players against the coin lost by others.

This is what these banks call a "stimulation of trade" by machines not used as "gambling devices" by many "very worthy" and "most respectable" people.

The admitted purpose of this appeal of the banks was to allow the landlords and the keepers of the machines to take profit enough from the public to tide them over the period of readjustment and to a future date, when the practice would cease. To do this, however, they were willing to argue that the machine was not a gambling device because it decided a wager of tobacco against money instead of money against money.

In a community in which gambling was treated with such tolerance, it was a matter of more than ordinary significance that the District Attorney should have commenced a vigorous enforcement of the laws against the large gambling resorts. A number of church organizations, particularly the Catholics, and many good citizens, rallied to Langdon's support. As the entire city government, including the Police Department, every administrative board and the Supervisors, was under the control of Schmitz and Ruef, and as several of the police judges had been elected from their ticket, the task seemed almost hopeless. Langdon could neither obtain the officers necessary to ferret out the criminals, or to enforce the laws, nor the funds from the Supervisors to hire special detectives for that purpose. Nevertheless, he was able to close two of the establishments which were running under the protection of the administration, and to prevent others being opened.

The significant thing, however, was the demonstration that the people had a District Attorney who was with them rather than in the camp of the enemy—and this at the beginning of the term of the corrupt Board of Supervisors, and before their alleged hold-up practices had been disclosed.

It was this fact of Langdon's willingness to enforce the law, even against a vice as complacently established as gambling, which brought ridicule on the subsequent claim that the quasi-public corporations had been held up and were victims of extortion. We have later set forth the names of the directors of these corporations. It cannot be doubted that if Mr. Langdon had had behind him the power and wealth of these men, either the alleged extorting would not have been attempted or the guilty parties would have been convicted without great delay.

THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE INVESTIGATION OF THE SCHMITZ-RUEF REGIME.

As we have before pointed out, the supervisors, the legislative body of the city, had not been captured by the Ruef-Schmitz machine until the November election of 1905, and that from the adoption of the charter in 1899, until January, 1906, the beginning of the term of the Ruef-Schmitz Board, there had been no suggestion of corruption with regard to the fixing of rates for water or gas, or the granting of franchises or permits. The attacks of the Bulletin, and of the many speakers who took the stump in the fusion campaign of the fall of 1905, were all directed at the evils existing in the administrative boards which were appointed by Schmitz, particularly the Board of Public Works, which were spending large sums of the tax-payers' moneys with an absurdly small showing in results, and the Police Department, which was marketing the privilege of violating the laws passed for the regulation or suppression of the City's vices.

In December, 1905, Mr. Older, Mr. Heney and Mr. Lincoln Steffens met in Washington, D. C., where Mr. Heney was engaged in matters arising out of the prosecution of the timber frauds. These gentlemen had a long conference concerning the situation in San Francisco and Mr. Older suggested that Mr. Rudolph Spreckels, a very large tax-payer and hence interested in suppressing the extravagance of the Schmitz boards, could be persuaded to assist in securing funds to aid in exposing the corruption in San Francisco, and that Mr. Phelan, who had inaugurated the government under the charter, and had been very largely instrumental in securing its enactment, would also be willing to contribute for this purpose. Mr. Heney then agreed with Mr. Older that as soon as he could free himself from his engagements with the national government, he would lend his services to a movement to prosecute the offending officials. The only condition he imposed was that Mr. William Burns, the Federal detective who had unearthed the timber frauds, should co-operate with him and that there should be sufficient funds supplied to secure Mr. Burns any other assistance he might think necessary. Subsequently, in January, 1906, Mr. Heney, Mr. Older, Mr. Spreckels and Mr. Phelan met in San Francisco and plans were further matured. Mr. Heney's preoccupation with the land fraud cases delayed the matter until the June after the earthquake and fire of that year, when Mr. Burns' detectives began a systematic investigation.

All of this becomes pertinent in view of certain charges made long afterward "that the citizens should not support District Attorney Langdon or Mr. Heney (who subsequently became his assistant) because they were tools of Mr. Spreckels in an attempt to ruin certain persons indicted for bribery in connection with the passage of franchises for quasi-public corporations." The plan of attack on the Schmitz-Ruef administration had been well matured at a time when the only evil aimed at was the corruption in the administrative boards of the government, months before the franchise bribes had been suggested, and even before the board which was subsequently bribed had taken office.

THE WIDE SPREAD OF THE EVILS LENDING SUPPORT TO CORRUPT GOVERNMENT, AS SHOWN BY THE CHARACTER OF THE CRIMES FOR WHICH INDICTMENTS WERE BROUGHT BY THE OLIVER GRAND JURY.

What was happening during the period before and after the fire is best learned from the testimony given before the Oliver Grand Jury, and in the confession of Ruef which came as a result of the facts there developed. The crimes unearthed belong to the three classes customarily found in American cities, namely, those for the protection of illicit or demoralizing enterprises, commonly known as "Police Graft," those for obtaining franchises or privileges, known as "Franchise Graft," and those for securing advantageous rates to the corporations supplying quasi-public utilities, known as the "Rate Graft." The French restaurant cases fall under the head of the first class; the Parkside, the Home Telephone, the overhead trolley deals, and the prize fight monopoly under the second; and the gas rate bribery under the third.

We shall, in the succeeding subsections of this chapter, endeavor to analyze these crimes and to show something of the relationship they bear to the social, financial, political and economic organization of the city.

The French Restaurant Extortions.

There are many respectable restaurants in San Francisco conducted by Frenchmen, but the term "French Restaurant" has a meaning in the parlance of the town which conveys much more than the implication that a given restaurant has a French proprietor. The term is applied to a peculiar kind of transient house of assignation, obviously arranged for immoral purposes, sometimes having a conventional restaurant dining room on the ground floor, and sometimes a banquet room and a few private dining rooms without assignation accompaniments. The building is often five or six stories in height, and in nearly all cases built expressly for illicit purposes.

The presence of the restaurant on the ground floor gives a certain air of legitimacy to the enterprise. On account of the large profits from the sale of foods and liquors to the persons using the upper stories, and for the rental of the rooms above, the prices in the restaurant are made exceptionally low, considering the skill of the cooks and the quality of the food served. As strict propriety of conduct is required in the public dining room, many innocent and respectable people patronizing the place do not stop to analyze the reason for the low price. Behind this veil of respectability many a tragic "first step" downward is taken.

The business is very prosperous and, as is usual, the landlord shares in its prosperity. People of social prominence were known to accept a portion of the profits of such establishments, through the extremely liberal rentals paid, and the system is received with easy toleration. One of the largest of these assignation places was located on a prominent corner of the downtown shopping district, where hundreds of women daily passed its doors. The building, five stories in height, had four stories devoted to the private supper bedrooms. The land was owned in trust by one of the largest, if not the largest, trust company in the West. A lease was sought and obtained by a man notorious in the line of business above described; the building was constructed by the trust company according to plans satisfactory to him for this purpose, and the enterprise was conducted there for seven years until the building was destroyed by fire.

The significant thing about such a transaction is, not that there are people who are willing to accept money from such a source, or financiers willing to put trust moneys to such uses, but that the facts, though well known, did not seem to detract in the slightest from the social recognition accorded to the persons so taking a share of the profits, while the officer of the trust company which made the lease of that particular house situated in the shopping district was appointed a regent of the State University.

A striking illustration of the toleration which permits a corrupt mayor to deal in illicit privileges and to take profits from vice, arose in connection with a raid on a famous house of prostitution—presumably similarly licensed—during an earlier and unsuccessful investigation of the Ruef-Schmitz regime, undertaken by a grand jury of which Mr. T. P. Andrews was foreman. The immunity from police interference which this place was accorded had earned it the name of the "Municipal Crib." In the raid one hundred and sixty prostitutes were arrested from the one house, and released on the deposit of bail money exceeding in all Sixteen Thousand Dollars. It was subsequently published—and never denied—that the money was furnished by a prominent liquor man who was, at the time of the publication, the president of one of the oldest, the most powerful, and the richest of the associations of merchants in the city. That their president, a wholesale liquor man, might be also a wholesale backer of prostitution, did not arouse the merchants to the extent of even making an investigation, and he served out his term, which, at the time of his exposure, had less than one-half expired. The fact that his company was, at the time of the raid, selling liquors to a large number of resorts whose licenses were dependent upon the Schmitz board of police commissioners, was accepted by many as a sufficient excuse for his supplying the bail.

The Ruef-Schmitz organization, recognizing how easily such illicit enterprises could be made to pay tribute, devised a plan to obtain a share of their profits. They included in their attack the trust company's restaurant already described. This was made the easier from the fact that one of the members of the board of police commissioners had consistently opposed the granting of licenses to these places as soon as he had become aware of their extremely vicious character. The Mayor inspired another member of the board of four commissioners, who have absolute power to grant or withhold liquor licenses, to commence an attack on the system and to threaten refusal to renew the licenses. The restaurant keepers soon discovered it was necessary to employ Ruef as an attorney to defend them before the board. It is interesting to note that the member of the board who had apparently conscientiously anticipated the attack on the system refused to cease when the matter had been arranged, and was subsequently removed by the Mayor.

Ruef was paid large "fees" by the restaurant proprietors and the licenses were renewed at their expiration.

Five indictments were brought against Schmitz and Ruef based on these extortions, and Ruef later pleaded guilty to the charge on one of them. Schmitz was convicted by a jury, but the conviction was set aside by a decision of the District Court of Appeal, on the ground of a technical defect in the indictment. This defect also released Ruef.

The Prize Fight Trust Briberies.

As might be expected of a community which gilds its so-called social evils with the accessibility and attractiveness of its French restaurants, San Francisco still licenses prize fighting. This is done through the medium of its limited round boxing permits. The words "limited" and "boxing" are a sham that deceives no one, and encounters are openly advertised as for the various prize-fighting championships either local or for the world. The "knockout," inducing unconsciousness, is a frequent termination of the encounter, while the "limit"—often twenty rounds, extending over nearly two hours—finds the contestants seriously beaten up and the audience in a frenzy of brutal excitement. This gladiatorial brutality is apparently the sole reason for the continuance of the fights, as there are few persons who are induced by the example of the prize ring to take up the sport for physical development or athletic competition.

The first crime in which the Ruef-Schmitz board of supervisors participated as a whole was in the creation of a monopoly of these fight permits for a body of promoters known as the Prize Fight Trust. These men paid Ruef a large sum of money for the exclusive right to the permits and Ruef in turn distributed a part of the money to the members of the board. The price was high, as in the case of the French restaurants, for there was a strong feeling in the community against the continuance of the "fight game," primarily because of its essential barbarity, and secondarily because, being prohibited in most of the other large cities of America, San Francisco became the rendezvous of a large proportion of the pugilists and their following of trainers and rough sporting men of the entire country.

We have found no indications in the prize ring graft which connect it up with the higher financiers, or the landlord, as in the case of gambling and the social evil, but it appears that the business is as firmly established and as regularly organized as either of the former. The "People of the State of California," the plaintiff in all these cases, or the "Prosecution," as they were nicknamed, by focusing the public attention on their character through these indictments and raids, were placing all three of these institutions in jeopardy. The cry that the prosecution was "hurting business" became the watch word of all those who profit by the tenderloin enterprises, both high and low, as well as others in more innocent employments who were led to imagine they would be better off if the city's vices were left to run "wide open."

The Overhead Trolley Bribery.

The so-called trolley bribery was for the purpose of securing a change in the motive power of the roads belonging to the United Railroads of San Francisco, from cable to the overhead electric trolley. These cable roads had practically no loss from experimentation in the mechanism of their cable systems and the right to charge five cents for the carriage of passengers over the city's streets in cable cars had proved so profitable, that is to say, the carriage, after payment of all expenses and providing a sinking fund for duplicating the plant, cost so much less than the five cents fare that the franchises were valued at many millions more than the cost of duplication.

The citizens had recognized that the cable franchises had turned out to be gifts of millions in value to the railways, and there was a strong feeling that if the company were to receive permits to instal any other motive power which science might have rendered cheaper, a considerable part of the gain should be shared by the people. Negotiations for adjusting a bargain whereby electricity might be substituted for the cable had been begun in 1905 between the "Committee of Improvement and Adornment" and the railway company, through its President.

At the outset there was a demand that on certain main arteries of the city the Underground Electric System should be used. The United Railroads insisted on the universal use of the overhead trolley, and made no offer to share the great benefit of cheapened operation. Neither better seating accommodations nor reduced fares were to be had in exchange for this valuable privilege. The only offer, as against a grant worth many millions, was $200,000 to the city to be expended on its parks, they well knowing that any moneys expended on park improvement would be returned many times to the coffers of the road carrying the people thither.

The company retained Ruef as one of its attorneys in the latter part of 1905, after the election of the Ruef-Schmitz board of supervisors. The negotiations with the citizens were broken off in March, 1906, when the company announced that it would deal directly with the supervisors. Ruef confessed that the arrangement had been made with him for the passage of the ordinance for the overhead permits in the latter part of March, or early in April, and prior to the fire and earthquake, that is, shortly after the company announced that it would deal with the Ruef-Schmitz board, and after it had broken off negotiations with the adornment committee.

The earthquake and fire of April 18, 1906, temporarily suspended transportation on the cable lines. Only one of the United Railroads power plants for roads which were afterwards changed from cable to electricity was destroyed, that of the Sutter Street System. The plant on Valencia street, which served Market and Valencia streets, the main artery of the city, was so slightly injured by the earthquake that its power would have been available on the morning after, while the injuries by the fire would have delayed the resumption of the operation of the road but a few days. The damage to the various cable slots by the earthquake was not of a serious character, and there seems to be no question that inside of a month after the fire all the cable roads subsequently converted to electricity, save the Sutter Street System, could have been running. The Geary street cable road, an independent line, actually commenced running the morning of the earthquake. The width of the tracks on the streets operated by the Sutter street power house was greater than the standard gauge for electric cars, and hence these lines were not available for rapid conversion into electric roads. In fact no passengers were carried on these lines for many months after the fire.

The truth regarding the availability of the cable lines of the United Railroads for the resumption of business was not disclosed by the company and no beginning made on the comparatively slight repairs necessary to put them in order. In the confusion and distress caused by the fire and the succeeding struggle to rebuild the city, the facts were not investigated and the general public believed that the cable roads could not be made available till long after the time necessary for the installation of the trolley.

There was a double purpose in concealing the good condition of the cable lines after the fire. The company was not confined to the Board of Supervisors to obtain an ordinance granting the permit to change its power from cable to electricity. The San Francisco charter provides that such an ordinance shall, on the filing of a petition signed by fifteen per cent of the city voters, be submitted to the people at the next election, and the obligation of the city officials to submit such a proposed ordinance is mandatory.

The belief that the cable lines were destroyed made many citizens so apprehensive regarding the resumption of traffic, and hence the restoration of retail trade, that they were willing to ignore the method of procuring the permit from the supervisors. Without the cables it seemed to them entirely impracticable to wait until the November election to submit an ordinance directly to the people. Had the city cable been restored by June 1st, and the question of voting an overhead trolley permit been submitted in November, five months later, there was no question that the citizens, realizing that in granting a permit they were giving many millions to the road in increased capacity for issuing bonds and stocks, would have demanded a substantial return either in additional seats or reduced fares.

Pursuant to the bargain struck with the railroad interests before the fire, the road, through Ruef, bribed the supervisors to pass an ordinance permitting the use of the overhead trolley on such of its cable lines as the company should deem proper. The supervisors were paid $4,000 each, save Gallagher, who received $15,000, and Wilson $10,000. The ordinance was passed and the roads are now operating the overhead trolley under the rights thus obtained.

The company expressed a great desire to see transportation restored in the city streets and for a time their good faith was not questioned. This impression was dispelled, however, when it was discovered that instead of tearing up the cable conduits and replacing them with the overhead system block by block, thus leaving the remainder of the street open to traffic by team and motor, the company put to work large gangs of unskilled laborers, which were then easily obtainable, and tore up the streets for miles at a stretch, leaving them in that condition for many months until small gangs of more skilled workmen—much more difficult to obtain—gradually installed the new system.

The uneven contour of San Francisco had caused the transportation companies to install their main cable lines along the streets of easy grade, and the shopkeepers had likewise established their stores along such streets, both because they were the natural highways for persons on foot, and because of the traffic brought by the cables.

The goodwill of such enterprises was entirely dependent on the habit of the customer to come to the particular locality of the store. The tearing up of the streets by the railway company destroyed hundreds of these establishments and congested the trade in the shopping streets that remained open. The motive was not a desire to harm these shopkeepers or to favor the open streets, but to eliminate as quickly as possible the conduit for the cable, which the citizens' experts had declared available for an underground electric system. The confusion and lax administration of the city government made such a proceeding possible, and it was apparent that once the conduits were torn out, the business men of these streets, having already experienced the ruin caused to their established trades by changing from cable to trolley, would back up the company's opposition to any civic movement for the underground system which, though much less offensive to sight and ear, has a somewhat higher operative cost.

The Parkside Bribery.

The Parkside Company owned a large tract of land, about a mile and a half south of Golden Gate Park, which it called "Parkside." It was planned to subdivide this tract into small home sites and the company desired a franchise for an electric road to connect it with the lines of the United Railroads. No doubt had an ordinance for such a franchise been submitted to the people under the charter provisions to that effect, it would have passed at the election of the fall of 1906. However, this would have required the selection of an unimproved street, as the only improved thoroughfare was a macadamized boulevard, and, under the city's laws, a railroad could not be run on any of its boulevards.

The firm of attorneys for the company sent one of its members, who was also an investor in its shares to the amount of $50,000.00, to secure Ruef's assistance in passing an ordinance through the board granting the franchise. He reported back that Ruef demanded money. Subsequently the matter was arranged, not, however, by the attorney in question. The agreement was that the supervisors should declare an unimproved street which adjoined, a mere surveyed streak of sand, to be the boulevard in place of the macadamized street. The latter thus becoming an ordinary city thoroughfare upon which rails could be laid, the franchise was to be granted over some sixteen blocks of its length. The money was paid, but the plot was discovered before the ordinances were passed.

No one has had the temerity to urge that this transaction was an extortion or a holdup. Not only did its profitable escape from paving over a mile of street, the absence of any attempt to submit the ordinance to the people at the election of 1906, and the failure to seek relief from the District Attorney, preclude such a proposition, but in this case the District Attorney got wind of the negotiations and on asking the company whether it was being blackmailed was assured that it was not.

The most striking incident in connection with this transaction, from the standpoint of one trying to analyze the forces which have combined to embarrass the people in these prosecutions, was the fact that the attorney who reported back the necessity for bribery was a former judge of the Superior Court and the then president of the San Francisco Bar Association, a man of ability, good social and professional standing, and attractive personality. Although it was made public that he had neither disclosed the crime to the District Attorney nor withdrawn from the investment, nor given up his attorneyship or his directorship in the Parkside Company, he did not resign his presidency of the Association. An indictment (subsequently quashed) was found against one of his partners for alleged participation in the offering of the bribe. This made it apparent that it would be necessary for the Bar Association to consider his partner's disbarment, either for the bribery or for the purchase, as the legal representative of the Company, of Ruef's influence over the Board—a political crime as subversive of the government as bribery itself, and hence a violation of the attorney's oath.

Several other prominent attorneys were involved in similar transactions and there was a plain need for a vigorous investigation to determine the propriety of their disbarment as well. A motion was made at a meeting of the Association that such an investigation be undertaken, and the matter was referred to the Grievance Committee. In that body a sub-committee was appointed to follow the criminal prosecutions and determine whether any unprofessional acts, not amounting to crimes, had been committed. Nevertheless this man clung to his position as the head of the Bar Association, and he received a re-election to the presidency at the next annual meeting. At a subsequent re-arrangement of the Grievance Committee, he omitted the names of the persons who composed the sub-committee which was to make the investigation. To such lengths was this partnership in evil for personal gain carried that honour, reputation, dignity, are forgotten, and those who should be the bulwark of the state have become its peril.

We are glad to observe that since this time there has been a different spirit infused in the Bar Association, and that it seems to be awaking to a keener appreciation of the obligation it owes the profession and the community whose laws it is organized to sustain.

Home Telephone Bribery.

The Home Telephone bribery was an attempt on the part of some owners of capital in distant cities to obtain a franchise for a system to compete with the Pacific Telephone and Telegraph Company, the local organization. As the supervisors were to offer a franchise which fitted the apparatus of the Home Company only, and hence as no one else would bid against them, and as the Home Telephone Company had no investment in San Francisco to protect, here, as in the other cases we have considered, the claim of extortion was not present. These promoters were seeking a greater income on their moneys and did not hesitate to debauch the city's officials to prevent competition and make the profit possible. The franchise was successfully obtained, the supervisors receiving an average of $5,000 each for their votes.

The Pacific Telephone Bribery.

The Pacific Telephone and Telegraph Company bribed the supervisors to prevent the Home Telephone Company, or any other organization, from obtaining a telephone franchise in San Francisco. No attack of any kind on the Pacific Telephone and Telegraph Company was threatened by the supervisors, and the sole purpose of the crime was to maintain a profit which might be cut by the competition of business rivals. The supervisors were paid in all over $50,000. The managing committee of the board of directors of the company swore before the Grand Jury that they did not know how the funds were procured for the bribery.

The Gas Rate Briberies.

We have seen that all the crimes we have heretofore considered, save the French restaurant extortions, were either briberies to secure privileges from the city without making adequate compensation, or to obtain a profitable investment of outside capital, or to prevent the competition of business rivals with profitable monopolies. The element of extortion or "hold up" seems lacking in all of those, in view of the large profits or advantages obtained, the readiness of the District Attorney to enforce the laws, and the further fact that the citizens could have been appealed to directly for the passage of ordinances giving the rights sought, in the event the supervisors improperly refused them.

The gas rate briberies present a different consideration. The fixing of the rate to be charged for any quasi-public utility should be the result of a judicial inquiry, based upon an intelligent consideration of the elements entering into the cost of the utility at the time it reaches the citizen. This is, in each case, a task of large proportions and should be approached in a purely judicial attitude of mind. Such adjudications in fact involve larger sums and the interests of more persons, and require the consideration of more diverse and intricate factors in reaching a judgment than any other class of litigation brought before our courts or legislative bodies.

Instead of creating a tribunal possessed of the requisite professional training to deal with the evidence of values and the engineering and other scientific questions which must necessarily be considered, practically all American communities have turned these adjudications over to the municipal legislative boards. These are made up of men elected on platforms almost exclusively political in their character, and who serve for short terms and hence are extremely sensitive to the clamor of the rate-payer. Not infrequently the party platform pledges the nominee to decide the question in a certain manner before he can receive his nomination and the citizens are asked to vote for him because he has promised that, no matter what evidence may be presented as to the cost of the utility, he will declare the rate to be a certain figure. The Ruef-Schmitz board was elected on such a platform, that is to say, the citizens had pledged their supervisors to adjudicate gas rates at seventy-five cents per thousand feet. The reduction was prevented by bribes aggregating $20,000, by which it was estimated that some $600,000 in a year's income was saved for the lighting company. It would seem much less a matter of surprise that the company should bribe under such circumstances than that a self-respecting community should permit the continuance of the system.

However, a better precedent had been long established by the Spring Valley Water Company, which in all cases of dispute as to the rates granted by the supervisors had sought the courts where the rates may be set aside if shown to be confiscatory. Under the Buckley regime the methods of this company had been by no means above suspicion, but since the adoption of the charter there had been no suggestion of any impropriety between it and the various municipal boards.

The courts were equally open to the Gas and Electric Company to set aside any rate if it afforded a return which was confiscatory of its property. While it is true that the company is entitled to an income which is something more than a mere absence of confiscation, we have yet to hear it seriously urged that this is an excuse for bribery, either in morals or at law. The method of fixing rates, however, is radically unjust, and some rational tribunal should be created for their determination.

THE CORPORATIONS' SHARE IN THE BRIBERIES.

It is not in the province of this committee to fix the responsibility of the individual human beings, other than those who confessed, for the crimes committed for the benefit of the quasi-public companies. The beneficiaries were in all cases corporations and their boards of directors have absolute power in their government. It is of course conceivable that the large sums necessary to effectuate these briberies were smuggled through the companies' budgets without the knowledge of some of the directors. It is also possible that, in the case of the Gas Company and the Railway Company, the moneys were furnished by persons interested in "holding companies" owning blocks of stock in the corporation benefited. The fact, however, that their companies are the beneficiaries of the dishonorable acts, placed upon these directors the duty, not only of making reparation to the community for the stolen benefits, but of lending vigorous assistance to the People in hunting down and punishing the criminals. We are unable to see any difference in morals between the private person who knowingly keeps a case of wine, which his butler has bribed the merchant's clerk to sell at half price, and the board of directors of a quasi-public corporation, which knowingly retains a franchise secured by bribery. In no case has any corporation made reparation, and in no case has any substantial assistance been rendered the government in unearthing the crimes or punishing the criminals.

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY:

San Francisco will have many dealings in the future with the directors of these quasi-public corporations. They will come to many agreements regarding the supply of light, water, transportation and the telephone. Many of the terms of these agreements are not capable of exact statement and their performance is very largely a matter of good faith on the part of the directors of the companies. A dishonorable management could, without detection, add a few switches each month to the telephone bill of each business office using its system. It could deteriorate the quality of gas till it reached the minimum of light with the maximum of profit to the company. It could falsify both its gas and water meters. It could, instead of supplying a seat to each passenger, or running new lines temporarily without profit to develop new districts and thus prevent unhealthy congestion of population, divert the cost of such a service into interest and dividends, on watered bonds and stock.

Whether boards of directors which have on them many men of integrity in their private affairs, but which are unable to discover that large sums are being paid as bribes to secure benefits for their companies, and which retain the benefits after they discover they have been stolen, would be any more efficient in discovering or punishing such frauds on their patrons, is a matter for the present and future officials of the city to solve. In answer to the inquiry of Your Honor's letter regarding the conditions leading to the graft prosecution, however, we feel it within our jurisdiction to report the names of the persons who sat on the boards of directors either during 1906, in which time the bribes were committed, or in 1907, when the bribes were disclosed. We have no evidence to show how far these persons were interested in the stock of the company, and the list concerns solely their responsibility as directors.

THE GRANTING OF IMMUNITY TO CERTAIN OF THE SUPERVISORS AND LENIENCY TO RUEF, AND THE RESULTANT CLEANING UP OF THE CITY GOVERNMENT.

The number of persons indicted for the crimes we have described in the preceding pages was twenty-one, including Mayor Schmitz, Abraham Ruef, and three of the supervisors. With the exception of these five, the indicted men represented interests which would receive the large profits of the bribes. In order to obtain the evidence for the indictments of the bribe givers, the District Attorney deemed it necessary to make agreements to use his office to procure complete immunity for the supervisors, and subsequently to promise aid in securing leniency to Abraham Ruef. Each of these persons was by law entitled to remain mute before the Grand Jury, on the ground that his evidence might tend to incriminate him.

The practice of the government's prosecuting officer agreeing with certain members of groups of law breakers to use the influence of his office to procure immunity from punishment or leniency in sentencing in return for a full and true disclosure of the facts, has been established for many centuries in those tribunals following the criminal law developed from the Anglo-Saxon civilization in England. The exercise of this power not only has the sanction of the practice of centuries, but has been repeatedly approved by the Supreme Court of the United States. It is now the practice in nearly all the American States, and in one state the prosecuting officer's agreement for immunity is all that is needed to protect the accused in subsequent prosecutions. In most States the procedure is to stay the prosecution or sentence till the Governor has pardoned the confessing party.

The necessity for the use of the power to grant immunity became apparent early in the prosecutions. With but one exception, that of James L. Gallagher, who distributed the bribes and, as the chairman of the board, in the Mayor's absence marshalled the votes, the men of the board of supervisors were mere political puppets placed in power by Ruef and extremely unlikely to have any influence in the community, politically or otherwise, after the expiration of one term in office. If a choice had to be made between attempting a conviction of the apparently respectable criminal, whose large profit from crimes of this character makes him the more powerful to prey on society, and a mere pawn on the political chess board whose capacity for harmfulness would end with the exposure of his criminality, there could be no question that the people should choose the former. A democracy's permanency rests entirely in the belief of the common man that it is the best form devised to protect him from the rapacity and selfishness certain to develop in some of his more powerful neighbors. In such a government, the choice by the prosecuting officer of the weak agent in the commission of a crime, because of the facility of his conviction, and the avoidance of the more arduous contest with his dangerous and resourceful master, is simply preparing ground for anarchy or revolution.

It was urged that both the receivers of the huge profits of the bribes and their tools in office could have been convicted, and that it was unnecessary to give immunity to so many of the supervisors. The District Attorney's explanations of the reasons for his action appear to amply justify his choice of the former course. Gallagher, the leader of the Board, had paid the bribes to each supervisor without witnesses. He was a necessary connecting link in the chain from the profiting corporation to the vote cast in the board, and without him there was no method of discovering from whom he received the money. Gallagher refused to confess unless immunity were granted to all the supervisors and held firmly to this position.

Although the District Attorney had trapped several supervisors in other bribes, in which Gallagher had not participated, and had these guilty persons as witnesses against him, still, as he could be tried for bribing but one supervisor at a time, there could have been but this one witness contradicting his oath that he had not bribed, while a majority of the board, in all likelihood, would have sworn that they voted for the ordinance without promise of compensation. This would have been an extremely difficult case to win, and, even if won, there was no guaranty that Gallagher would have then made himself the State's witness against the person or persons supplying money to him.

Aside from this doubtful utility of a conviction of Gallagher, there was the long time that would necessarily be lost in his trial. All the city's offices were in the hands of Ruef and Schmitz. The election commission which would have had charge of the election in the succeeding November could have been remodelled to do the bidding of the Mayor and would have made fraudulent voting extremely difficult of detection. The Chief of Police was their ardent supporter and threw the whole strength of a not unwilling department to cover up the crimes and hamper the work of the District Attorney's detectives.

It appeared essential for the success of the investigation that the police force be made at least neutral. This could be done only by the removal of Mayor Schmitz on conviction of some one of his crimes, and the election of a successor who would appoint a decent board of police commissioners. The supervisors alone have the power to fill a vacancy in the mayor's chair, and it was reasonable to suppose that, if the members of the board were under indictment and being prosecuted, they would not elect a mayor who would take from them the active support of the police department.

The supervisors' testimony gave the grand jury the facts as to the passing of the ordinances, the payment of the money by Gallagher to various supervisors, and the payment of the money to Gallagher by Ruef. The chain of evidence, however, stopped at Gallagher's testimony that Ruef paid him the money in all but the Pacific States Telephone bribes, and no further evidence was discovered against the mayor in connection with the French restaurant extortions.

The question then arose as to the advisability of treating with Ruef to secure the evidence as to the method by which the moneys came from the quasi-public corporations. Ruef was a man of very different caliber from the supervisors. He was a graduate of the State University, had for many years been recognized as a lawyer of high skill though questionable practice, and was the organizing brain of the corruption of the Schmitz regime. He was a dangerous man to leave at large without the felon's brand on him, and yet it became apparent that, without this one man's testimony, the many bribe-givers whose enrichment by the large profits of such undertakings made them equally, if not more, dangerous to society, would not only escape the penalty which was their due, but that even their names would not be discovered and written in the "detinue book" of the city's suspicious characters.

Besides, without Ruef's assistance, the conviction of Schmitz, with the resultant change in the mayoralty, the police and other municipal boards, seemed impossible. The District Attorney had the choice in this dilemma. He could leave the mayor and his administrative boards in power, discover nothing regarding the profit-takers from the bribes, and content himself with a mere change in the supervisors and a long term of imprisonment for Ruef, or he could reasonably expect the conviction of the mayor, the cleaning up of the city government, the obtaining of a complete revelation of the grafters "high up," as well as "low down," and the possible conviction of some of them.

The District Attorney chose the latter alternative and bargained with Ruef. The negotiations covered many weeks and were carried on through the District Attorney, his assistant, Mr. Heney, and Detective Burns for the people, and Ruef and Rabbi Nieto and Rabbi Kaplan—both being clergymen of Ruef's faith. Sometimes all these men met together, sometimes not more than two were present at the negotiations. The terms offered on each side varied from time to time, as well as the points of view of those of the same side, all of which led to considerable confusion. A written contract was finally signed, whereby Ruef agreed to tell fully and unreservedly all he knew of all the bribes and to plead guilty to certain of the French restaurant extortion cases, and the District Attorney agreed to use the power of his office to procure him immunity as to the other charges. This document was placed in the joint keeping of Detective Burns and, at first, one of the rabbis and later the other.

Mr. Ruef and Rabbi Kaplan and Rabbi Nieto all insist that the written agreement did not contain the entire contract and that the clause in it reserving the French restaurant case from the immunity agreement was a mere sham. The real agreement they claim was that Ruef should later be allowed to change his plea of "guilty" in the latter case to "not guilty," and then the action should be dismissed. Schmitz was convicted very largely on Ruef's testimony against him. Neither rabbi protested when Ruef led the jury to believe that the agreement was not for a complete immunity, but merely that the District Attorney and Mr. Burns were to use their efforts to procure leniency for him. In the succeeding campaign for District Attorney, Mr. Heney repeatedly said, in answer to certain accusations that complete immunity had been given Ruef, that he would send him to prison, and his attitude very largely determined the result of the election. Yet the rabbis made no public disclosure of any agreement as to complete immunity.

All the persons representing the government, including Mr. Langdon, Mr. Heney and Mr. Burns, assert that the rabbis repeatedly asked for complete immunity, but that it was at all times refused. They say that the written contract contained the actual agreement reached with Ruef and with them as Ruef's agents. Applying the commonsense rule that persons do not make specific written provisions in a contract when they intend the exact contrary, and giving the clergymen the benefit of the presumption that they would not have connived at, or remained mute under, a suborned conviction of Schmitz, or an election of a District Attorney on fraudulent misrepresentation, we are driven to the conclusion that the agreement for entire immunity was never entered into. The confusion in the negotiations was sufficient to warrant the confusion of memory which later led to the rabbis' contradiction of the written agreement.

We have mentioned this controversy, not because we would have regarded it as an error to grant Ruef complete immunity if necessary to expose the corruption amongst the profit takers, and to oust the mayor and his commission, but because it raises a serious question of good faith on the part of the people's representatives, both political and religious. If, in order to convict Schmitz and elect the District Attorney, the officers of the government and these ministers of religion were deliberately concealing the true nature of the agreement and permitting Ruef to lie about it to the jury, and Heney to lie about it to the people, then surely the hope of better things was a mere will-o-the-wisp.

Schmitz was convicted on June 13, 1907, and subsequently the supervisors, under pressure of the District Attorney, declared his office vacant, and elected Edward R. Taylor, Dean of the Hastings College of the Law—a branch of the State University—to fill the vacancy. The supervisors then resigned one by one, the vacancy in each case being filled by an appointee of the Mayor.

This extraordinary proceeding, made possible by the wise provisions of the city charter, and which changed the entire executive and legislative personnel of the city government, was ratified by the people in the election in the following November. In that campaign the mayor and practically all the supervisors were elected with large pluralities to the offices to which they had been indirectly appointed by the District Attorney. This election was the more significant of the attitude of the mass of the people on the prosecution of the bribers, as the new board of police commissioners had given orders to the police to assist the District Attorney; and the supervisors had voted large sums for the expenses necessary to carry on his work.

THE RIGHT OF CITIZENS NOT HOLDING OFFICE TO CONTRIBUTE ASSISTANCE IN THE PROSECUTION OF CRIME.

The public service corporations of San Francisco have, for a long time, furnished the state with special prosecutors in criminal cases where their interests have been concerned. Prior to and during the period of the graft prosecutions, the following attorneys assisted in prosecuting various crimes on behalf of the corporations set opposite their names:

James F. Sheehan, United Railroads.

Frank P. Kelly, Southern Pacific Company.

J. P. Coghlan, San Francisco Gas and Electric Company.

Twomley and Smith, Pacific States Telephone and Telegraph Company.

When indictments were found against the officers and employees of some of these companies, a great clamor was raised on their behalf that it was an outrage for the District Attorney to accept assistance from Mr. Spreckels and other private citizens.

Mr. Calhoun, the president of the United Railroads, whose attorney Mr. Sheehan had assisted the District Attorney in dozens of criminal cases, addressed a pamphlet to the chairman of this committee, in which he asks, among others, the following question:

"3. Can a private citizen contribute money to help the city's prosecuting officers in the investigation and trial of a criminal charge?"

Dean Wigmore of the Northwestern School of Law, was sent a similar pamphlet and answered the question in the following language:

"Answer: He can; and it is stupid even to put the question. Under the original English jury-system (of which you receive the benefit), and until the last century, the private citizen was usually obliged to pay the prosecuting expenses; for the State did not, and crime went unpunished otherwise. If nowadays, in any community, crime is again likely to go unpunished without the help of private citizens, there is no reason why we should not revert to the old system. As for Mr. Spreckels (the private citizen here named by you), his name should be held in honor, and will ever be, as against anything your pamphlet can say. As for Mr. Heney and his receipt of $47,500 officially and large sums of money additionally from Mr. Spreckels, it may be presumed that he spent most of it on trial expenses, and did not keep it as a personal reward. But even if he did so keep it, let me register the view that he is welcome to all this—and to more—if anybody

"will give it and that no money compensation is too high for such rare courage."

We feel we can add nothing to Mr. Wigmore's reply, save the suggestion the practice had the long standing precedent of Mr. Calhoun's own Company.

Of course, if the purpose of assisting the Government is primarily to enmesh in the toils of the law entirely innocent persons for the purpose of private malice, or to assist in confiscation of their properties, the act becomes improper. This is equally true, whether the prosecutions are initiated and carried on by private persons, or public officials.

The fact that Mr. Spreckels and Mr. Phelan were among the organizers of a corporation to establish a railway system in San Francisco, has been seized upon as evidence of a plot against the United Railroads. The Articles of Incorporation of this new company were filed on April 17, 1906, several months after the coterie of men who started to investigate the Schmitz-Ruef regime had come together.

The By-Laws of the Company provided for the establishment of the underground system, and for a sale of the road to the city for a reasonable price, over and above cost and risk. The date of filing their Articles is significant, as it is within a month after Mr. Calhoun had broken off with the Committee of Improvement and Adornment, and had abandoned a tentative agreement to change his roads on Sutter and Market streets to the underground system. During this period, these gentlemen took the necessary steps to organize their company, with the avowed purpose of proving the untruth of Mr. Calhoun's assertion that an underground system could not be run profitably on an honest capitalization.

The fact that every effort had been used to persuade Mr. Calhoun to adopt the underground system in negotiations extending over weeks of time; that the proposed road was to use this system as a demonstration of its feasibility; that they contemplated a sale to the municipality at a reasonable figure; that they lent the same assistance to the indictment and prosecution of officers and employees of nearly every other quasi-public corporation in the city; and, above all, that they never attempted to attack the franchises of the United Railroads; satisfies your committee that the ruin or embarrassment of that company played no part in the plans of the men contributing to the funds of the prosecution.

No doubt the exposure of the corruption during Mr. Calhoun's management has made the renewal of the franchises of the United Railroads very unlikely. If the value of the stocks of the company rests on the hope of renewal, it will unquestionably depreciate. It is absurd to say, however, that it is the exposure of corruption and not the corruption itself which causes this depreciation. To do so is to assert that business organizations may properly be capitalized on the theory that our government is too weak even to discover that crime is being committed.

THE OLIVER GRAND JURY AND THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE PROSECUTIONS.

It was not until October, 1906, that sufficient evidence had been unearthed regarding the complicity of Ruef and the Mayor in the French restaurant extortion to warrant the government taking the open in a general investigation into the alleged criminality of other municipal office holders. District Attorney Langdon appointed Mr. Heney assistant district attorney on October 22d, and announced that Mr. Rudolph Spreckels had already furnished and would continue to furnish the funds necessary to engage the detectives to carry on the work.

Mayor Schmitz was at this time traveling in Europe. Three days after the appointment of Heney and the announcement of the intended investigation of the supervisors, Gallagher, the president of the Board and acting Mayor, attempted to remove Langdon from the District Attorneyship on the ground that he had been neglecting the duties of his office in his campaign for the governorship, and appointed Ruef to fill the vacancy. The Mayor's power of removal was limited to the purely municipal officers. As the District Attorney represented the people of the state as a whole, the Mayor had no jurisdiction over him, and Judge Seawell of the Superior Court so held in the subsequent proceeding.

The astonishing boldness of the attempt by the acting chief executive of the City to oust the State's prosecutor and to substitute in his place the criminal who had just been announced as the subject of prosecution, shocked the city, preoccupied as it had been with the task of reconstruction, into sober attention. From that time there has been a strong and vigorous body of men standing in unswerving support of the government in its attempts to make impossible the repetition of such conditions. On November 10, 1906, Judge Thomas F. Graham appointed the grand jury, of which B. P. Oliver became the foreman, and which subsequently took its name from him. This jury was made up of the following men:

C. G. Burnett,
Jeremiah Deasy,
Dewey Coffin,
Frank A. Dwyer,
E. J. Gallagher,
James E. Gordon,
Alfred Greenebaum,
Morris A. Levingston,
Rudolph Mohr,
W. P. Redington,
Ansel C. Robinson,
Christian P. Rode,
Mendle Rothenberg,
F. G. Sanborn,
Charles Sonntag,
Herman H. Young,
Wallace G. Wise,
B. P. Oliver.

Much has been said and should be said for the great assistance rendered the people by such men as Heney, Spreckels, Older, Johnson, O'Gara, Phelan, Matt Sullivan, and Burns, in rescuing the city government from the band of thieves into whose hands it had fallen, but each of these has had, with the trials and stress of the struggle, that honor and recognition—in this case nation wide—always bestowed upon strong men who become the people's recognized leaders in time of public danger.

The members of the Oliver Grand Jury knew that no such distinction awaited the performance of their duty. They were business and professional men of good standing, none of exceptional fortune, most of them not even of the class known in American parlance as men of independent means. They, however, had growing businesses to endanger, credit at their bankers to be lost, powerful commercial antagonists to meet in the fierce competition of American economic life. The merchants of the jury knew that the institutions they attacked involved the men who controlled the transportation of their goods, the credits with which they purchased them, and who could deprive them of part of the market in which they were sold. Professional men realized that to offend the financial and social powers whose participancy in the crimes they had unearthed, meant loss of prestige and serious inroads on their clientele. Five of the jurymen were of the same race and religion as Abraham Ruef, while many other denominations were represented both on the jury and among the indicted. Harder to face, for some at least, was the severance of long-standing friendships, business and social, with the men against whom they ultimately found their indictments, and the social ostracism from certain circles, not only for themselves, but also for their wives and children.

The elder jurymen could well remember the day in California when the assassin's bullet paid the debt that the gambler or other profit taker from vice thought he owed to those who exposed his wrong doing. In the light of that history they could have anticipated the bold but carefully planned violence which, in the succeeding year, brought the dynamiting of the home of Gallagher, chief witness for the government, when it contained half a dozen men, women and children; the kidnaping of Editor Older; the attempted kidnaping of Lonergan; the equally bold and perhaps more subtly induced shooting of Heney; and the mysterious death of his would-be murderer before the government had had a chance to complete its examination as to his motives or the possible instigators of his crime.

When the Pacific Coast compiles its records of civic patriotism, the names of these men should not be forgotten. At no time in the history of California was her form of government put to a severer test than when her people, through their District Attorney, administered the Grand Juror's oath to each member of that body and called upon him to "diligently inquire into, and true presentment make, of all public offenses against the people of this state committed, or triable within this county of which you shall have or can obtain legal evidence * * *" and to "present no person through malice, hatred or ill will, nor leave any unpresented through fear, favor or affection, or for any reward or the promise thereof." Their response vindicated the State's claim to some share at least in the heritage of the institutions of her Anglo-Saxon ancestors.

THE ELECTION OF DISTRICT ATTORNEY LANGDON IN THE FALL OF 1907—THE DISTORTIONS OF THE PRESS AND THE METHOD USED BY HENEY AND OTHER SPEAKERS TO COUNTERACT THEM.

The campaign for District Attorney developed a strong opposition from the combination of interests which the District Attorney and his assistants had been prosecuting. The opposition centered around Patrick Calhoun, a man of pleasing and forceful personality, who had been an operator in railroad franchises of not untroubled record in other American cities. Mr. Calhoun had attracted some suspicion when, in March before the fire, he broke off the United Railroads negotiations with the Adornment Committee for electrifying his system and announced that he proposed to deal with the "people" through the notorious Ruef board. Later this suspicion was deepened by an extraordinary interview with Mr. Calhoun, published in the San Francisco "Examiner" March 20th, 1907, and in other papers, in response to a suggestion that he had bribed Schmitz in the trolley matter.

"Let me say that there is not a syllable of truth in that charge," said Mr. Calhoun. "I don't mind saying that I have a warm personal regard for Mayor Schmitz and when he was in New York I invited him to my house. Anyone who knows me knows that if I had bribed him I would not have invited him to my house."

Such a statement, coming after Schmitz's indictment for extortion from the French restaurant proprietors, the crime of a parasite on a parasite on a vice which was undermining the Home, necessarily awakened further unfavorable comment from self-respecting citizens. This was the more so as Mr. Calhoun, who showed himself most willing to reach the public through the press, did not deny its authenticity.

In May, 1907, at about the time it became apparent that certain officials and agents of the United Railroads were to be indicted, a general strike was declared on all their roads. Opinion is still divided as to the responsibility for this reopening of the conflict between labor and capital, but it happened most opportunely for the indicted men.

We have before spoken of the class alignment arising out of the violence of the teamsters' strike in the last administration of Mayor Phelan, and how it drove into the capitalistic camp many peace-loving citizens who otherwise would have remained neutral in the class encounter. The phenomenon was repeated. Violence was resorted to, though in this case the police did not even make a pretense of protecting the cars from a mob of several thousand people. We have seen that the so-called labor administration had already sold itself to the agents of the railroad company, and it is apparent that if it had wanted police protection it could probably have gotten it. The cars were manned with a small force of detectives hired by Mr. Calhoun from the Thiele Detective Agency, of St. Louis, brave and reckless young men who put up a plucky fight against the apparently overwhelming odds for nearly an hour, when they were finally rescued. The public, sorely strained by the trials of the preceding year, both natural and political, and craving peace, welcomed the show of force. Many timid people gave Mr. Calhoun the credit for the Thiele boys' bravery and on the successful disruption of the carmen's union, as the result of the strike, he became for them the heroic deliverer of a stricken city.

In the course of the ensuing campaign, Mr. Calhoun's popularity was used against the District Attorney in a very subtle way. With those friendly to him it was urged that he should not be prosecuted, because of the services he had rendered in behalf of law and order. With the friends of the government it was urged that Langdon and Heney did not dare try Calhoun, despite the fact that the crime of which he was accused would destroy the very foundation of the government, because of his popularity.

In the heat of the campaign Mr. Heney, in very emphatic language, announced the intention of the government to press the Calhoun indictment to the bitter end. Such a statement made on the stump concerning an indictment appears a violation of the proprieties of the office of the District Attorney, and would seem to be justified only by extraordinary circumstances. The District Attorney claims that the circumstances did require it, that the public were being deceived by the accounts of the trials given in certain of the daily papers, and that only by explaining his intentions to the people directly could the government retain their support.

The accounts of the trial given in the San Francisco Morning Chronicle were certainly not ingenuous statements of what occurred in the court room. They omitted many occurrences that seemed favorable to the District Attorney's office, while they exploited the slightest misfortune or mistake in the daily feud between counsel which could bring discredit on the government.

It was not, however, until some months later, that the Chronicle admitted the sale of its columns for accounts of proceedings in courts of justice to be written up to suit the taste of the purchaser.

This admission arose in connection with the case of Baron vs. Woodruff, where Mr. Woodruff, a contractor, was sued for exceeding an alleged agreed maximum of cost in the erection of a building. The suit apparently hurt Mr. Woodruff in his business and he was anxious for vindication by the courts. He demurred to the complaint on certain formal grounds and the court sustained the demurrer granting leave to amend. This was purely a technical proceeding, and in no way affected the merits of the controversy.

The decision on the law point was written up, however, as if the merits of the facts had been gone into, and Mrs. Baron was represented as having been adjudged by the court as entirely in the wrong. The body of the account was printed in the same type as the other news columns, the head lines of all the news articles on the page differing each from the other. Suit was evidently threatened by Mrs. Baron's counsel, for in the next morning's edition the paper admitted that the article complained of had been written by Mr. Woodruff's attorney, and paid for at advertising rates.

It would seem that the same business instinct which, for a price, will give false accounts of court proceedings comparatively as unimportant as the Baron case, might have taken pay for its perversion of the accounts of what actually occurred in the court room in the trials of those indicted for bribes yielding millions to the bribers. Such being the case, it would further seem that the District Attorney, seeking re-election, was justified in attempting to counteract by direct appeal to the people the false impressions produced by such means. The necessity for such appeal arises from an infirmity of the system which elects the District Attorney. The "people" are his clients, and he is put in a position where he must answer their queries as to his conduct of the cases prosecuted in their name. It is absurd and unjust to an innocent man accused of crime, but equally absurd and unjust to the people, if venal misrepresentation by the press cannot be explained away.

Mr. Langdon was elected with a considerable plurality over the Labor candidate, Mr. McGowan, who received, as Schmitz had received two years before, the support of all the graft sympathizers, including many persons of the most pronounced capitalist affiliation.

THE CRIMES COMMITTED TO DEFEAT THE GOVERNMENT IN THE PROSECUTIONS.

The crime of bribery strikes at the foundation of democratic government. Insofar as it seeks to establish an inner oligarchy controlling governmental functions, it amounts to treason, and treason in its most insidious and dangerous form. It is not surprising that from among those who had thus combined to take the life of the government itself, there should be those who would commit other crimes to prevent conviction for the first. Nor is it surprising if they weighed lightly human lives standing in the way of their freedom or of the "system" they hoped to substitute for the government.

The Dynamiting of the Home of Gallagher.

We have before shown that James L. Gallagher, the chairman of the board of supervisors, was a necessary link in the chain of evidence from the corporations to the various bribed supervisors. At about half past seven in the evening of the 29th of April, 1908, Peter Claudianes exploded a powerful dynamite bomb under Gallagher's home in Alameda. At this time there were in the house, beside Mr. and Mrs. Gallagher, Mr. and Mrs. Schenck, their two daughters, and a son, and a gentleman calling on the ladies. The explosion wrecked one side of the house, injuring the room upstairs in which were Mr. and Mrs. Gallagher, both of whom escaped unhurt. Mr. Schenck had been late to dinner and this delay had kept the rest of the family and their guest in another portion of the house, and they escaped also.

There was an attempt made by the newspapers opposing the government in the prosecution to create an impression that Gallagher had procured the blowing up of his own house to enlist sympathy. This suggestion was silenced by the apprehension of the two Claudianes brothers; the confession of one of them that they had been paid to kill Gallagher by Felix Paudivar, an employee of the United Railroads and a political friend of Ruef's, who had disappeared shortly after the explosion; the conviction of Peter Claudianes and his sentence to life imprisonment.

The Kidnaping of Fremont Older.

The "Evening Bulletin" continued the same vigorous support of the prosecution as it showed in its earlier attacks on the Ruef-Schmitz regime. Mr. Fremont Older, as the manager, was primarily responsible for the execution of this policy and he gave to it the whole force of his energetic personality. In the course of publishing the news of the prosecution, the paper printed a story which showed one of the detectives in the employ of the United Railroads to have been in a compromising position. There was another detective in their employ of the same name, but with different initials, and through an error the wrong name was printed. It was clearly a libel, and the paper at once made amends, in so far as it could, by publication of the truth and explanation of the mistake.

The libelled man had Mr. Older indicted in Los Angeles, over four hundred miles from San Francisco, and warrants issued for his arrest to deputies who were the detective's personal friends. These men came to San Francisco and, late in the afternoon of September 27, 1907, Mr. Older was lured by a false telephone message to a quiet street, where he was seized and hurried into an automobile. The law permits a person so apprehended to be taken before a judge in his own county to be admitted to bail. This Mr. Older demanded. His demand was refused, and he was carried, by a roundabout route of many miles to a station on the railway to Los Angeles, where the whole party boarded a train for that destination. Fortunately Mr. Older made no attempt to escape, although the offense of abduction began as soon as he was refused the right to go before a judge, and no violence was done to him.

The ruse was discovered before morning, and he was released on an order of Court at Santa Barbara. There was an attorney for the United Railroads and the libelled man in the abducting party.

What the motive for this strange procedure was, other than the hope that Mr. Older might attempt to escape and thus give an excuse for violence, is hard to discover. His admission to bail in San Francisco in no way could have jeopardized the chance of bringing him to trial. The subsequent failure to press the case against him, and its abandonment and dismissal, seem to indicate that the motive for abduction was something entirely disconnected from a desire to secure justice for the libel in a court of law. If it was an attempt to change the policy of the paper, it failed signally.

Bribery of Jurors.

Abraham Ruef pleaded guilty to the first charge against him that was brought to trial. In his second trial, it became apparent to the government that attempts were being made to have improper persons placed upon the jury and to bribe those who were finally empanelled. A. E. S. Blake was subsequently convicted and sentenced for offering a bribe to J. M. Kelly, who was empanelled on that jury. Mr. Kelly had reported this attempt to the District Attorney at once, and assisted in procuring Blake's conviction.

The Shooting of Francis J. Heney, and the Mysterious Death of His Assailant.

Among other persons, concerning whom the government had information that they were attempting to qualify as jurors for improper purposes, was Morris Haas. Haas had been a keeper of a saloon of the lower order, and had been convicted of embezzlement, but had been subsequently pardoned and had no other conviction of crime against him. His name appeared upon the jury list in Ruef's second trial, and the government detectives informed the District Attorney that, although Haas had a wife and family, he was living with another woman, and that his paramour had said that he had boasted he would retrieve his fortunes by selling his vote for Ruef's acquittal. In order to get him off the jury, his conviction for forgery was publicly exposed by Mr. Heney while Haas was sitting in the jury box. As neither Haas' public nor private record seemed to warrant any special leniency, no attempt was made to hide his past career.

At this time the papers opposing the prosecution, particularly the Examiner, Globe and Chronicle, were making savage personal attacks on Mr. Heney. The so-called "Mutt" cartoons of the San Francisco Examiner sought by a broad but clever ridicule to convey the impression that Mr. Heney was a coarse and unprincipled charlatan, and that the entire prosecution was founded in injustice and carried on to satisfy a personal malice. One of these cartoons, which subsequently became notable, depicted him as a bird flying in the air, about to be brought down by a fowler's gun.

Through every channel of personal villification, from armed thugs in the court room to the daily and weekly publications, he was abused and threatened until, to the misinformed, he might well be considered a proper target for personal violence.

It would appear that Haas' mind was of that undeveloped type likely to take seriously these pictorial representations. At any rate, whether through the impressions gained through the press, or the incitement of the same persons who secured the dynamiting of Gallagher's home, or otherwise, Haas nursed his grievance against Mr. Heney until he came to regard his murder as a public benefaction. His plan for killing his victim was not the result of sudden passion, for he subsequently made the significant admission that he had concluded that it was best to postpone his attack until after the election. This meant a delay for a period of many weeks.

On the 13th day of November, 1908, Mr. Heney was conducting the third case against Ruef, when Haas, who had been for a number of days a spectator in the court room, slipped up behind him and fired a pistol bullet into his head, just forward of his right ear. By a chance more miraculous than the escape of the people in Gallagher's house, the bullet passed between his skull and jaw and exhausted its strength in the soft lining at the back of his mouth, finally lodging in the bone of the jaw on the opposite side. No vital organ was touched and, apart from the shock to his nervous system and the loss of hearing in one ear, no permanent injury was inflicted.

Haas was seized and searched by two officers and no other weapon was found on him. The government's detectives put him through a partial examination for the purpose of discovering the instigators of the crime, if there were any. The examination was to have been continued the following day, but he was found dead in his cell, with a pistol bullet through his forehead before the next session.

The weapon used was a small derringer, which might have escaped the search of the officers, and it was also possible that the comparatively slight powder mark around the wound was due to his holding the weapon a long distance from his face or very close to it. Whether he took his own life and, if so, whether he brought in the derringer or had it handed to him in jail, or whether he was killed to prevent his telling of his accomplices, will probably never be known. It is entirely possible that he committed suicide. It is equally possible that the same influence that paid Claudianes to place the bomb to kill Gallagher, was responsible for Haas' death.

The Stealing of the Government's Papers and Secret Information.

Not only did the government have to contend against the bribing of jurors and the attempted murder of its witnesses and officers, but also against the betrayal of its secret information, thus keeping its enemies advised as to its intended movements. From the month of July, 1907, to August, 1908, copies of the reports of the government's detectives were nightly taken and furnished one of the attorneys for the United Railroads. In most cases the original reports were copied and the transcriptions furnished, in some the original itself was taken.

On the discovery of these thefts, the government obtained warrants and searched the offices of the United Railroads. Over seven hundred copies of the reports and various other documents belonging to the government were found on the premises.

THE SAN FRANCISCO POLICE DEPARTMENT.

The total number of crimes for which indictments were found by the Oliver Grand Jury was one hundred and seventy-five, participated in by nearly forty persons, representing practically every walk in life. Not one of them was unearthed by the Police Department of San Francisco, and the Chief of Police himself was indicted for perjury before the Grand Jury and for conspiring to prevent the detection of crime. It is apparent that such a department must have been rotten to the core.

As not a single officer or detective, commissioned or otherwise, has been removed for concealing or failing to discover any of the crimes, and as there have been practically no resignations from the department, it is apparent that its personnel is still of the same character. It would appear that another Schmitz-Ruef administration would find the same organized support standing ready to do its bidding.

The clearing up of the department is largely a matter of courage on the part of the Board of Police Commissioners, as the trial and removal of an officer for grafting or incompetence does not involve any of the technicalities of procedure and proof which have grown up around criminal prosecutions. It is not even necessary to show that the accused officer connived at crime. It is enough to warrant his removal for incompetence, if an illicit enterprise is found in his jurisdiction, or if there are strong indications that a crime may have been committed there, and he has failed to discover and report the facts.

The present commission has not permitted the open continuance of some of the more flagrant evils of the old system. It is still licensing the attractive and alluring debauchery of the French restaurants, and has not made any attempt to remove the men who gathered or permitted the gathering of the tribute of vice and crime for the support of the former administration.

THE ELECTION OF THE FALL OF 1909.

Mr. Heney accepted the nomination of the Democratic party, and of the Good Government League, for the District Attorneyship, to succeed Mr. Langdon. He was opposed by Mr. Charles Fickert, who received the Union Labor and Republican nominations. Mr. Fickert was elected, receiving 36,192 votes to Mr. Heney's 26,075.

In the course of the campaign, the old-standing class antagonism was made an issue. The cry to "vote a straight Labor ticket and be true to the cause" gave a considerable Labor vote to Mr. Fickert, and his nomination by the Republican party added a similar partisan support. This, combined with the tenderloin and saloon element, brought the Fickert vote up to not less than 25,000. The balance of his supporters was made up of those who were in sympathy with the doctrine of a wide open town and its accompanying loose morals, both in its political and commercial life, and those who were honestly convinced that the government was not sincere in its efforts and who failed to realize the tremendous obstacles that had been placed in its way by the beneficiaries of the graft system. The latter class of Fickert's votes were the direct product of the three years of villification and abuse to which certain of the daily papers and nearly all the weekly papers had subjected Mr. Langdon, Mr. Heney, Mr. Burns, and Mr. Spreckels.

Some of Mr. Heney's speeches lent color to the claim that he was attempting to try the accused man at the bar of public opinion rather than in the courts of justice, and he permitted himself to be drawn into personalities from which a calmer judgment would have saved him. The bulk of well-intentioned citizens understood the strain to which the three years of most bitter and arduous courtroom service, coupled with the shock of his shooting, had subjected him and judged in their true light his statements made in the heat of the campaign. However, the failure to make clear that it was the People of the State of California who had been offended by the bribes, and that it was the People who were prosecuting the cases, and that the District Attorney was merely the agent of the community, as a political entity, lost Mr. Heney many votes. Your committee see no reason to question the continuance of the sincerity of the prosecution, and has the highest appreciation of Mr. Heney's splendid services and of the results accomplished, not only in unmasking the real forces behind the corruption in San Francisco, but in overthrowing the Ruef-Schmitz administration; nevertheless, it cannot pass by the campaign of 1909 without pointing out what, in our opinion, was its chief weakness.

On the other hand we cannot but feel that had the ballot been free of the straight-ticket device, and the people been voting directly on the qualifications of the candidates for their respective positions, the vote would have been very different. The number of persons who will accept a party label as a substitute for their own conviction regarding the candidate's merits, is still very large. No better evidence of this is needed than the bitter opposition of the machine politicians to any attempt to abolish the "party circle" on the ballot.

Nothing could be more illogical than the determination of the qualifications of the man who is to administer the law impartially, by his allegiance to a partizan organization. The same is true of all the officers of a municipality, but it applies the more forcibly to the Police Judges and the District Attorney who exercise judicial or quasi-judicial functions. Our laws have already recognized the want of logic in partizan elections of municipal officers, and Los Angeles, Fresno, Alameda and other cities now elect their city officers on ballots which simply show the names of the candidates under the office to be filled, without party or any other designation.

CONCLUSION AND RECOMMENDATIONS.

The foregoing is but a partial review of some of the factors which tend to maintain the corrupt conditions in this municipality. Whatever advantages a contemporaneous record may have must be taken along with the disadvantages arising from the want of historical perspective. It is little more than a series of findings on the more important matters of fact which have been brought to our attention in the fourteen months over which our sessions have extended.

While the vista of time is necessary to view these in their just proportions and relationship, we feel that there are some remedies which may help protect the community till a maturer and more vigorous public sentiment itself keeps in suppression the evil tendencies and influences we have found to exist.

Pursuant to the request in your Honor's commission to us, we submit the following recommendations:

(1) Non-Partizan Municipal Elections.

The charter should be so amended as to prohibit partizan nominations for election to municipal offices, and the ballot, when printed, should show nothing more than the name and the office of the candidate.

(2) A Judicial Tribunal for the Determination of Charges for Public Utilities.

A separate tribunal of permanent character should be established for the judicial determination of the rates and charges for public utilities.

(3) Further Punishment for Bribery.

The laws creating the crime of bribery should be so amended as to provide for the punishment of corporations in their corporate capacity. Very heavy fines should be imposed, and the forfeiture to the state or city of prior acquired franchises should be made a part of the punishment.

(4) Cancellation of Franchises Procured by Fraud.

Laws should be enacted for the cancellation of franchises procured by fraud or crime of the owners of the franchises, or of their predecessors in interest. These laws should be of a civil nature, cognizable in a court of equity, so that the extreme technicality of our criminal procedure will not embarrass their enforcement. The Mayor and the District Attorney, each on his own motion, should have the right to initiate such proceedings in the name of the municipality upon which the fraud has been committed. Their power should be concurrent with that of the state to take similar action in quo warranto proceedings.

(5) Corporations Should Be Compelled to Give Evidence Against Themselves.

The law of evidence in criminal cases should be so amended that a corporation accused of crime cannot claim immunity from producing or giving evidence against itself, and the testimony of its officers, and all its documents should be admissible in criminal proceedings against it. As a corporation can commit a crime only through an officer or an employee, in a prosecution for such crime the officer or employee should not be permitted to remain mute on the ground that his testimony would tend to incriminate him.

(6) Accounts of Quasi-Public Corporations.

Laws should be enacted requiring all quasi-public corporations to keep their books in collaboration with the communities they serve, and according to a system prescribed by law.

(7) Making the Sale of News Columns a Crime.

Laws should be enacted making it a crime for any newspaper to publish as news any matters for which compensation is directly or indirectly paid, or agreed to be paid, unless the fact that such compensation has been paid or agreed to be paid is indicated by some plainly distinguishing mark next the news so printed. The jury or judge should be given liberal power of inferring complicity from considerations indirectly given. A person paying such compensation should be permitted to recover the consideration given by him, and immunity granted him, if he disclose the crime. A part of the punishment should consist in forbidding the publication of the paper for a period fixed by the judge.

(8) The School System.

The trial of Mr. Calhoun disclosed a considerable number of citizens who, when examined under oath as to their qualifications for jury service, complacently declared that they would not convict a man for bribery, however convincing the evidence, if, since his crime, he has successfully broken a strike which was threatening his investments. A system of public education which produces such men must be radically defective in both its ethical and political teaching. It is our belief that no child should be permitted to leave the grammar school until he has had thoroughly instilled into him a strong sense of his obligation to the state to set aside all prejudice or private interest and act as jurymen in any case in which he may be summoned. He should be taught that this obligation is sacred, that its performance is the highest kind of public service, outranking the mere physical courage and devotion of a soldier.

It is our opinion that the schools have not kept pace in their ethical instruction with the many complex changes in our commercial organization, due to the universal conduct of business through corporations. Every child should be taught that in all probability he will, for a very large period of his life, be an agent for some corporation. He should be taught the elemental facts concerning the workings of the corporate organization, and particularly the location of the immediate responsibility for any wrong doing with the directors who elect the manager, and the ultimate responsibility of the stockholders who, in turn, elect the directors. He should be taught that if a disclosure of any impropriety in the relations of the corporation to the state does not receive the attention of the directors, he can make a direct appeal to the stockholders through the agency of the press.

Above all, he should be taught that the corporation is a mere creature of the state, and that it is as much the duty of the citizen to cry "Stop thief" to its attempt to steal a public franchise, as it is to raise the cry when it discovers the treasurer, or any other official, robbing the public of its coin.

No child should be permitted to leave the grammar school without a keen appreciation of the rights of every citizen to good service from public service corporations. He should be instructed what he is to expect from transportation, water, gas, electric, telephone and telegraph companies, and how to make effective his complaint if he does not receive his just due.

Our high schools should deal more specifically with the problems of corporate organization and each year give their quota of trained minds to cope with the sophistries offered to justify fictitious valuations, inadequate service, or criminal relations with public officials who have the gifts of franchises.

If it be true, as has been suggested, that the overwhelming preponderance of women among our teachers makes such an addition to the curriculum impracticable, then we submit that the matters are of such importance as to warrant the employment of a sufficient number of male teachers of political and business ethics. We do not believe, however, that these problems present any difficulties to the intelligence of women which a proper normal school training cannot overcome.

The struggle against greed and social injustice will not be ended with our generation. Those who come after must continue the battle for the preservation of sane democratic government, and the "vigilance" which is the price of our liberty must be intelligent and organized as well as eternal.

San Francisco, January 5, 1910.

William Denman, Esq.,

Chairman of the Committee on Investigation Into Causes of Municipal Corruption in San Francisco:

Dear Mr. Denman:

I have just gone over the report of our committee and wish to assure you of my hearty approval of the recommendations made at the end thereof.

It is with regret that, on account of my sickness and absence from many of our meetings, I am unable to sign the findings. This is not because I disagree with any of them, but because I am unable to disagree or agree with several, on account of my failure to hear the evidence on which they rest.

You do not need to be assured that, as far as my connection with the committee is concerned, I have never felt out of harmony with the ideals and aims of my confreres, nor had any doubt as to the integrity and sincerity of their purpose.

Yours sincerely,

D. O. CROWLEY.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Phil Stanton Out For Governorship

The development of the week, in the gubernatorial situation, is the very active campaign launched in behalf of Speaker Phil Stanton of Los Angeles. Stanton has not yet announced his candidacy, and says he will not unless it is backed by an overwhelming demand from the "best people" of Los Angeles. His friends, however, evidently with his consent, are doing their best to manufacture that demand and are apparently succeeding in some quarters. They are assuming, off-hand, the support of the Los Angeles "regulars," and their main effort is to secure the indorsement of some of the leading reformers. They claim to have "lined up" Assemblyman Cogswell and Senator Bell, but this is also denied. The "Hughes-Bulla crowd" are holding off, claiming that Stanton is "machine"—which is, in fact, not seriously denied, though Stanton claims he would not be a purely machine candidate. His supporters are pointing to his record on the direct primary and the race-track bill, to show his independence. They tell the story that after his election as speaker, representatives of the race track approached him and claimed that "we" contributed largely to his election, and should be remembered in the make-up of the Committee on Public Morals. Stanton, it is said, replied that he had not known of their support, but if they claimed any consideration by reason of it he would cheerfully resign his speakership, and then go before the legislature as a candidate for re-election on that issue. Of course the bluff worked, and the race-track men put in no further claims. As a matter of fact, they, as race-track men, had not particularly supported Stanton for speaker, nor been in a position to do him much good if they had. The "we" to which they referred was the railroad machine, with which they not unjustifiably identified themselves. Stanton did receive the support of that machine, for speaker; he did refuse to state, to reform members of the legislature who made that the condition of their support, that he would refrain from organizing the legislature in the interest of the Southern Pacific Political Bureau, and he did for the most part organize the legislature in that interest. The Committee on Public Morals was a creditable, if spectacular, exception. That committee has usually been a joke. Its members have been selected for their notorious public immorals. Stanton established a welcome departure from this precedent. Also, being an intelligent man, he was a pleasing contrast with his "muddle-headed" predecessor, "Bob" Beardslee, of Stockton. He rendered some good service in the legislature, and bore the main brunt of holding down the hot-heads, on the Japanese question. That fact, however, will hardly gain him votes in San Francisco.

Judge James for Supreme Bench?

Active efforts are also reported from Los Angeles to promote the candidacy of Judge James for the supreme bench, to succeed Harry Melvin. Judge James was the Los Angeles candidate before the last Republican convention, and some of the reform forces, all their own candidates having been "pulled down" before the convention, were prepared to support him, as the less evil. But the very mover of Judge James' nomination, by a subsequent arrangement, arose and seconded the nomination of Melvin. The withdrawal of James created obligations to him, by the machine, which were probably expressly stipulated at the time, and are at any rate well understood. Judge James will probably have the machine support, at least in the south. He is a personally clean man, but affiliated with the Walter Parker end of things in Los Angeles.

Judge Wilbur Also Mentioned

A possible candidate from Southern California for the supreme bench is Judge Curtis D. Wilbur, the "Ben Lindsey" of Los Angeles. Judge Wilbur is deservedly popular, his political affiliations are clean, and he has rendered invaluable services to the cause of criminal reform by his work in the juvenile court.

Many Possibilities, Few Candidates

On the Lincoln-Roosevelt side, possibilities for governor are many but candidates are few. It is the weakness as well as the strength of reformers that they do not personally want office. Some of them must run, but these will probably have to be dragged out by the ears, by the others. In this campaign they represent a cause, not a candidate, but it becomes imperative that they have a candidate who will unambiguously represent their cause, and who will have the personality to strengthen that cause.

A Commanding Figure—Heney

A serious criticism of the reform organization has been its lack of a "commanding figure." In one case, at least, that charge is not true. Francis J. Heney is a "commanding figure" if anybody is. The present probabilities are that he will not be a candidate for governor, but there are a thousand reasons why he ought to be. No other man so well fills, in the popular conception, the full measure of present-day reform.

Wane of Reform In Sacramento

In Sacramento Mayor White went out of office and Mayor Beard went in with the coming of the new year, and the occurrence has led to some discussion of the proverbially short life of reform administrations, it being a sort of tradition with the politicians that reform mayors do not succeed themselves. It is as true as most traditions, which means that it admits of a considerable number of exceptions but still contains an element of truth. The easiest and most satisfactory way to explain it is by saying that an American city only elects a distinctively reform mayor or council when there has been an exceptional awakening of the civic conscience, and that since it is unnatural for that conscience to remain on the rack for more than two years at a time, it is the most natural thing in the world that at the end of two years things should slip back to pretty near where they were before. But they never do get quite back to where they were before if it has been a sensible and effective reform administration; some part of the reform effected is bound to stick and the succeeding administration governs itself accordingly. That it will be so in Sacramento is universally believed, for it is generally conceded that the second Beard administration will be different to quite an extent from that which prevailed from 1906 to 1908.

Combined Iniquities Too Much for White

In the Sacramento instance it was not a case of a reform mayor trying to succeed himself and failing of re-election, for Mayor White did not run again; he refused to do so although pressed by many elements in the Republican party to be the candidate. But it is said in Sacramento that one of the main reasons why he would not run was that he felt that in the conscientious discharge of his duty he had given offense to certain elements which had supported him before and would not have been likely to support him this time; in other words, the mayor had measured his own strength before the voters and had decided that it was not such as would justify him in making the race. Instead of running himself he persuaded the Republicans to nominate for mayor the man who had been chief of police for two years, who had given general satisfaction in that office and who appeared to be particularly acceptable to the politicians in the party. It was a move of policy, and, as it turned out, not a fortunate one, because the nominee's popularity did not prove great enough to carry him through, and undoubtedly many stable citizens took the view that the right man for chief of police may not be the right man for mayor. However, the more immediate cause of the candidate's defeat was the usual combination of the saloons, the gamblers and the Southern Pacific company, which in Sacramento is in force in about three out of four city elections, and which is irresistible except under extraordinary circumstances. This does not necessarily mean that Mayor Beard will carry out the wishes of these three elements, although they assumed that he would; they already begin to fear that they have deceived themselves and that the new mayor really meant something when he said that he would stand for a clean city, albeit they thought he intended nothing more than empty talk. It is a possibility that Mayor Beard will give an administration so clean and decent that at the end of two years he will find it as difficult to be re-elected as Mayor White believed it would be for him. That would be the highest compliment he could pay himself.

San Jose's Moral Spring Cleaning

In San Jose, meanwhile, a city administration has been making a reputation for itself after another fashion. There conditions have arrived at the grand jury stage, and in a report recently put out by the inquisitorial body the immorality was widely advertised to the world. As the grand jury said, it was not a pleasant task to publish that vice has increased to an extent to shock the moral part of the community, but if it was a fact, the jury's duty was to say so and to hold responsible the administration which has done nothing to prevent these conditions from obtaining. The Garden City is now reaping the fruits of the disorganization and demoralization of the police force which followed the election of Mayor Davidson. San Jose ought to be ready for a step forward when the time comes for the next election; a good many voters have had a chance to pay off spites and revenges; a lot of politics of a discreditable kind has been done; class prejudice in politics has had an inning; in short, the city has had its fling, and, like a not wholly bad man who has been upon a spree, should be ready for good behavior. This is another illustration of the swing of the pendulum of reform.

Professor Moore's Earned Advancement

The resignation of City Superintendent of Schools E. C. Moore of Los Angeles to fill the newly established professorship of education in Yale, though a loss to the California city, is satisfactory in the sense that it is a signal rebuke to one of the most malicious and vindictive attempts to degrade a faithful public servant which has been known. The California Weekly has already told how Professor Moore incurred the displeasure of the editor of the Los Angeles Times, Harrison Gray Otis, by refusing to print in a publication issued in the interest of the schools one of Otis' attacks on labor unions, and also how from that time forth the newspaper, with studied malignity, followed the educator's footsteps and misrepresented his acts, neglecting no opportunity to injure him so far as it could. When this process of getting revenge promised to be too slow, the paper began to strike at the schools themselves and finally opposed a needed issue of bonds for school purposes, which in a city so devoted to the cause of public education as is Los Angeles is a civic crime of particular gravity. It was repudiated by the voters, who carried the bonds. And now comes Yale University and honors in a signal manner the educator whom the Los Angeles Times has been bespattering so freely with its mud. It has been one of the most discreditable journalistic incidents of recent years.

be considering seriously the proposal to deny them all consideration in the distribution of patronage—in other words, not to accept any advice from them regarding the making of appointments. In the same dispatch it is stated that the Republican Congressional Committee is exerting its influence in certain districts to prevent the renomination of "insurgent" members of the house. These flying rumors can be largely discounted without much fear of believing too little, for it is unlikely that President Taft and his close advisers desire to precipitate the conflict. No doubt Joe Cannon would do so if he could, but Cannon, so lately objected to by the President on principle, cannot even yet be regarded as one of his intimate advisers. In this matter the mass of party voters will be disposed to take reasonable views; if any so-called insurgents have gone to the point of aspersing the motives of President Taft, the public would hardly expect that such members should be given much consideration at the White House, but that any Republican senator or congressman should be read out of the party because he entertains conscientious views on tariff or on the organization of the house different from those of the majority is not to be thought of. To undertake to establish "discipline" on those lines would be simple party suicide. It is going to require all the harmony which the Republicans can muster to carry the congressional elections this fall.

New Charters for Everybody If the present year does not see the greatest amount of city charter making which has been witnessed for a decade, it will be something strange. With the exception of San Francisco, there is hardly a town of importance which does not contemplate either a complete new charter or extensive amendments. Mayor Alexander of Los Angeles signalized his inauguration the other day by calling the charter of that city antiquated and demanding a new one. If frequent and extensive amendment can make a near new charter, Los Angeles ought to have one at this very time, for no session of the legislature goes by nowadays without the ratification of a few charter patches for that city. In 1905 there were some thirty pages of amendments, and again in 1907 and 1909 the revamping went on in something like the same proportions. But Mayor Alexander says the slate must be wiped off and a new start made, and he is very apt to have his way. In Oakland the mayor and councilmen stand pledged to the making of a new charter. So, too, in Sacramento, the new mayor, who was inaugurated this week, made new charter the burden of his song. These are only a few of the towns which are in line for new charters, and in most cases the rush is to adopt the commission plan of government—an idea which is spreading quicker and faster than any other of recent years.

New Deputy for Anderson Bank Superintendent Anderson, who has kept the politicians guessing to know whom he would appoint to the post of chief deputy to succeed Ewing—quite as lively guessing, by the way, as they indulged in regarding the real reasons why Ewing resigned—has settled that question by appointing another Los Angeles man, General Robert Wankowski. There is no question that Wankowski has the qualifications required by the law, since he has been a practical banker quite a number of years, and if a politician, he is not known to be an offensive one. A number of Superintendent Anderson's appointments have been open to the charge of being more political than is for the good of the service, and therefore it is fortunate that the chief deputy is to be a man who really knows about banking. But Wankowski is credited with the statement that he expects ultimately to become the head of a southern branch of the commission with his office in Los Angeles, and if this is authorized, he cannot, after all, continue to be the chief office assistant. There are banks enough in the south to justify a branch, but the expense of the new banking department is running up so much above the cost of the old commission, and so many big banks are nationalizing, that the financial problem of the department promises to become serious.

A FAIR VALUATION OF SPRING VALLEY

WHY THE PRICE FOR PURCHASE SHOULD EXCEED THE VALUATION FOR RATE-MAKING.

By THOMAS E. HAVEN, Assistant City Attorney of San Francisco.

Two objections have been suggested to the proposed purchase by the city and county of San Francisco of the properties of the Spring Valley Water company for the sum of $35,000,000, viz.: first, that the issuance of the necessary bonds for the completion of this purchase, together with the acquisition of the Sierra supply, may exceed the bonding capacity of the city; and, secondly, that the price demanded may be high.

With regard to the first of these objections, the courts have held that a bonded indebtedness is not created until the bonds are actually issued and delivered. The authorization of bonds to the amount of $58,000,000 creates an indebtedness only for such portions of these bonds as are actually issued and sold, and at the times at which they are sold. The acquisition of the properties of the Spring Valley Water company, together with the development of the Lake Eleanor supply will postpone the necessity of the construction of the Hetch Hetchy dam and the development of that valley as a reservoir for many years. There can be no question but that the proposed bonded indebtedness for both systems will be entirely within the bonding capacity of the city when the bonds are needed.

Valuations for Rates and for Purchase.

The second question is more complicated. The water rates which have been fixed by the supervisors each year since 1902 have been based upon appraisements of the value of those properties made by City Engineers C. E. Grunsky, Marsden Manson and Consulting Engineer J. H. Dockweiler. Mr. Grunsky's first appraisement was made in the year 1902, and was resubmitted, with some modifications, in 1903 and 1904. The appraisement of Mr. Dockweiler was made as of January 1, 1904. Mr. Manson was a member of the board of public works at the time Mr. Grunsky's first appraisements were made under the direction of that board. Having become familiar with the values fixed at that time he has used them as a basis for his subsequent appraisements. The values fixed by all of these appraisements have been between $24,000,000 and $25,000,000. These valuations have been accepted by each successive board of supervisors as a basis upon which water rates have been fixed.

In the litigation which has been pending for the past six years, the legal department of the city has insisted upon the reasonableness of such valuations. The submission of the recent offer suggests the question whether city officials who have contended that the property is of the value of approximately $25,000,000, for one purpose, can fairly recommend the purchase of the same properties for $35,000,000, and if so, how is the difference of $10,000,000 accounted for?

The limits of this paper will not permit a discussion of the detailed valuations of the varied properties of the water company. There are, however, certain principles of valuation which apply to a purchase or condemnation of these properties, and which are not applicable to a valuation fixed as a basis of water rates. A consideration of these will account for much of the suggested discrepancy.

Rate Valuation on Property in Use.

The constitution of this state provides that boards of supervisors are obliged to fix annually the rates to be collected for water and other public utilities. The courts have held that in fixing these rates the owners of a water company must be allowed a fair rate of income upon the fair value of the property which is presently used and useful in producing water. It will be seen that this limitation of the property to be valued in establishing rates, at once excludes any property which is not both used and useful in the present production of water. It has further been held that the principle of usefulness implies that the value to be fixed is the value of the property for the purpose for which it is being used. The difference between this value and that for some other purpose was clearly brought out in the rate case of 1908. In that litigation, the Spring Valley Water company contended that the value it was entitled to be allowed for its Lake Merced lands was the value which it might obtain for the same by selling such property in town lots, or otherwise; in other words, what is commonly known as "the real estate value." In reply to that contention, Judge Farrington decided that, if the company chose to use for the purpose of producing water lands which were more valuable for some other purpose, it could not complain if the rate fixing body appraised those lands as a basis for water rates at their value for the purpose for which the company elected to use them. Such values are, therefore, limited to the amount which the property is worth as a producer of water.

The values which have been established by successive boards of supervisors, as a basis for rate fixing, have been controlled by answer to these inquiries:

(1) What properties are now in use by the water company in producing water?

(2) Of such properties, what proportion of them are necessarily so used?

(3) What is the value of such properties so used and useful as water producing agencies?

Such value excludes any property which, in the judgment of the board of supervisors, is not in present or necessary use, and also excludes the consideration of value for any other purpose than for the production of water.

Purchase Value Includes All Values.

It will be seen that this method of valuation is very different from that adopted by the ordinary purchaser of real property. If San Francisco is to acquire the properties of the Spring Valley Water company, there are but two methods by which this can be accomplished, viz.: (first) By purchase at such price at may be fixed by the company for sale, and (secondly) if an agreement cannot be made, by the exercise of the power of eminent domain. If the latter method is adopted, the principle of valuation which is applied by the courts is the same as controls the purchase of real property between any vendor and vendee. In such case all the elements of value are to be considered. As stated by the supreme court of this state, "In arriving at the value of land, all its capabilities, or the uses to which it is adapted, should be taken into consideration. These capabilities are estimated by a purchaser and we cannot see why evidence in regard to them is not admissible. The same considerations are to be regarded as in a sale of lands between private parties." Or, as stated by the supreme court of the United States, "The compensation to the owner is to be estimated by reference to the uses to which the property is suitable, having regard to the existing business or wants of the community, or such as may be reasonably expected in the immediate future." This value to be established in condemnation proceedings is sometimes referred to as "the value for the highest available use."

In estimating the value of its properties for the purpose of sale, the water company has a right to consider all these elements of usefulness for any purpose. If the company and the city cannot agree upon a price, and the city is forced to condemn the property, the court or jury determining the value will be compelled to consider the same elements. Anyone who is familiar with the location of the Lake Merced property, or with the large holdings of the water company scattered over the peninsula from San Francisco to San Jose, will immediately recognize that the value of these properties for their highest available use at present, or in the immediate future, is very different from the value of such portions thereof as were used six years ago for the production of water, fixed upon the principle of their usefulness for that purpose only.

"Real Estate" Value of Holdings.

The present area of the Lake Merced properties of the Spring Valley Water company is 2,857 acres, or nearly three times the area of Golden Gate Park. The city's valuations of this property for rate fixing purposes have varied from $2,030,000 to $2,638,000. In the 1908 litigation one of the most prominent real estate dealers in the city filed an affidavit to the effect that, in normal financial times, the property could be sold as a whole for $4,000,000. Present appraisements of the value of this property, upon a real estate basis, vary from two thousand to three thousand dollars per acre, or from $5,714,000 to $8,571,000.

The same differences between water producing value and present real estate value apply, although in a less degree, to the lands of the water company owned by it in other adjoining counties. The holdings of the water company in these counties, at the present time, are as follows:

San Mateo county.....	28,491.00 acres
Santa Clara county.....	33,403.00 "
Alameda county	27,910.50 "

The total real property owned by the Spring Valley Water company on December 1, 1909, including property in the city of San Francisco, amounts to 83,512.50 acres, of which 38,521.87 acres have been acquired since January 1, 1904, the date of the city's appraisement for rate fixing purposes.

Intangible Values.

The next element of value which must be considered in the case of a purchase or condemnation of these properties, and which has not entered into the appraisements upon which the city has based the water rates, is what is known as "intangible value." Included in this term are the additional values which the water company claims that its properties possess by reason of its franchise, its "going business" or "established business" or "good-will" and the exceptionally favorable physical situation of its properties. It has been claimed in the water rate litigation that a large sum should be added to the value of the physical properties by reason of these intangible elements. The city has never conceded the correctness of these contentions. It is only fair to state, however, that the franchise of the Spring Valley Water company is assessed by the assessor of San Francisco as being of the value of $2,500,000, and that the company has paid taxes upon that assessment for several years. The argument is made if the franchise is valuable as a basis for taxation, it is also valuable as a basis for water rates, and the courts have said that this argument is not without force. It is also true that the greater portion of the available water supply in the vicinity of San Francisco, and the best reservoir sites in the neighborhood are owned by the Spring Valley Water company. The facts that these properties cannot be duplicated and that they have been acquired at different times in pursuance of a definite policy of development, and are now "unified into one interconnected whole," are urged as reasons why they are of greater value than they would be were it not for their unique situation. It is also claimed that the business of an established water company with thousands of customers, drawing their supply through existing connections, is worth a considerable sum by reason of the fact that it is an established business, in excess of the cost of materials and properties which have gone into building up the plant.

None of these alleged values have been recognized by the city as a basis for the fixing of rates. In condemnation proceedings, however, it has been held that franchise value must be reckoned with and paid for; and many courts have also recognized the value of some or all of the other intangible elements contended for.

Value of Going Business.

In 1903 City Engineer Grunsky was requested by the board of supervisors to suggest a value for the franchise and going business of the Spring Valley Water company. In reply to that request he suggested a value of $2,500,000 for the franchise and $1,400,000 for the going business value. The water company has claimed much larger values on account of these intangible elements, and it is not improbable that in a condemnation suit some considerable sum would be allowed for these elements in addition to the value of the physical structures and other properties as such.

Another element which enters into the difference between the present value of these properties and the city's appraisements thereof, is the increase in value of all the real estate holdings of the company during the past six or seven years. It is manifest that real estate in the city of San Francisco, and in the adjoining counties, is worth a considerable amount to-day in addition to its value in 1902 to 1904. A further element entering into this consideration is the capital expenditures made by the Spring Valley Water company since 1902. Those expenditures, according to the books of the company, for the years 1902 to 1909, both inclusive (the latter part of 1909 being estimated) have amounted to $3,267,645.83. A portion of this expenditure has been incurred in the purchase of the additional lands above referred to, for which reason the entire sum above named cannot again be added to the other values. As nearly as can be ascertained at this time, the capital expenditures of the company during the period named, which have gone into structures and improvements of plant, exclusive of real estate purchased, are between $1,000,000 and $1,500,000.

Still another element which enters into the difference between the present value of these properties and the city's appraisal, are properties which are, and have been, owned by the company but which have not been considered by the city authorities as being in use in the production of water. In the brief filed by the city in the rate litigation, the properties which were owned by the company in 1904, and were not then in use, are estimated as being of the value of $4,645,444.09. A portion of this sum represents properties which have gone entirely out of use and are not now valuable, for which reason the entire total cannot be added to other values. The appraisements of the several engineers of the value of the properties, which are actually now in existence and are not used in the production of water, have approximated $4,000,000.

In the above discussion, it has been assumed that the city's appraisements have represented the fair value of the company's properties as a basis for the fixing of water rates. It must be admitted, however, that three federal judges have determined, upon the granting of preliminary injunctions for three different years, that the city's valuations were too low for the purpose for which they were made, and it is for that reason that the injunctions have been granted. In the 1908 case, Judge Farrington held that the value of the properties for rate fixing purposes, as nearly as could be determined from the record then before him, was $27,553,512, or approximately $2,500,000 in excess of the value contended for by the city authorities. Accepting this latter figure as a judicial determination of the value of the properties involved, for the purpose then under consideration, and adding to it the several items of additional real estate values, intangible values, increases in market value during the past six years, and by reason of capital expenditures, and the value of properties not in use in the production of water, it is evident that a value fixed in a condemnation proceeding might easily equal, if not exceed, the price demanded by the Spring Valley Water company.

In considering the offer of that company, it must be kept in mind that present necessities compel the purchase of this property by the city. The Sierra supply cannot be made available for use for several years. The present supply and particularly the present distributing system are both inadequate and unsatisfactory. The water company refuses to extend its distributing system, or otherwise improve its supply under present conditions. If, therefore, the inhabitants of San Francisco are to obtain a sufficient supply of water during the years immediately ensuing, it can be accomplished only by municipal ownership of the properties of the Spring Valley Water company.

Purchase Only Escape From Litigation.

If the present offer is not accepted, the city must seek to acquire the properties by the exercise of the right of condemnation. The enforcement of this latter right would involve an examination and determination by a court or jury of the value of each one of the varied and scattered properties of the water company. To one who has studied the 7,000 pages of typewritten evidence which have been submitted in the pending water rate litigation, and has become familiar with the conflicting opinions of expert witnesses as to nearly every property owned by the water company, the task of attempting to fix a value in a condemnation proceeding appears stupendous. The present litigation has been pending something over six years and a final decision has not yet been had in any of the cases. A condemnation suit means the re-examination of all the questions of value involved in the rate litigation and many others, and it is not at all improbable that the final determination of a suit of that character might be postponed for another six years or more.

The practical situation presented to the voters of San Francisco at this time is the necessity of accepting the offer of the Spring Valley Water Company, or of enduring the present unsatisfactory conditions for several years to come, with the expenses and other disturbing conditions attendant upon continued litigation; and with no certainty that the final result will be any more favorable. The only possible excuse for failure to accept the offer is that the price is unreasonable. That objection is not tenable.

THE circumstances which surrounded Kippy in his tenderest youth were decidedly adverse. In the first place he was scarcely three days old when he broke his leg, and I never have felt any doubt that his mother's negligence, if nothing worse, was directly responsible for this sad misfortune. To anyone who remembers the sweet mother-love and tenderness which hedge most children about through all the days of their youth this may seem a most grievous charge to bring against any mother, but when I say that, on that very same day, Kippy's mother was detected in the shockingly felonious act of attempting to kill her own offspring, it will be admitted that negligence is about the mildest charge that could be brought against such a mother. Possibly she felt that her child would be but a weakling and handicapped in the race of life, but, for my part, I could not for a moment concede that such a belief would justify her terrible conduct.

It was my little sister Mary who detected the unnatural mother in her criminal act. Mary had gone to the barn in quest of eggs, when, of a sudden, we saw her running toward the house.

"Oh, mamma, mamma," she cried as soon as she was within hailing distance, "come! Come quick! The old Plymouth Rock is murdering one of her little chickens!"

Thus is revealed the secret that Kippy was but a chicken, and his mother only a hen, but I claim that the conduct of the latter was none the less barbarous on that account. Even a hen ought to know that killing is unjustifiable, unless, indeed, the parties to it are at war, when some authorities consider it highly commendable.

At Mary's call mother ran straight to the barn and rescued Kippy from his belligerent parent. It indeed was time, for not only was his leg broken, but he was otherwise very sadly pecked and maimed. When mother pityingly picked him up it appeared probable that the rest of his little life would be measured by minutes, and when Mary asked if she could have him for her "very own," mother said, "Oh, yes, but don't expect to keep him long, for he cannot live."

If my opinion had been asked I should have agreed with mother, but Mary determined that the chicken should be saved if unflagging care and attention could accomplish that result. In the first place she bound his fractured limb in pasteboard splints. Kippy—as yet unnamed, for Mary did not superintend his formal christening till several days later—Kippy, I say, objected, and made feeble and inconsequential attempts to pick the incumbrance from his leg, but Mary persisted, and if he succeeded in his attempt she straightway set the leg again. So the limb absolutely lay to heal, and while it was doing so Kippy lay upon his back in a box of cotton batting and probably wondered whether life was worth the living.

But while Kippy chirped feeble protest or mused concerning the remarkable circumstances attending life as he found it, another problem presented itself for Mary's solution. If he was to live he must be fed and there was an almost insuperable objection in the way of feeding him. His mother, in her atrocious assaults upon his small person, had picked a hole entirely through his craw. As a consequence, what Mary fed him through his willing bill came out of this unnatural opening, and it was evident that he could not receive much nutriment from it.

The situation called for heroic action, and Mary rose to it. Securing a piece of court plaster, she removed the feathers from about the wound and covered it with the plaster. So far as I know, this was an operation unique in the annals of surgery, and so it is of interest to note that it was entirely successful. From that time Kippy digested his food properly and grew rapidly. His leg knit, too, without a hitch, and he became a chicken worth the seeing.

But, as he grew, he developed one striking peculiarity, to say nothing of other peculiarities only less striking: He never for one moment suspected that he was a rooster, or that he belonged to the chicken family. His manner plainly showed that, while he might consider barnyard fowls as good enough in their sphere, he was convinced that that sphere was very inferior to the one in which he and other human beings moved. So he scornfully refused to have anything to do with such canaille, and attached himself to Mary as the one person who was worthy to be his associate, companion and confidential friend. From the hour when he stood outside her window at the earliest flush of dawn and notified her that it was time to arise—a proceeding against which not only the rest of the family, but even Mary, vainly protested—until that sunset hour when she put him to bed, he followed her constantly, or if he was not permitted to do so, he was but a broken-hearted Kippy.

THE STORY OF KIPPY

In one respect, and in few others, he conformed to the traditions of his kind: He preferred that a roost should be his bed. For the rest, he felt certain that he could not go to that bed without my sister's assistance, and so, as the evening shades drew near, he, like the other Mary's lamb, "waited patiently about till Mary did appear." It was a most absurd sight to see him following her about and requesting her, in all the varieties of chicken language that he knew, to set him on his roost. He could easily have reached the perch without assistance, but the fact never occurred to him, more than it once occurred to you and me that we could go to bed without our mothers to tuck us in and kiss us good night. In an emergency he would permit me to perform Mary's duty in this respect, but the occasional notes of protest with which he gurgled himself to sleep indicated the extent of his dissatisfaction with the proceeding.

So Kippy grew into a fine, large rooster, and never once suspected the fact. Sometimes, I think, he felt that there was some inexplicable difference between him and the rest of our family, but he did not hold himself responsible for it and bravely did the best he knew to be like the remainder of us; and if occasionally a rooster challenged him to battle, or a hen looked upon him admiringly, he impartially scorned either as the representative of a lower order of creation with whom he would have nothing to do.

In one respect, as he grew older, his conduct was more reprehensible than that of the other Mary's lamb, for he "followed her to school" not only on one day, but on many days, and there I am sorry to say that he got into mischief.

The school which Mary attended, and which Kippy desired to attend for the betterment of his education, was located in Marysville, California. The climate of Marysville is warm in the summer season, and the boys, and sometimes the girls, went barefooted to school, as did Kippy. But the master steeled his heart against the educational yearnings of Mary's pet, and the order was issued that he must stay outside the door, which generally stood wide open.

Kippy was a well-disposed creature at most times, and I think he would have heeded even this oppressive order had not Joe Borrow discovered a way to lure him within the forbidden precincts. Joe was one of the big boys of our school, and his main object in attending was the fun that he could get out of it. He soon ascertained that if he wriggled his toes within Kippy's sight the latter considered it a challenge to mortal combat. He was on the alert, and if the toes wriggled but once, down went his head, out went his wings, and he advanced gallantly to the fray. Perhaps the master would be engaged with a class. Of a sudden there would be a general snicker, an uproar in school, and Joe alone would be so buried in his studies as not to observe what was taking place about him, which in itself was a suspicious circumstance. The master soon learned where to look for the cause of the disturbance.

"Put that creature out!" the teacher would roar, and Joe would drive the feathered warrior condignly from the field of battle.

There was no play about Kippy's fighting, and if he were not interrupted he battled until he fell to the floor from exhaustion. He meant business, and blood and scratches on the big boy's toes demonstrated the fact, but Joe felt that his punishment was cheap at the price. Sometimes, in his exasperation, the master threatened to "wring the creature's neck," but Kippy appeared to feel a premonition that it would not be well to fall into his hands, and he incontinently fled whenever the teacher approached.

It is but just to Mary to say that she, too, apprehended that her pet might get into serious difficulty, and so she tried to keep him at home. To this end she shut him in a coop mornings, but Kippy was ingenious, and he keenly felt that he was being treated with contumely, so every few days he managed to escape from his prison. Then he would start for school immediately, and there he would wait outside the door and make a hollow pretense of being busily engaged in searching for food until Joe's toes again would beckon him to the fray. This was too much; he would enter the forbidden realm, and the combat would be on.

If the master had not been about the kindest and best man that ever lived this condition of affairs would not have existed for any length of time, but he realized how much Mary thought of her queer pet, and warned her only that she positively must keep him at home. So I made a large coop which I warranted to be rooster-proof, and Kippy was kept in it during the day and released only after school was dismissed.

That Kippy pined under the weight of this indignity was evident. He became thin and scrawny, and his crow lost its note of defiance to the earth and all its inhabitants. Fortunately, however, fall soon came, the children resumed their shoes and stockings, and it was considered safe to let him run at large in a world where were no wriggling toes to tempt him from the straight and narrow way.

Now, according to all reasonable calculations, he should have regained his former health and vigor rapidly; but he did not. Evidently the blow he had received had proved too much for his proud spirit, and it wilted beneath it. All through the winter he remained but a wreck of what he had been. Mary did the best she knew for him, but neither castor oil nor liver regulator would help him, and his case seemed hopeless.

Then the California spring, with its popped fields and wealth of roses, came down the land, and the children again shed their shoes and stockings. By this time Kippy was so weak that we were convinced he would not attempt to reach the schoolhouse if he were permitted to droop about at large, and so the coop knew him no more.

One day, chancing to glance from my book toward the door of the schoolhouse, I saw Kippy outside of it, feebly engaged in a staggering pretense of scratching for food. At the same time I looked toward Joe Borrow and saw his toes wriggle. Kippy saw the motion, too. It was what he had been looking for; for this he had dragged himself to school, and to the best of his enfeebled ability he responded to the challenge. His head went down, his drooping wings went out, and, in a queer, halting fashion, he shuffled across the schoolhouse floor. He was about to make his last fight with the hated toes. Now or never victory must perch upon his banner.

Straight at Joe's great toe he flew, seized its skin in his beak, and put all his might into the struggle with it. It hurt, and Joe attempted to pull his toe away, but Kippy hung to it and twisted and wrung the harder.

Again Joe tried, but his antagonist still clung and wrung, and a low "Ouch!" from the boy indicated that he was feeling the stress of the combat.

The master heard the exclamation, looked up, and saw what was in progress.

"Put that crea—" he began, but an unprecedented proceeding on the part of Kippy caused the rest of the sentence to die in his throat. With a final mighty effort, the feathered knight tore a bit of flesh from Joe's toe; then he toppled to the floor, gasped, lifted his head, made a noise which was but the ghost of a crow, and fell back—dead, but proud victor in his last battle.

When Mary was convinced that her pet really was dead she was inconsolable, and the master had to let her take all that remained of poor Kippy, bear it sadly home, and devote the rest of the day to grief. After school I made a neat headboard and planted it above the dead warrior's grave.

"He ought to have some sort of an epitaph," I then said to my little sister. "Can you think of a good one for him?"

"I have been thinking of that all day," Mary sobbingly replied, "and it seems to me that 'He hath done what he could' would be a good one."

So that was the epitaph that appeared on poor Kippy's headboard until the winter rains washed both it and his name away.

stationary, as those of European countries, this state of mind will crystallize into a passive acceptance of industrial feudalism, with the present avenues of escape practically closed.

The object of this article, and its predecessor, is to warn Californians of some of the potential evils of a great industrial development. With the completion of the Panama canal, with the increase of population and production, with the utilization of water powers and fuel oil, a great industrial development is bound to come in California. It should be welcomed when it comes. But the evils that have accompanied it in Carbon county and Manchester should be vigilantly detected and forestalled for the sake of the political and industrial freedom of the working people.

Land owners of the southern part of San Joaquin county have voted for a bond issue of $1,875,000 to construct an extensive irrigating system.

GUBERNATORIAL POSSIBILITIES FROM SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA.

[The following letter from a correspondent in Los Angeles throws an interesting light on the approaching state primary election, and discloses a strong sentiment in the south for a gubernatorial candidate from below the Tehachapi.—Editor]

The state may as well prepare itself to hear a strong demand from Southern California that the next Governor come from the South, which section feels that it is entitled to that high office. It has been some time since the South sent a Governor to Sacramento. The present executive comes from the extreme northern section, and his predecessor, Pardee, from the central part of the state, and with some justice Southern California is now making the plea that its "turn" has come.

This sentiment finds general and rather emphatic expression around the clubs and wherever men congregate and talk politics. The fact that the next United States senator is to come from the South is not regarded as a legitimate argument against the Southern California idea on the governorship any more than a plea that Senator Perkins should not have been re-elected because the North already had the governor.

It is quite probable that Southern California will set up a stout claim for the office.

It cannot be denied that fuel has been added to the flame by the action of the State Board of Equalization in arbitrarily raising the general assessment of Southern California. There is a general and deep-seated feeling that a grave injustice has been perpetrated, and it is hardly worth while to attempt to deny that a feeling of resentment is cherished by the masses of the people.

Another thing that operates to unify the forces of the South is the controversy over the projected Panama Canal Exposition. The issue has resulted in arousing a spirit of harmony and unity not witnessed before for many years; and this is naturally having its effect upon the talk of greater recognition for Southern California.

Phil Stanton's Boom.

Who will be put forward as the candidate of the South is not known yet, but it is known that preparations for the launching of the boom of Speaker Phil Stanton under auspicious conditions are being made. I may be telling some inside secrets, but it is a fact that a number of Stanton's influential friends already have begun an active canvass in his behalf.

About two weeks ago a secret conference was held in the office of a prominent Los Angeles attorney. It was composed of about forty of the strongest Republican leaders in the South. Among them were men formerly classed as "regulars." Several of them were men prominent in the Lincoln-Roosevelt League movement. Great enthusiasm was displayed in behalf of Stanton's candidacy, and subcommittees were appointed to sound sentiment in the party, among both the "regulars" and the "insurgents."

A little straw will show how the wind is blowing here. At the City Club's annual Christmas jinks last Wednesday, December 29, at which pretty nearly all the men conspicuously in the public eye were remembered, Stanton was presented with a pail of earth—perhaps it should be called "ground"—it was, in fact, good gritty sand—and facetiously reminded that it might serve as a bracer for his feet in his gubernatorial campaign.

Among some of the most prominent workers in Stanton's behalf are such men as Judge Walter Bordwell of the Superior Court; James A. Anderson, former president of the Los Angeles Bar Association; Russ Avery, prominent attorney and civic worker; Arthur Letts, the merchant prince, and others equally big and influential.

Many of Stanton's friends express themselves as of the opinion that if two or more candidates should be put forward at the primaries by the North, and the present harmony continues among the counties of the South, his nomination will be practically assured.

Judge Works a Possibility.

Among the other men less prominently considered perhaps, but yet regarded as available as candidates, is John D. Works. Judge Works was recently elected to the city council, of which he has been chosen president, and the fact that so big a man has consented to serve his city in relatively so humble a capacity has tremendously increased his army of friends. He is very popular in San Diego also, where he formerly resided. For years he served on the state supreme bench, and he is recognized as possessing one of the best legal minds in the West. Should he consent to become a candidate for governor, or for United States senator against Flint, he will prove a formidable adversary. A strong point about Judge Works is that he "looks like a Governor." He is a man of dignity and never fails to create a favorable impression. But in spite of his dignity and his dignified appearance he is extremely popular among all classes. He is unquestionably a big man—big enough for the highest post with which the state is able to honor him.

W. D. Stephens Considered.

Another man mentioned as a gubernatorial candidate from the South is W. D. Stephens, former president of the great Chamber of Commerce of Los Angeles, and because of his high character selected by the citizens to serve as mayor during the interim between Harper's resignation and the recall election of George Alexander. Should Mr. Stephens not be a candidate for Governor he may be put into the race for lieutenant governor.

A. J. Wallace.

A. J. Wallace is another Southern Californian prominently mentioned as a gubernatorial possibility. Mr. Wallace, a man of the same type of citizenship as Judge Works and W. D. Stephens, became a candidate for the city council during the Good Government campaign three years ago. As chairman of the council finance committee for three years he made an enviable record, saving the city thousands upon thousands of dollars. He is very popular in more than one county of Southern California, particularly in the orange belt, being himself a citrus fruit grower in San Bernardino and Riverside counties. He is prominently identified with the oil interests of Southern and Central California, and should he become a candidate the oil men of these sections probably would be found lined up solidly behind him. In San Joaquin county alone he has holdings representing upwards of $200,000.

San Francisco has occasion to remember his great activity in her behalf immediately after the fire of April, 1906, when he went East and was instrumental in raising a vast sum for the rebuilding of Methodist Episcopal churches.

As a campaigner Mr. Wallace ranks among the best in the state. He has learned none of the tricks of the professional orator—at least he does not practice any—but his voice is strong, his enunciation particularly clear, and what he says may be heard in the farthest corner of the largest assembly hall. He is a quick thinker when on his feet, which makes him a very formidable platform antagonist. Mr. Wallace is still a comparatively young man—about 50—vigorous mentally and physically. He is a strong supporter of the direct primary idea and direct legislation generally, and if induced to enter the contest would perhaps make direct legislation an issue of the campaign.

Stoddard Jess.

Another name frequently mentioned in connection with the nomination for the governorship is that of Stoddard Jess, vice president of the First National Bank of Los Angeles. Mr. Jess is a native of Wisconsin and a close personal friend of United States Senator La Follette. He is a potential figure in financial circles, and is well remembered as the man whose brain saved Los Angeles from the dire situation which threatened it in 1907. He has taken an active part in progressive municipal work, having been chairman of the Los Angeles Consolidation Commission, a member of Mayor Alexander's Park Commission, and recently has been appointed as one of the three members of the Los Angeles Harbor Commission, one of the most important commissions of the Southern metropolis. Mr. Jess would make a formidable candidate for any high office.

Los Angeles, Cal., January 3, 1910.

PERSONALIA

Mrs. Henry Wise Miller has been elected treasurer of the Equal Franchise Society of New York in place of Mrs. Philip Lydig, who found increasing work of the society too much for her. Mrs. J. Borden Harriman, president of the Colony Club, and Mrs. Gertrude Atherton, the author, are among the latest recruits to membership in the society.

Miss Jean Gordon, Louisiana's only woman factory inspector, is vigorously opposing the effort which is being made by the owners of theaters in New Orleans to exempt first-class theaters from the provisions of the child labor law. Miss Gordon is backed by the New Era Club, which is said to include every woman of influence in the city. They declare that late hours and excitement are bad for children, without regard to the class of the theater in which they work.

Mrs. Kady C. Brownell is the only regularly enlisted woman in the United States. She joined the Rifle Guards of Providence, R. I., by a special permit from Governor Sprague, and with her husband went to the front in 1861. Both husband and wife were in the battle of Bull Run and Mrs. Brownell was wounded. She is now the color sergeant of the U. S. A. Veterans of the Civil War, and her sixty-ninth birthday is to be celebrated this week at the Jumel mansion on Washington Heights, New York City.

Miss Glenna Lynch, Miss Helen Miller, Miss Marie Miller, Miss Laura Hunt and Miss Maud Lynch, all seamstresses employed in Chicago, have bought 160 acres of land in Idaho. The land is irrigated and in the best part of the fruit belt. The young women declare that they are seeking economic and political independence. They wish to establish a fruit farm by which to earn their living, and they selected Idaho because there they have an equal chance with men in making the laws that affect their property and persons. The land is paid for entirely out of the earnings of the young women.

Mlle. Mignon Nevada, the lovely daughter of the once great American singer, Emma Nevada, has been secured for six performances at the best theater in Florence. Mlle. Mignon will sing in "The Barber of Seville," in which she created such a sensation in Rome, and in "Rigoletto" with Battistini as the tenor. Mlle. Nevada has made great strides since her debut in Rome two years ago. She was then only eighteen and was considered to have a voice of the future. Since then she has been successful in other European countries, making a name for herself wherever she has appeared.

Weird and mystic ceremonies, begun at the Onondaga Reservation, near Syracuse, N. Y., will culminate in the reception into full membership with the survivors of the Six Nations, the historic Federation of the Iroquois, of a white woman, Mrs. Helen Troy of Auburn. She is the first white woman to receive such an honor, and she will be invested with the "sum of ancient knowledge," the thirty-sixth degree of Indian Free Masonry, the Clan of the Snipe (Tar-wish, Tar-wish.) Mrs. Troy, who was Miss Helen Reilly of Uxbridge, Mass., has spent fifteen years in study and research into the Iroquois traditions, and has unearthed much that is new to the world.

FROM "IN ABSENCE."

By Sidney Lanier.

Let no man say, He at his lady's feet
Lays worship that to Heaven alone belongs;
Yea, swings the incense that for God is meet
In flippant censers of light lover's songs.
Who says it, knows not God, nor love, nor thee;
For love is large as is your heavenly dome:
In love's great blue, each passion is full free
To fly his favorite flight and build his home.
Did e'er a lark with skyward pointing beak
Stab by mischance a level-flying dove?
Wife-love flies level, his dear mate to seek:
God-love darts straight into the skies above.
Crossing, the windage of each other's wings
But speeds them both upon their journeyings.

Aladdin rubbed his lamp. "Fine," we cried, "but can you prevent your wife from burning it on lodge nights?" Herewith he acknowledged there were limits to magic.—New York Sun.

"And," the beautiful girl said, looking up into his eyes, "you are really a member of congress?" "That honor has been conferred upon me," replied the dignified representative. "How perfectly splendid. And are you an insurgent?" "O, no! Please don't suppose for a moment that I would be so silly as to get on that side." "Ah! What do you do—brush Cannon's coat or black his shoes?"—Chicago Record-Herald.

In response to a growing demand in his home, Henry Kitchell Webster, author of "The Sky Man," once went to his father's house, borrowed the family high chair and started taking it home by hand. He had to wait long for his car, and when it finally came its conductor was a humorist. "Aren't you pretty big for that chair?" that official ventured. "Yes," admitted Webster, wearily; "I grew up while waiting for the car."—Success.

A witness in a railroad case at Fort Worth, asked to tell in his own way how the accident happened, said, according to Everybody's: "Well, Ole and I was walking down the track, and I heard a whistle, and I got off the track, and the train went by, and I got back on the track, and I didn't see Ole; but I walked along, and pretty soon I see Ole's hat, and I walked on, and seen one of Ole's legs, and then I seen one of Ole's arms, and then another leg, and then over one side Ole's head, and I says: 'My God! Something muster happen to Ole!'"

John G. Johnson, Philadelphia's famous lawyer, was discussing drunkenness from the legal point of view in the smoke room of the Rotterdam. "No," said Mr. Johnson, smiling, "the law doesn't take the eccentric view of drunkenness that prevails among hard drinkers. 'A hard drinker's view of drunkenness is very odd. I once examined a man who had been seen by several witnesses snoring over a large beer and a small whisky in a saloon. This man, though, swore he was not drunk. 'I was only,' he said, 'fatigued with drinkin'.'"—

A shrewd old Vermont farmer came into a lawyer's office the other day and proceeded to relate the circumstances in a matter about which he thought it would be profitable to "go to law." "You think I hev a good case?" he finally asked. "Very good, indeed!" the lawyer assured him. "You should certainly bring suit." "What would your fee be fer the whole thing?" the old farmer asked. "Fifty dollars," was the prompt response. The client pulled out an old wallet, extracted a roll of bills and counted out $50. "Now," he said, "you hev got all you would get out of this case anyway; so s'pose you tell me honestly just what you think my chances of winnin' a suit are."—Green Bag.

At an important state function in London blue tickets were issued to persons in high rank, admitting them to that part of the hall reserved for members of the royal family. Less distinguished guests were given white tickets. Through some mistake, an important public man received a blue card while his wife received a white one. When the couple reached the audience chamber there began the trouble, inasmuch as the lady firmly declined to be separated from her husband. An aide endeavored to reason with her, pointing out the dreadful consequences that would follow a mingling of blue and white. "How absurd," exclaimed the lady. "What do you take us for—a Seidlitz powder?" She was permitted to enter with her husband.—Everybody's Magazine.

Canon Hensley Henson, during his lectures at Yale, said at a dinner in New Haven: "In my condemnation of this American custom I was mistaken. Yes, I was as ludicrously mistaken as the woman in the third-class smoker. At Banbury a half dozen young Methodist ministers once boarded a third-class smoker wherein sat a frowsy woman smelling of beer. The young ministers had been attending a ministerial conference. In their black garb they conversed gravely on conference affairs while the frowsy woman nodded in her corner. As the train approached the long tunnel the woman roused herself. She pinned back lazily a tail of her hair that had fallen on her shoulder and she fixed her glassy eyes on the six pale, black-clad divines. Then she took from her basket a huge breadknife. "Don't none o' you boys try none o' yer tricks on me in the tunnel, mind, or I'll open ye."—Washington Post.

A doctor in a Yorkshire village lately gave up his house and was succeeded in it by a veterinary surgeon. Before he had been many weeks in his new home the "vet" was awakened in the early hours of a rather bleak spring morning. Opening the window he heard a voice call out in the darkness: "Can you come with me at once, mister? She's very bad." The surgeon dressed and found a trap waiting to take him to a farm two or three miles from the village. On the way he asked a few questions about the case he was to attend. "I'm afraid there's very little hope for her," said the farmer. "She's been ailing now, you see, for ten years, and she's getting very old, as well." Annoyed at being called out at such an hour to see an obviously not very valuable animal, the veterinary surgeon exclaimed: "Why on earth don't you shoot her?" "What?" exclaimed the farmer. "Shoot my mother!" Then the "vet" understood that it was the previous tenant who was wanted.—London Tit-Bits.

What Goes In the Governor's Mail.

The Political Code, which is the sailing chart for state officers, says that the governor shall be the sole organ of communication between the government of this state and governments of other states and of the United States. What will happen to the presumptuous public officer in California who shall rashly write to an officer in another state the code neglects to say, and as a matter of fact all sorts and conditions of officers do freely speak and write their sentiments to officials in other states when they feel so disposed; but it is not authorized, and the only strictly official correspondence is through the governor's office.

It is supposed to be especially de rigueur that correspondence with the representatives of foreign governments should be conducted through the State Department of the United States, and yet the foreign consuls residing in San Francisco write direct to the governor to give him certain official notifications and sometimes to voice their complaints when they have any to make. Again, the governor of California occasionally conducts negotiations for the extradition of fugitives from justice by direct correspondence with the governors of border states in Mexico, this being in consequence of special treaty provisions.

The governor's mail is an interesting and at times exceedingly bulky collection. Communications from the President of the United States or his cabinet officers mingle with missives from ward strikers; a polite note from an archbishop of the church is likely to be sandwiched between letters from convicts in San Quentin and Folsom prisons. For a surprisingly large part of the governor's correspondence is with highwaymen, burglars and cutthroats. Each convict in our prisons is permitted to write a letter once or twice a month, and some prisoners choose to exhaust their privilege by showering their epistolary favors on the man who holds the power of pardon for their offenses. If the governor keeps a separate convict letter file, as he does sometimes; it grows to large proportions in the course of four years, and the bundles of papers accompanying certain applications for pardon wax very fat with the passage of the years. There are veteran prisoners who have conducted correspondence with half a dozen governors and are still in durance vile.

About the only rivals in industry to the San Quentin letter writers are the office-seekers and they are wizards and wonders. It may seem remarkable that so many as a hundred letters should be written to the governor in connection with the appointment of one poor little notary public in San Francisco, but that is not at all an unusual thing. When it comes to a really important appointment the governor is likely to receive a hundred letters of recommendation in one day. An energetic candidate with a lot of friends will sometimes gather up hundreds of such letters—oftentimes obtained under a sort of pressure not far removed from blackmail—and the candidate will file the whole lot at once or will send them in by installments day after day, the object sought being to make the greatest possible impression on the governor's mind.

It is in the closing days of a legislative session, or in the days immediately following one, when the fate of many bills is undecided, that the governor's office is littered most thickly with telegrams. The active advocate of a given bill will send out a hurry call to every interest which is favorable to wire endorsements to the governor, and they will come by scores and by hundreds. Then the opponents of the bill will get wind of what is doing, and their telegraphed protests will double the number of the endorsements. A governor soon learns what value to set on these things, and usually it is not high.

Each governor has his own individual way of disposing of correspondence. One will religiously answer, himself or by his secretaries, every letter, no matter if it represents the craziest ravings from Napa or Stockton (for the patients in the hospitals for the insane are close seconds to the convicts in the extent of their correspondence), while the next governor may see no necessity of answering more than one letter in half a dozen. A set of printed or typewritten forms of acknowledgment is a great convenience.

After all the dross has been removed from the governor's mail-bag there remains a solid residuum of sense, for a great many of the most important matters of an administration come up to the governor through correspondence, and persons of wide information and disinterested motives write him letters which he is glad to get and by which he may profit if he is wise and patriotic.

Play.

An elderly gentleman was expressing his dissatisfaction with his son-in-law.

"What can you complain of against him?" he was asked.

"He cannot play cards," said the father-in-law.

"Why, you ought to be glad that he can't play cards," said the other.

"What do you mean? Be glad?" retorted the father-in-law. "He cannot play cards—but he plays nevertheless."—American Hebrew.

Emancipated.

WE HAVE IT from Friend W. Richardson, President of the California Press Association, that for the last seven years, that he knows of, that association has received no subsidy from the Southern Pacific company nor any income whatever other than the membership dues and fees. This is good news. The metropolitan press is, for the most part, so openly purchaseable that if the country papers fail of being frank with the people they have left few sources of information upon which they can rely. If the local press will stand true to the home people the power of plutocracy may yet be broken and free government be re-established in this state. The California Press Association can help.

An Epoch-Marking Administration.

THE TIRADE OF THE IN-COMING administration in San Francisco against the out-going was so unjust and uncalled for that it prompted The California Weekly to set forth, under the above title, some of the main items of achievement of which the out-going administration may well be proud. It will go down in history as an epoch-marking administration, and P. H. McCarthy will have cause to thank his fortunate stars if his administration shall acquit itself as well. It is scarcely possible that it can, for the reason that the administration that has just gone out had behind it, and solicitous for its welfare, the best manhood this city possesses, whereas the in-coming administration (save and excepting so much of it as toils for day's pay) has come into power through the pernicious activity of the worst elements in our social life. Except Mayor McCarthy break with this ilk, and do it now, his administration will make the Schmitz regime almost reputable by comparison.

Advance In Peaceful Negotiation.

NO ONE CAN HAVE REGRETTED more than the editorial staff of this paper the necessity for deferring until this week the article, under the above title, written for The California Weekly by Rev. Charles R. Brown, but the delay has not deprived the article of the quality of sanity or of hopefulness for better things to come. There is no other industrial need so great as that for employers and employees reasoning together before they fight. Belligerent humanity, whether in employers' associations, labor unions or nations, reverses that process to its unutterable undoing. Where there is a will to do right a way to do right will require little seeking. Where there is no will to do right somebody needs a whipping and if the public can be clearly advised as to who that somebody is it will help to dust the jacket that needs it. It is to the lawful making of that inquiry that public attention needs to be directed.

Does Not Look Good.

AT THE HOUR OF GOING TO PRESS with The California Weekly the prospect for the dual water proposition does not look good. It seems probable that that class consciousness, the introduction of which into our political life was a crime against republican government, may enable P. H. McCarthy to defeat the purchase of Spring Valley by the city, and that defeat is likely to inspire congress and the Secretary of the Interior to refuse to confirm San Francisco's claims to the Tuolumne source of supply. The solidarity of capital invested in public service enterprises, and its community of interest in every such investment, are not to be doubted, nor can it be doubted that our American congress is the focal point of the vested interests of this continent. A complaint on the part of Spring Valley that San Francisco would not do it justice will not, in congress, fall upon deaf ears and congress will prove solicitous for the safety of every such investment. The monetary consideration will rule. Only stupidity or duplicity can have blinded the mayor to these considerations.

Making Manchuria a Buffer.

NO BETTER BIT OF DIPLOMACY has happened since John Hay stood for the open door to the Orient than the stand our Department of State has taken for the neutralization of the railways of Manchuria. This may not make Manchuria a buffer state between Russia and Japan, which the peace of the world requires, but it will be next thing to it. It may result in subjecting the Chinese to "all that the traffic will bear," in railroad rates, but peace purchased at that price will be cheap enough. How the international stockholders in the Manchurian railroads are to get on with each other is problematical, but even that cannot be as important to civilization as keeping Russia and Japan from flying at each other's throats. Furthermore, in view of the scurvy treatment of Mr. Chas. R. Crane by our Secretary of State it is refreshing to have an opportunity to say something real nice in regard to Philander C. Knox.

A Line on the President.

THE PRESIDENT APPEARS to have concluded that, inasmuch as the power to legislate or not to legislate lies with Aldrich and Cannon, therefore he had better take half a loaf from them in peace than fight them and get no bread at all during his administration. That decision, if made, will prove fatal to William Howard Taft and his administration. This government will be bond or free. That is the issue. It is now bond to the interests who are entrenched in the senate. The house of representatives has become merely a threshing floor whereon to tramp out the harvest of problems that come up from the people. The senate has taken to itself the power of legislating and almost the sole power of treaty-making and appointment to office. These things it has accomplished through senatorial courtesy and a practical life tenure in office for those senators who represent the billionaire interests. If the President were to throw down the gauntlet to Aldrich and his crowd the issue would involve the reconstruction of the United States senate on more popular lines, and it needs reconstruction as certainly as the British house of lords. If a president is to be ineligible for a third term in office so should a United States senator be, and for the same reason. These issues must be fought out sooner or later. If William Howard Taft will not lead the people in that struggle some other man will. The American people are ready to move on plutocracy's stronghold.

Father Crowley's Attitude.

THE AUTOMOBILE ACCIDENT that deprived Mayor Taylor's committee to investigate the causes of municipal corruption in San Francisco of the continuous collaboration of Rev. D. O. Crowley was a public misfortune in more respects than one, but, fortunately, there is not the smallest reason to doubt that, had he been able to attend the committee meetings and hear all the evidence, he would have endorsed the report in each particular. The tenor of his letter to the committee implies no shadow of doubt of this. There were not, and are not, two opinions on that committee as to any essential finding. It tells the truth.

Mayor McCarthy.

On Saturday last one P. H. McCarthy, by the suffrages of "we, the people," leaped into the mayoralty arena in war paint and with a warwhoop, brandishing a shillalah. His advent was characteristic of the man and harks back to Donnybrook but, despite its glaring injustice to the out-going administration, the incident may properly be allowed to pass without further attention.

The inaugural address contained more between the lines than in them, and, so reading, we understand that the city is to be wide-open during the next two years and flagrantly so. The moralities are to be damned and we are to go in for prosperity as the paramount good. What the mayor said meant that to his redlight district supporters or it meant nothing to anybody.

Also the Sutter street cars will go to the ferry on terms satisfactory to the United Railroads, and such franchises as that company wants for reaching outlying districts will not be denied.

As to other questions of policy this paper is disposed to take P. H. McCarthy at his word and give him the benefit of any doubt that otherwise might be cherished. He has been elected Mayor of San Francisco, and he is in all fairness entitled to an honest chance to carry out his announced intention to "make good." But he is also entitled to a square warning that to "make good" means to cut clean away from many of the affiliations of his own past and not a few of the influences which elected him. Experience shows that this cannot be accomplished by any mere negative effort at personal independence. No man on earth is versatile or omnipresent enough to be mayor of a great city all by himself. He has not eyes, ears, legs nor hands enough, and there are not hours enough in the day. He must see and hear, and largely act, through others. The quality of his administration depends largely on who these agents are, and whom they represent.

Politics is a very human business, and is worked largely by reciprocity of favors. If Mayor McCarthy follows this very human rule, his administration will be wrecked. The bills of his campaign were paid by influences hostile to the honor of the city. Certain large blocks of votes were delivered by influences inimical to the purity of the city. Mayor McCarthy is under obligations to these influences which he must disregard, or, still better, repudiate. He has a chance, such as Schmitz had, after the earthquake. Schmitz failed, because he did not repudiate Ruef. McCarthy has not yet repudiated Ruef. Neither has he repudiated the Calhoun interest, which paid his bills, nor the saloon and tenderloin interest, which furnished a very large block of his votes. If he can get clear of these, not merely personally, but in those through whom he must work, that will be the beginning—just the beginning—of "being mayor himself," which is also only just the beginning of making good. McCarthy has brains enough to do this. In this he has the advantage of Schmitz, who consciously needed a guardian. We are waiting to see if he has so far disentangled himself, as to have independence enough. We hope so, for we want good government.

A Splendid Insubordination.

In addressing the United States Senate through Senator Dolliver Gifford Pinchot was flagrantly insubordinate. He left the President no alternative but to remove him from office.

But it was a splendid insubordination. Where the President was wrong, outrageously wrong, was in making an order forbidding the giving out of information from the departments except through the heads of the departments. In war, in diplomacy, in the department of justice—involving criminal prosecutions—the nation must trust the President and the heads of the departments and may not invade the sanctuaries of secrecy. In the departments of the Interior, Agriculture, Treasury and Postoffice there is no fact which should not be accessible upon request to the person in possession of the information (whether clerk, superintendent, chief or cabinet officer) when asked for by any member of congress or private citizen. The President's order barred the public from access to what belongs to the public and Gifford Pinchot's disregard of that order was a splendid, patriotic and timely protest against an executive order not fit to be made.

As a circuit judge William Howard Taft heard the evidence, listened to the arguments, rendered his decision and that settled it. As President he heard the evidence for and against Secretary Ballinger, or as much of it as he cared for, rendered his decision and thought that ought to settle that, but it did not, and because it did not the President feels hurt. But the American people wanted to hear the evidence and the arguments and they are not going to be satisfied until they do hear them. Theodore Roosevelt accustomed them to publicity and publicity they are going to have, the President's manifest disinclination to take the people into his confidence to the contrary notwithstanding. He has got to be frank and free with the public or lose the confidence of the public. There are not two ways about that.

As there are men who are money-honest and honest in no other way, so there are men who are law-honest and honest in no other way. Secretary Ballinger is such a man. The congressional investigation into the conduct of Ballinger will find his position technically correct in every particular. Nevertheless, there will be no question in the public mind that if Gifford Pinchot had not sounded the alarm in the nick of time, if Glavis had not taken the issue to the public in spite of the President, Secretary Ballinger would have somehow contrived the validation of the Alaskan coal claims and practically given away untold millions of public wealth. Ballinger may succeed in doing this yet, but if he does he will damn the Taft administration beyond hope of redemption.

Long live Gifford Pinchot! There is not to-day upon American soil a man to whom the nation is more greatly indebted than to him, and that debt will be vastly increased before the Ballinger-Pinchot incident will have terminated.

Reconstruction of the Land Laws.

One of the consequences of the Ballinger-Pinchot incident is likely to be a reconstruction of our method of disposing of the public domain. The homestead and pre-emption laws were the only land laws we have ever had as a nation that were not a disgrace to the nation. For forty years this has been known to be true, but for forty years the land laws have not been changed, for the reason that, as they were, they worked very well into the hands of the Ancient and Iniquitous Brotherhood of Grabbers. There have, to be sure, been some unpleasantnesses in relation to employing dummy locators, but these have not prevented the transferring from government ownership to the ownership of great corporations and syndicates, for a hundredth part of their value, of millions of acres of forest and coal lands, lands underlaid with oil and valuable mineral deposits. Now that the national domain, except Alaska, is relatively a sucked orange it is not unreasonable to hope for the inauguration of a wiser national policy relating to the disposal of the rind.

Gifford Pinchot offered himself as a sacrifice for these iniquities of the nation and his offer has been accepted. Public sentiment will focus itself upon this one thing and it will be accomplished. The nation will hereafter alienate in perpetuity nothing that cannot be made into a home for an American family. The national domain will become a rational and not a corporation asset and where possible, it will become income producing. At all events the exploitation of the consuming public will be sought to be prevented. Representative Smith's proposal to cede to the states, wrong in principle and abominable in practice, will serve to draw the line of demarcation between that which is sound and that which is not, and so will contribute to a clarifying of the issue.

On this issue the nation has come to a parting of the ways. It will no longer suffice to say that it has never been thus in the history of the country. The nation will turn its back upon the land-law history it has made and make new history. Its laws will be liberal to those who discover new sources of wealth and liberal to those who develop them, but they will at least aim to stand between the consumer and that "mortal cinch" without which business men feel that they can no longer do business, a policy that is rapidly transforming our civilization into a plutocracy and proletariat.

The fight for a more enlightened conservation policy will not be easily won, but it can be won and must be, even at the cost of a "back from Elba" call of the American people.

Federal Incorporation.

That part of the President's message which relates to federal incorporation of corporations doing an interstate business is sound doctrine. Congress should act in accordance with it and, inasmuch as it is proposed to make such incorporation only permissive and not compulsory, and inasmuch as the proposals are not drastic and will attempt to do no more than to facilitate the execution of what judicial interpretation has already enacted into law, it is not improbable that the President's suggestions may find favor in the sight of congress.

But unless the President early brings out his big stick and places it conspicuously within reach of his strong right hand he may not be able to recognize his measure when it is brought to him for his signature. The Aldriches and Hales can be depended upon to ensconce in the national incorporation law special privileges and immunities for the interests in order that they may be placed beyond the power of legislation and courts to reach and rectify them. If they can do it these men will make the federal incorporation law the vehicle of a permanent and untold mischief. There lies the danger and it is one to be dreaded.

Nevertheless, The California Weekly looks for legislation for the national incorporation of Big Business. That kind of business is national and not state. The nation may be able to control it. The states cannot. Whatever hope there is of public control of predatory interests lies in that direction and none other.

The Pathos of It.

The President's message to congress in relation to antitrust legislation contained a deeper significance than was expressed in words. The antitrust law was enacted twenty years ago, and ever since then the Department of Justice and the courts have been wrestling with the corporations it was enacted to control, and with what result? Not a scoundrel of them all has been placed behind bars in consequence of that act. The Standard Oil trust has grown bigger and more arrogant in spite of it; the United States Steel Corporation has been created under it; the Guggenheim colossus has come into being; Amalgamated Copper has controlled the output of the copper of a continent in violation of that statute and the Sugar Trust has absorbed the beet sugar industry of the country and dominated the nation's tariff policy; the Harriman fortune of $200,000,000 was scraped together in flagrant disregard of that law; parallel lines of railroad spanning the continent have virtually come under a single ownership in open defiance of it; the beef trust still exists in violation of law and, in its violation, the railroads of the country own or control the steamship lines competitive therewith on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts and the great lakes. Half the men who were in business when that law was enacted are now dead, and yet the best the President can do is to report hopeful progress toward its ultimate enforcement. Where has been the fault? Just here and nowhere else: The interests that have habitually defied the law have chosen the judges before whom they were to be tried and the United States attorneys who were to prosecute them. And this has all been brought about through a senatorial courtesy that has made the upper house of congress a citadel of financial and industrial criminality and an armor plated bulwark of organized plutocracy. Not until the United States Senate has been reconstructed from the ground up can we hope for efficient public control of incorporated rapacity.

The President's Court of Commerce.

That part of the President's message which recommended the establishment of a central court of commerce was strong. Its reasoning was irrefragable.

And yet the whole argument was based on the assumption that five men sitting as a commission, unhampered by technical procedures and free to do right, may, peradventure, confiscate the property of common carriers or work them other injury, whereas five other men, sitting as a court, hampered by procedures which the President himself has denounced in unmeasured terms, can do neither the common carriers nor the public wrong. The assumption is false. There is no divinity that doth hedge a court more than a commission.

But it may be better to have one railroad court established at Washington than to have fifty or sixty railroad courts scattered over the country. It is conceivable that the establishment of such a court at Washington may obviate the necessity for political bureaus of railroad corporations dictating the appointments of federal judges throughout the country as they have been in the habit of doing for the last forty years.

Furthermore, public sentiment can focus itself more effectively upon such a court as the President proposes than upon the Grosscup and Andersons of the bench scattered from Beersheba to Dan. The scheme seems to be worth trying on.

An Effort to Get Right.

The conference of California Democrats recently held in San Francisco was a conscientious effort to get right on public issues.

The ghost of a departed party haunted it some, but the voice was that of modern best thought regarding public affairs. Four-fifths of the Republicans of California would find the platform of principles adopted entirely unobjectionable. To be sure there were men in that conference who would steal the livery of heaven to serve the devil in, but so there would be in any group as large. There is no help for that.

There are no party issues and, wanting such issues, party should cut little figure in next year's election. Let us be frank about it. Every thoroughly good man the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League succeeds in getting nominated next year will be knifed by the Republican "organization" to the marrow bone if a subservient Democrat can be nominated to run against him. Per contra every subservient Republican the "organization" succeeds in nominating will be knifed as heartily by free Republicans in favor of the Democratic nominee if he be free and capable. Party will hold in line only those whose partisanship creates a density impervious to either moral or immoral values and they are fewer than they once were.

Therefore we bid the newer Democratic movement godspeed, but let Democrats beware how, at the primaries, they suffer bad men to get aboard a good platform. That will be fatal to their party and may be fatal to good government for the state. Remember that Mr. Herrin also is a Democrat.

What It Will Do, Not What It Will Cost.

Rear Admiral Evans, in his magazine article upon the Panama canal, demonstrates that the work will have cost, when finished, about twice the original estimate, and from this premise of pessimism he springs to the conclusion that the expense of operation will also be twice as great as anticipated, while the business to be done will fall below the amount assumed. All of this to prove that the canal will not pay. But the American people, who are footing the bill, passed quite a long time ago the point where they ceased to care very much whether the undertaking would be a pecuniary success, because they regard it as a great national industrial task set for the United States to do in the interest of civilization. Its accomplishment will, in the long run, strengthen the nation and benefit humanity, and so whether it pays 1 per cent. or 10 per cent. does not matter. It stands on the same basis that the first transcontinental railroad stood on, and yet old C. P. Huntington, who thought it a duty for the government to subsidize the railroad, died believing that it was a sort of industrial crime for it to attempt the canal.

Uncle Rueben—Aristocrat.

Are we to have a democratic aristocracy of land-owners? Your Uncle Rube is becoming as extinct as Uncle Sam. Here and there a specimen may survive, but his son comes home from college wearing next-year's styles, and the inter-urban trolley brings culture and content to his daughter—or her to them. Also, the peg-topped son brings home from college next year's ideas about farming, and proceeds to make many blades of grass, or alfalfa, grow where one grew before. The price of provisions goes up in the towns, and the farmer gets part of the increase. He is organizing to get more. As the demand for food expands faster than the arable acreage, extensive cultivation gives way to intensive. Farms grow more valuable, but no larger. Great landed estates do not pay. If we are ever to have a major aristocracy, it will be founded on industry, not on land. But a minor aristocracy, of assured plenty—democratic in its numbers and equality, but aristocratic in its aloofness from the common risks of life—is already developing in our farmers.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

Our theologians sometimes make the simplest things hard for us by using technical terms when simpler language would have made the truths they wanted to tell perfectly intelligible. We have been told much about being "under conviction for sin," and of "repentance" when what they really meant was feeling sorry because we had done wrong. We all know what it is to feel sorry because we have done wrong, although it is not always true that we do feel sorry when we do wrong. That comes hard sometimes, very hard indeed.

In our department, "With Books and Writers," a short time ago we reviewed "A Certain Rich Man," by William Allen White, but the book deserves more than a formal review. It deserves to be read and talked about a great deal. It is a wonderful arraignment of the surpassing sin of our time; the sin of inordinate greed of gain at whatever cost to humanity. The book should prove the Uncle Tom's Cabin of a newer and better national character; but in one particular at least the story is unreal. Its "Certain Rich Man," John Barclay, confronted by the havoc he had made of his own finer self and of the lives of those near and dear to him, repented—felt sorry—made restitution as far as he could, burnt the evidences of a great fortune and finally gave his life to save another, bravely and unselfishly.

Of course this was pure romance. Zaccheus was the last of the line of grabbers to do a thing like that. John D. Rockefeller, J. Pierpont Morgan, Andrew Carnegie, the late E. H. Harriman—of course we may not know in what attitude of mind any of these may have approached the author of his being on bended knees in his own closet, but no public utterance has ever escaped one of them that foreshadowed contrition for having reaped where they have not sown. John W. Gates, the grossest of them all, did say something lately in Texas that implied a hearty disapproval of modern methods of grabbing, but even he said nothing to indicate sorrow for having grabbed all he could get.

Really and truly this being sorry—repentant—for successful rascality, is exceedingly rare. When the attempt leads to financial disaster feeling sorry is not so difficult, but even then we are more likely to feel sorry for ourselves than for our wrong-doing. The case of Charles W. Morse is in point. He has gone to prison for a term of years feeling very sorry for himself, and very ill used, too, but no public word has escaped his lips indicating that he is sorry that he violated the laws of his country and made a wrong use of other people's money. One who had been thirteen years warden of a prison in which were confined many murderers told the writer of this that, in all that time, no one of the murderers had ever expressed contrition for the murder. Many had felt that they had been punished enough and that the state ought to "let up on them," but not one had expressed heartfelt sorrow for the deed itself. Remorse is rare and almost never comes apart from adversity or the infliction of some punishment, but self pity is as abundant as toadstools and as easily mistaken for contrition as toadstools are for mushrooms.

But except we repent our sins—unless we feel sorry for having done wrong—sorry for the wrong itself rather than for ourselves because we are likely to be punished for it, there is no salvation for us. And by salvation we mean being saved from doing wrong, not from the punishment for doing wrong. We'll probably have to take that like men, just as we do every day of our lives when we transgress natural laws, but no man ever yet ceased to do evil and learned to do well who did not first repent—feel genuinely sorry—for having done evil.

If we understand these facts clearly we shall be saved from deceiving ourselves whomever else we may deceive, and of all foolish ones those are most foolish who deceive themselves.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

The Increased Cost of Living.

The individual who has formed the habit of living, prefers to continue it, and, in order to do so, must buy food, clothing, etc., need not be told that the price of such commodities has increased greatly in recent years—he feels it keenly every time he buys provisions for a "square" or other meal or a garment for some member of his family. Yet, realizing the painful fact, he does not know the exact extent of this increase. This lack is supplied, to a considerable extent, by a report recently issued by the Bradstreet commercial agency. The report deals with increases in wholesale prices, and so a further unknown amount must be allowed for retailers' profits, but it is fairly complete as far as it goes. Selecting fifty-nine commodities which enter largely into personal consumption, it appears that the wholesale price of one pound of each would have been, on July 1, 1896, $4.2177; the wholesale price of the same articles in similar amounts, on March 1, 1907—but ten or eleven years later—would have been $6.8033, an increase of more than 61 per cent. This was "going some," but let no one suppose that we decreased our speed in the least. On the contrary, we accelerated it, for on December 1, 1909—but two or three years later—the same purchases would have cost us $7.2260, an increase in less than thirteen and one-half years of more than 71 per cent., or an average of 5 per cent. annually. So here we have, in statistical black and white, a summary of what ails us. It does not decrease the pain in the least, but it is rather interesting to know just how deep the cancer has eaten.

Claim Mars Has No Canals.

One by one, in some instances, the props are knocked down under popular beliefs. For example, who of us all has not believed—and based the belief on astronomical reports—that the surface of the planet Mars is fairly laced with canals? Every last mother's son and daughter of us has believed it, yet now come noted English astronomers, in convention assembled at the recent session of the British Astronomical Association, and announce that in their opinion there is nothing in the theory; in short, that if Mars has canals, there is absolutely nothing to demonstrate the fact. They do not deny that it may have canals, and so, too, may it have automobiles, but they insist that, in either event, we know nothing about it. More than that, they base their opinion on photographs of Mars taken by Professor Hale in our own California observatory on Mt. Wilson. It is admitted that these are the clearest and best photographs of the planet yet taken, and the Britons assert that they show no canals and that the apparent ones on photographs heretofore taken were due to less effective photography. With the canals obliterated, the question naturally arises whether we will be able to find that inhabitant of Mars with whom we have been intending to talk—but probably the answer to this question is no less distant than it has been at any time in the past.

Are German Nerves Getting "on Edge"?

Germany and Germans are somewhat exercised over an assertion made by Colonel-Surgeon Dannehl in the New Army Medical Journal, which runs as follows: "The next time Germany goes to war it will be with an army which is thrice as nervous as in 1870." It is realized that a highly nervous army is not the best of slaughtering organizations, and so such a report from an expert naturally is disquieting. Colonel-Surgeon Dannehl brings the statistics of the German army during the last ten years to bear to indorse his assertion. He shows that during this decade the number of sufferers from diseased nerves has increased by 350 per cent. in the army, while the victims of actual hysteria have increased to the extent of 300 per cent., the records bearing him out in the showing. There is, of course, actual cause for alarm in such a condition, and this alarm is not diminished when Colonel Dannehl points out that this nerve break-down still is increasing. It hardly need be added that the expert attributes this unfortunate state of affairs to the stress and worry of modern existence, particularly in the cities, for the relation between this existence and nervous collapse has been often enough pointed out by authorities on such subjects.

Our Greatest Year of Diamond Imports.

How is your "sparkler"? Have you purchased it, or are you just about to do so? These questions may appear inconsequential, but the record of Uncle Sam's diamond importations for the year 1909 almost might be taken to indicate that his nephews and nieces quite generally have concluded to wear these gems. It was the banner year in the importation of cut diamonds, and if there be anything in the old theory that such importation means easy times financially, then perhaps we are more "flush" than we knew. During last year, with December excluded, we imported cut diamonds valued at $25,214,541, three times as much as we imported during the same eleven months of the year before, and about $6,500,000 more than was imported during the first eleven months of 1907. The government's duties on these diamonds amounted to $2,500,000. Nor did we confine such importations to cut diamonds, for the importations of other precious stones during the first eleven months of 1909 amounted to about $15,000,000, or more than $40,000,000 in the total, which was an increase of $28,000,000 over 1908, and more than $8,000,000 over 1907. It is a story that has the glitter of an Oriental tale, but it is reported that there still are some who wonder whence their next meal will come.

Age of Cement, Among Other Things.

Robert Meade, of Easton, Pa., who is recognized as an authority on the subject, has given out some figures relating to the use of cement as a building material in this country which lend some color to the theory that this might be known as the age of cement. Certainly his figures are startling. Cement first was used as a building material in the United States in 1875. In that year a plant was established in Lehigh county, Pa., with a yearly capacity of 1,700 barrels. A third of a century later, or during last year, the quantity turned out was 51,000,000 barrels, which was valued at $43,000,000. Mr. Meade asserts that the output of cement in Pennsylvania alone now exceeds in value that of gold in either California or Alaska.

A Whirligig Burglar-Proof Safe.

The latest invention in the line of a burglar-proof safe appears to be constructed on the whirligig principle and is called the carrousal or round-about safe. It is particularly intended to defeat burglars who operate with an oxygen and acetylene blowpipe. The safe is polygonal in form, and is so constructed that it revolves on ball-bearings. When locked it is set in motion and continues so to revolve until the time for unlocking it arrives. If an attempt to interfere with its motion is made an alarm bell is rung, and, as the flame from a blowpipe cannot be applied while it is revolving, a burglar's assaults upon it are defeated.

Big Cities a Century Ago.

In 1801 there were in Europe only twenty-two cities which had more than 100,000 inhabitants. These were London, Dublin, Paris, Marseilles, Lyons, Amsterdam, Berlin, Hamburg, Vienna, Naples, Rome, Milan, Venice, Palermo, Madrid, Barcelona, Lisbon, St. Petersburg, Moscow, Warsaw, Copenhagen and Constantinople. Two only of these cities had more than 500,000—London, 950,000, and Paris, 600,000. Naples came third, with 360,000, and Vienna fourth, with 230,000.

ROBERT BURNS.

By Samuel Sumner.

How leaped my heart within my breast; what sudden thrill was there,
The moment when the guard cried out the railway station "Ayr!"
Bright day in memory's calendar, in that refulgent
June,
As through the flowery meads we rode, to reach the banks of Doon.

'Twas all alive—the broad highway—with vehicles which bore
Their Pilgrims to that cherished shrine from many a distant shore.
So, all the summer days, they said,—and so the record told,—
Came multitudes from near and far, that valley to behold.

You shall find valleys just as fair, and flowers as bright a hue,
Amidst familiar scenes you take your daily rambles through.
The Doon is not so proud a flood, nor can its "banks and braes"
Outrive California's shores, or claim a juster praise.

There's no strange beauty in the bridge that spans the rolling stream,
Nor in Kirk Alloway, rent by time with many a seam,
Nor in the cottage more remote, within whose humble door
The eye but notes the circumstance of this world's veriest poor.

What magic spell pervades the scene? Pray tell why gather here
The lords and ladies of the earth, with each recurring year?
Did some great conqueror drive herethro' his chariots
of war,
Or pierce the air and rend the vale with thunderbolts of Thor?

Did some proud queen awhile sojourn, with royal retinue
Here, by some castle, knightly tilt and pageant to review?
Did some grand martyr here resign his body to the stake,
And make oblation of himself for truth and conscience sake?

Oh, no! a simple peasant boy, who looked with modest eye
To see grand folk—now all forgot—in stately pomp roll by,
At sixteen years, enamored fell, with that poor peasant
maid,
So, wrote her rhymes, and so thenceforth, his being's law obeyed.

At once, a new inhabitant of the Parnassian grove,
At once a genius fully fledged, as from the brow of Jove
Leaped armed Minerva;—so uprose to heights of fame
That rural bard;—and Robert Burns became a deathless name.

"Wild Boy" was he? 'tis true, and yet 'tis idle to ignore it—
That bridge is now a famous bridge, because Burns staggered o'er it.
That hut belittles palaces, as all the world confesses, Since Burns had there his boyhood days, and wore his curly tresses.

Ah, well! the crowns earth's true kings wear are not cheap crowns of gold;
But coronets, bedecked with gems and jewels manifold,
From regions of the infinite, no vulgar minds explore,—
Those vast illimitable heights that sparkle evermore!

O, give me once again, this life, those halcyon hours to spend,
Where waters of the Bonnie Doon with Ayr and Ocean blend,
And on that simple rustic bridge, to linger and to dream,
And watch the tide, and slowly throw pebbles in the stream;

And think how, century ago, these precincts then so dull,
Became so classic all at once, of memories so full,
Because one simple, truthful soul shed glory all around,
And made of unpretentious soil, a very hallowed ground!

Then look upon the bridges twain, which span the dying river,
And spake in words the poet heard, and shall be heard forever;
Then look to find the mystery far down into the well.
Where, as the poet told us, "Mingo's mither hanged herself";

And then ascend the monument, and view the landscape there,
And gaze within, on "Bobbie's" face, and Highland Mary's hair;
Then to "the Grotto" turn aside, to see "Saunter Johnnie."
With "Tam O'Shanter" held carouse, as nightly chum and crony.

Then once again remark the walls, which long ago resounded
With roistering Scotch hilarity—"confusion worse confounded";
And quaff the cup of "mountain dew" for many glad returns
Of glad birthdays and memories, to glorious Robert Burns.

(The birthday of Robert Burns is January 15th.)
[Samuel Sumner was born in Massachusetts, February, 1830, and was a son of Increase Sumner, one of the leading lawyers of the old Bay State. He was educated at Cheshire Academy, in Connecticut; graduated from Williams College, Massachusetts, in 1849;
State Senator of Massachusetts, 1860; Lieutenant-
Colonel 49th Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, 1862-1863. In an attack on Port Hudson, Louisiana, May 27, 1863, he received a wound from the effects of which he never recovered. From 1875 until 1877 he served as Probate Judge of Bridgeport, Connecticut.
He died February 26, 1891. His brother is Rear-
Admiral George W. Sumner, U. S. N.]

THE NIGHT.

By Joseph K. Hutchinson.

(For The California Weekly.)

It's the heart of youth in the early eve,
When the dusk weaves a mystery.
That yearns to travel the dim, dark east:
To seek, to find, and to see;
It's the heart of youth in the arms of love,
That meets in the twilight's swoon,
The soft caress that touches and flees
From the lips of the wild, red moon.

It's the heart of man, when the night's half run,
And the stars burn fierce and high,
That beats to the breath of the million winds
That swing through the gates of the sky;
When the zenith has hardened the eyes of the moon,
And they look down cold and clear,
It's the heart of man guides the hands that bind
The sheaves of the fruitful year.

It's the heart of age in the gloom of the night,—
When the comets have wheeled and turned,
And the mists crept in and settled close,—
That grasps for what it has earned;
It's the same sad heart that strives to regain
The years that it loved the best;
What use to cry to the ears of the moon!
What use!—She is gone in the west.

Sir Charles Wyndham and Mary Moore have arrived in this country for their tour in "The Mollusc," which is soon to begin. Some of the older people may remember that before it was "Sir Charles" it was "Dr. Charles." But that was when he was a young surgeon in the Northern army during the Civil War.

Californian Poets' Corner

THE MERRIMAC.

By Frances Margaret Milne.

The author of this spirited poem, the best called out by the world-famous achievement of Lieutenant Hobson during the war with Spain, is a Californian, though not so well known as many of our other writers. She has published two or three volumes of verse. For a number of years she has been librarian of the public library in San Luis Obispo.

Not in the tempest's wrack
Went down the Merrimac;
Not when the battle's roar
Echoed from shore to shore,
Facing the cannon's breath
Her Heroes challenged Death!

While from afar they gazed,
Comrade and foe, amazed—
Silent and calm and sure,
Led by no fiftful lure,
Swift as resistless Fate
She swept toward Morro's gate.

Not captured prize of Fate—
To swell a victor's state!
Like the hound, faithful still,
Though the loved hand may kill,
True to her helmsman's track
Went down the Merrimac.

Burn! burn! Ye stars of light
Upon our flag to-night!
In deeper crimson glow,
Red stripes of dawn below!
Signal the risen sun
That Valor's deed is done!

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHELF.

"The Shaving of Shagpat."

The George Meredith who wrote this shimmering dream of Oriental splendor and dark delights and passion was a very different man from the author of "Richard Feverel" and "Diana of the Crossways." Life still to him glowed with the unshattered illusions and with the undiminished fervor of youth. Poet and dreamer sang and reveled in his young blood. A sort of modern Arabian Nights, was his product, catching well the spirit and the color of the old, but subtly infused with the modern pace of action, and with a symbolic meaning veiled beneath the older structure.

Set within the heart of this wonderful piece of writing is a gem of purest ray serene, a veritable precious crystal of literature, the tale of "Bhanavar the Beautiful." This short story, narrated by a character of the larger story, is complete in itself, and marvelously well told. It is, in a sense, an allegory of the curse of feminine beauty, but one thinks of the allegory only as an after-thought, for while one reads he is thrall to the beauty, the mystery, the dramatic power of the action,
and the skill of drawing of the characters.
Read "The Shaving of Shagpat," no matter what your experience has been with Meredith's later novels. In those after years he was disillusioned, his intellect dominated his heart, making his works cruelly one-sided pictures of life. But here the heart of youth and the hand of genius work together to produce a thing of beauty.

NOTES OF BOOKS AND STAGE.

E. H. Sothern and Julia Marlowe lately began their tour in their Shakespearean repertory in Washington.

Ethel Barrymore is to begin rehearsals in the new Pinero drama, "Mid-Channel," tomorrow. The new baby is doing nicely, thank you.

"The Woman in the Case," one of the strongest of the late Fitch plays, has now run more than 200 nights in London and is still going strong.

Margaret Deland is now having a play made of her "Old Chester Tales." Of course Dr.
Lavendar will be the central figure.

A letter of John Keats to his brother
George, of Kentucky, dated September 17, 1819, and containing the original draft of "The Eve of St. Mark," was sold in New York
the other day for $2,500.

Belasco appears to be still revising a Shakespearean production in the back of his head, but this time it is not of "The Merchant of Venice" with Warfield as Shylock. Blanche Bates is said to be planning to appear as Rosalind. It certainly would be a novelty.

Queen Margherita has a weakness for the books of American and English novelists. She also reads English and American magazines, and it is her opinion that the American school of short story writers at present is the best in the world. The queen gives over several hours every day to fiction. She reads extensively in Italian, of course, but her especial fondness is for books in English. She talks and writes English fluently, and in all literature likes nothing so much as tales of Western American life, whether of the mining camp or the ranch. She has read almost everything that has been written about the cowboy.

TWENTIETH CENTURY MAGAZINE.

B. O. Flower, whom we have known so long in The Arena, is the editor of this new monthly magazine, and into it he has consolidated two magazines, The Arena and ent feudalism of privileged wealth. It is richly illustrated, abreast of the last moment, full of short, breezy, awakening comment.

We welcome it as one of the very best of our opinion-forming agencies. On its staff and among its contributors are such writers as Edwin Markham, Hamlin Garland, David
Graham Phillips, Lincoln Steffens, Prof.
Charles Zuehl, Charles E. Russell and Judge Ben. B. Lindsay.

AN EPOCH-MARKING ADMINISTRATION

THE ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE TAYLOR REGIME IN SAN FRANCISCO.

The administration of San Francisco's municipal affairs under Mayor Taylor and the late board of supervisors was among the most efficient the city ever enjoyed. This will undoubtedly be the calm judgment of her citizens a few years hence, when the conflict and passions of the last two years have quieted and men look back in sober reflection upon the achievements of those years.

These achievements have been of two kinds: the immediate work of rehabilitating the city so that traffic might move in the streets, that children might go to school, that sanitation might be enforced, that the city officials might have the means and the equipment to carry on the functions of government; and the constructive work for the future, such as laying the foundations for a complete water supply system, an auxiliary fire protection system, adequate school houses, and the hope, at least, of a solution of the traction problem of the city.

The work of rehabilitation makes more of a showing in things visible to the eye—a showing that is indeed an impressive monument to the practical genius of the administration. It may be, however, that the foundation work and the intangible shaping of public sentiment toward the future construction of water supplies and municipal railways will prove to be the greater public work.

First, though, let us see what tangible work in rehabilitation has been done.

The Taylor administration partially or wholly constructed ten school buildings authorized under the bond issue of 1904. This work was done at a cost of $703,876. Work on the plans of the Polytechnic High School, to cost $600,000, was also commenced.

Five million dollars was voted by the people, May 11, 1908, for new schools. Under this bond issue, contracts have been let and appropriations made for new school buildings to the amount of $2,550,000, and for lands, $410,000. Fourteen school buildings are now under construction as follows:

Mission Grammar, $173,500; South End Primary (Portola Primary), $105,000; Bryant Cosmopolitan, $110,000; Madison Primary, $90,000; Garfield Primary, $87,500; Sutro Grammar, $106,000; Newton J. Tharp Commercial, $278,000; Hancock Grammar, $162,400; Frank McCoppin Primary, $107,500; McKinley Primary, $111,500; Jean Parker Grammar, $162,400; Sheridan Primary, $101,500; Lakeview Primary, $101,500; Clement Primary, $86,250.

Plans are in preparation and nearly completed for seven more school buildings at estimated costs as follows:

Denman Grammar, $160,000; Spring Valley Grammar, $120,000; Franklin Grammar, $120,000; Holly Park Primary, $100,000; John Swett Grammar, $120,000; West End Primary, $75,000; Oriental Public School, $80,000.

Auxiliary Fire Protection.

The bond election of May 11, 1908, also authorized the administration to expend $5,200,000 for an auxiliary fire protection system. Rapid progress has been made in providing this. A comprehensive plan was first laid out, beginning with three reservoirs of a total capacity of 11,500,000 gallons, to be built upon hill tops of the city. The pipe system leading from these reservoirs has been designed on the unit plan, so that if one part is disabled it will not impair the usefulness of the others.

Supporting this central system is a system of smaller, local reservoirs, or cisterns, of 75,000 gallons capacity each, which are distributed throughout the city at 154 street corners. From these cisterns the fire engines can pump direct, as from a hydrant. Thirty-eight new cisterns of this type have been completed, old cisterns have been repaired, and thirty-one additional new ones are in process of construction.

Supporting both these systems in emergencies and protecting the water front under ordinary conditions, are the two fire boats, the "Dennis T. Sullivan" and the "David Scannell," named in honor of former chiefs of the fire department. Each has a pumping capacity of 8,000 gallons a minute under pressure of 150 pounds per square inch. Connected with the pumping plants in times of emergency, these boats can supply sea water to the land engines at a distance of half a mile from the water front. One of these is in commission and has proved its value. The other will be in commission in a few weeks.

Street Work.

The orderly and far-sighted policy of the administration is illustrated by the procedure in street work. In view of the vast amount of asphalt paving to be laid, there appeared an opportunity to save large sums by providing a municipal paving plant. This was done, and the city's own asphalt plant and steam rollers have proven a great source of economy. Market street, Sutter street, Rush street, and other principal thoroughfares have been re-laid with improved quality of asphalt paving to the general satisfaction of the public. In addition, 1,896,557 square feet of streets were paved with basalt blocks during the fiscal year 1908-1909 at an average cost of seven and one half cents per square foot.

Sewer Systems.

A complete plan for a sewer system has also been mapped out, and work on the details has been carried well forward in the outlying districts. When this part is finished the downtown district will be sewered and hooked up to the outfall system, and San Francisco will have a sewer system which experts declare to be the finest in the world.

In this connection, the loyal assistance rendered by the administration to the United States corps of the Public Health and Marine Hospital Service should be mentioned. This corps directed the work of eradicating all sources of bubonic plague infection, with the result that San Francisco is now universally recognized as one of the most sanitary cities in the world. When the sewer system planned and carried forward by the Taylor administration is complete, it will be easy to maintain this vital ascendancy.

Public Buildings.

Eight fire engine houses have been completed and occupied during the administration of Mayor Taylor. These houses not only contain all the modern improvements in fire house construction but their architectural appearance has in each case been adapted to the ensemble of the neighborhood in which it is placed, so that the presence of a fire house in a block is an adornment.

The Hall of Justice is well under way. This building, of the most modern construction, will house the police department, the police courts and the criminal departments of the superior courts. The cost of its construction, together with the cost of the county jail and the land, will be about $1,000,000.

Hospitals.

Construction work was begun by the Taylor administration on the San Francisco Hospital, on Potrero avenue, to cost, with the land, $2,000,000. This will provide San Francisco with the finest institution of this character in the world. In addition, an infirmary is being built on the Relief Home tract, at a cost of $292,000.

Under the skilful and shrewd direction of Supervisor Henry Payot the site of a sanitary reduction works was secured at a saving to the city of from $5,000 to $10,000. This achievement, to which Mayor McCarthy referred most unjustly, is really one of the most successful pieces of municipal financiering in years. The owner of the property has lately declared that, if he had known that the city was to be the purchaser, the land would never have left his hands at the price paid.

Intangible Achievements.

So much for the tangible evidences of constructive skill exhibited by the late administration. The intangible achievements are no less remarkable. The administration devoted great attention to a campaign of education by which the public was made aware of its future problems and encouraged to think them out. This campaign culminated in the bond election of May, 1908, when the supervisors placed before the people bond issues aggregating $18,200,000, as follows:

Auxiliary Water System for fire protection	$5,200,000
Sewer System	4,000,000
School Buildings and Lands	5,000,000
Hospitals	2,000,000
Hall of Justice and County Jail	1,000,000
Garbage Disposal System	1,000,000
Total	$18,200,000

These bonds were carried at the polls by a vote of 21,400 to 1,650, and they have made possible public works whose construction will be of enduring and incalculable benefit to the city.

Water Supply.

The administration devoted unstinted time, money, and thought to the problem of a pure water supply for San Francisco. The city engineer was allowed every available resource to plan out the Lake Eleanor-Hetch-Hetchy process of bringing water to San Francisco, and the co-operation of the legal department of the city government was insured to clear all possible legal difficulties. Complete working plans of a system insuring ample water supply for the next hundred years were worked out, with details of construction and cost, of dams, reservoirs, conduits, and distributing systems.

At the same time, the public was kept constantly aroused and expectant by discussions, through interviews and statements of the city officials, and the public thought on the subject clarified so that public sentiment could crystallize upon a certain definite program by which the desired result may be achieved. The crowning work of the administration was the resolution of this program into two simple propositions, understood by the public, and the calling of the election to-day at which the public has the opportunity to seal the program with their approval and make certain of a perpetual supply of pure water.

Municipal Traction.

Another piece of statesmanlike work was the successful campaign to educate the public upon the possibilities of municipal control of its traction system. This campaign culminated in the Geary street bond election of a few weeks ago, when the city voted, by an overwhelming majority, to build an electric line on Geary street to be owned by the municipality. Whether this line, when built, is operated by the city or operated by a corporation under municipal supervision, it will provide the entering wedge toward a more rational management of city traction which is certain to bear fruit in improved service.

In the executive branch of the city government, making all due allowances for partial failures, it is still true that the fire department has increased in efficiency, and that the police department has been put upon a better standing than it had occupied for years.

It is noteworthy, too, that grafting on the municipality was practically extinguished during the Taylor regime. This was due in part to the incorruptible character of the board of supervisors and in part to the greater vigilance exercised in the oversight of the city departments.

On the whole, San Francisco under the Taylor administration enjoyed one of the most efficient governments it ever had. This is said in view of the herculean tasks set before that administration, of throwing off the incubus of a tremendous system of corruption while performing at the same time such labors of constructive work as no other administration was ever called upon to perform.

The credit for the administration belongs primarily to Mayor Edward A. Taylor and the board of supervisors. Acting under them in particular branches of the work, the faithful services of City Engineer Marsden Manson and City Attorney Long, and their assist-

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Mother Love Changes Not.

There came to me—but I knew not how—
The light of an olden dawn,
Bearing from Then to the hills of Now
The vision of days long gone.
Those who had wandered, and those who rest,
They came from their hidden place,
And again I looked on the one loved best,
For I saw my mother's face.

Still the light gleamed on; and a child was I,
A child at my mother's knee,
And I heard the ghost of a lullaby
That she sang in the eld to me.
Oh, faintly and sweetly the music rung
Down the vaulted halls of time,
Till I deemed that the angels in Heaven sung
Naught sweeter in their blest clime.

And the light yet shone; and I sadly knew—
For a heedless child was I—
How I had not prized her devotion true
In the days that had drifted by.
Then my heart cried out, "Oh, mother, forgive."
She smiled: "Be the word forgot.
Though the world must pass, yet my love shall live,
For mother-love changes not."

Then the light was gone; and I knew full well
That weary and old am I,
And the past is writ, nor regrets dispel
The ghosts of the deeds awry;
Yet comfort I find in the light that shone,
Though the tale of my deeds be nil,
For my mother's message is yet my own,
And I know that she loves me still.

Suppressing the House Fly.

It is all right for the doctors to determine to suppress the house fly, and millions will rise up and call them blessed if they succeed in doing it, but while there still is time I wish to make my voice heard in reference to the method of doing it. Most methods will be acceptable, but let us lift a universal voice against the use of fly-paper.

You know the kind I mean. This variety that is two feet long, one foot wide and covered with a sticky imitation of original sin—can't be washed off, you know. You come home from the office late in the evening, in the darkness hunt for a drink of water, and put your hand on something that seizes you in a cordial grasp. It is the invention of Satan that your dear wife has left there as a trap for flies. It lingers, confidingly lingers, and in the effort to get it off you get your other hand in it. Then your nose itches, you have to scratch it, and in so doing you plaster the sheet to your face.

This is the time that your blessed wife selects to tell you that you should be more careful. Evidently you should, but the thought does not comfort, and if the dratted stuff would melt your words would loosen it in a hurry, but it won't melt.

Let us leave the domestic tragedy before it overcomes us. You remember the time—you couldn't help remembering it—when you sat down on a sheet of the stuff which your fond wife had laid for any flies who wanted to sit down. It was easy enough to remove your trousers, but you never have been able to wear them since, and even the tramp to whom you gave them brought them back and said they were too fondly clinging for his purpose. Finally you burnt them up, but the memory lingers still.

It is because of such family tragedies as these—tragedies like to those the memories of which are written in thousands of trusting and crushed hearts—that my voice is raised against this method of suppressing the banevolent house-fly. Either something else should be done about it or we should shut our teeth and endure the flies—even if we are bald.

'Mong other things that I can't understand is why the Almighty seems to give the most conscience to them that need it the least.

The Opinions of Rufus.

I'm just like you, brother an' sister—mighty anxious to do my duty, if it seems es
if I could afford it.

Tain't exactly right any longer to say that men love darkness rather than light 'cause their deeds are evil. It may be that they saw last month's electric light or gas bill.

I s'pose San Francisco 'll git used to it, but this change from a "kid-glove administration" to a megaphone administration does seem kind o' sudden, don't it?

Whether it pays to blow your own horn depends some on circumstances. F'rinstance, 'wouldn't add much to the success of a fish-
in' excursion.

If salvation, 'stead of bein' free, had been marked down from a dollar to 98 cents, I reckon 'twould have caught some people that don't pay much 'tention to it es it is.

I b'lieve in releegion, but not the kind that needs a doctor to distinguish it frum biliousness.

It's comfortin' to me to realize that the old Heaven of marble pews an' golden harps has given way to a place that holds out more inducements to a feller that ain't a musician.

If we could forgive our neighbor's sins es easy es we forgive our own, what a cheerin' world this would be to live in, my brethren.

Gener'ly speakin', a woman's foot ain't very big, but it can kick a errin' sister down hill faster'n the most merciful man can pick her up.

Ever notice that the man you hold in the profoundest respect is the one that agrees with you in most of your views?

'Twas a woman that had been married six times that called 'tention to the fact that practicin' husbandry ain't necessarily the same thing es farmin'.

California Winter Song.

Shimmer and shine of the winter suns,

The shine and the shimmer of suns that glow

O'er the meadows green where the brooklet runs

Through lands uncumbered by ice and snow;

And a little wee bird in a palm tree sings,

Sings to its mate, as I sing to mine:

"Oh, our winter speeds on its summery wings
Through days with the joy of the world
ashine,"

And the voice of my heart is a song of praise:
Thank God for the shcen of our sunshine days!

The brown quail calls to his wee, brown
mate:

"Come out! Come out, for the skies are clear."

Oh, winter's a myth that is out of date

In fair California, the haven of cheer;

And the gold of the orange is Nature's gold,
And the bloom of magnolias the cups of white,

Whence, far from the sting of the Eastland
cold,

She drinks to the Land of her Heart's Delight;

And I know, for my heart to her heart I have pressed.

Our fair California she loveth the best.

The suns come up, and the suns go down;
Westward and westward they haste them still.

Away from the land where the gray skies
frown,

Away from the days that are drear and chill;

They smile on the rivers that, sparkling, run
Through vales of delight to the tranquil sea,

And they list to the songs of the birds that shun

The lands where the hosts of the Frost
King be;

And my soul is glad, in the shimmer and shine,

That fair California is thine and mine.

Concerning the Gentle Hen.

I cannot bring myself to join in the almost universal laudation of either the generic American or specific Californian hen. Other writers may take pleasure in tossing fragrant bouquets in her direction; I have a brick.
They may search their lexicons for honeyed words in which to tell of her manifold charms, it would not do to confide my warmest opinions to paper, for paper is inflammable.

I am loaded with experience, too. In a confident moment I concluded to go into the poultry business, and cease getting wealthy so gradually. Accordingly I purchased eleven hens and a rooster. In my gallinacean ignorance I was, indeed, about to buy eleven roosters and a hen, but the dealer, who was a kind man, warned me that in so doing I would do injustice to my fond egg-aspirations, and
I reversed the numbers.

This was when gentle spring was upon the land, the days were bright and warm, and the market price of eggs was blithely galloping downward. Did my hens lay? They did.
Some days they laid as many as five or six eggs, and although the price of this fruit then was so low that the neighbors were willing to give me eggs as tokens of esteem, I looked forward with glad confidence to the time when eggs would be eggs. "Then," said I to myself, "I will rapidly acquire a competence, and remove my nose from the writing grindstone which it so long has graced."

There came a cold snap, the price of eggs went up so high that no aeronaut could overtake them, and my hens laid two eggs a week. I didn't understand it until I caught one of them one day reading a market report from a piece of a daily paper that had blown over the fence. Then the baseness of their conduct was made clear to me.

All through the days, this fall and winter,
when eggs stood at 60 to 65 cents a dozen,
my hens stood around, glared at me maliciously, and refused to lay an egg, although I often went out and squeezed them. Eggs are cheaper now, and occasionally I find one in my henhouse, but never will my tortured soul permit me to forget their base and ungrateful conduct in the hour of my need and tribulation. I fed them 23 cents' worth of grain a day, and they returned me 21½ cents' worth of eggs a week.

My henhouse cost me $27.39, wire fencing for the back yard $8.13, hen food to date $70.69; total, $106.21. The opposite side of the ledger reads: By eggs, to date, $17.12.

So if anybody desires to continue the jubilee of hen-glorification, he will please to count me out. I am not feeling well enough to chirp a single chirp of praise.

The Orient Again Left.

Once when an Occidental Higher-up was upon his travels, the dear people having contributed so liberally to his coffers that he could amply afford to journey, he met an Oriental Potentate, and each fell to praising the things of his own country. In this verbal contest the Oriental Potentate did fare but ill, until at last a happy thought came to him.

"Aha!" he cried, "we have one thing that you yet lack."

"Name it," the Occidental Higher-up exclaimed.

"It's the Juggernaut."

"The Juggernaut—who's he?" For his was the higher-up erudition.

"Why, it's a mighty machine, and it crushes hundreds of people annually under its revolving wheels."

"Huh!" the higher-up retorted, "we have the same machine, only it is modernized, crushes thousands instead of hundreds, and we give it another name."

"What do you call it?" the Oriental Potentate inquired.

"The Automobile," was the proud response.

Whereupon, as the Oriental Potentate had heard of the Automobile and its glorious record, nothing remained for him except to hang his head, abashed, and slink away.

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Editor The California Weekly.

My Dear Sir:—I believe in your principles. I believe in your paper. I believe in you. I have had great pleasure in commending your paper from the pulpit, inasmuch as I believe the people should have the best things. I believe in clean politics as well as in clean morals, and you cannot have one without the other. I am glad to have the help of so able a journal as yours. I do not hesitate to make use of it.

Yours cordially,

THOMAS BOYD.

Fresno, Cal., Jan. 5, 1910.

Gradually the men who stand for Right Things in this state are awakening to the fact that, in The California Weekly, they have a friend and a helper, that they have a periodical in which they can put their trust as being frank and faithful without being stupid. If that awakening can become general enough soon enough The California Weekly will become a power for good in this state. Who will be next to pass the good words of Rev. Thomas Boyd to his congregation?

The California Weekly.

Gentlemen:—I have been a subscriber for your Weekly for some time and wish to express my approval of the course that you are pursuing. Perhaps I may not agree with you in every position that you take, but my admiration for your paper is not lessened thereby. What San Francisco needs is a paper that is intelligent and honest and that has the force of management to express its sentiments in a way to reach the conscience of the people. I feel The California Weekly fulfills this need, and I wish to congratulate you and the people upon that fact.

Sincerely yours,

R. L. RIGDON.

San Francisco, December 30, 1909.

If only those papers were patronized whose readers agreed with everything they said there would be few periodicals, and these few would be lean and hungry. It would be not unlike Horace Greeley's proposal to limit the franchise to those whom he would wish to have marry his daughters. There would be precious few who would vote. But every reader has a right to demand of the periodical to which he gives his patronage that it shall try to be right, that it shall be frank and that it shall not be afraid to serve the public interest as it is given the management to see that interest. There is no especial divinity hedging an editor about to prevent his making mistakes or his drawing wrong conclusions. He can better be held responsible for the uprightness of his conclusions than for their rightness. The California Weekly will not be found flinching from that test no matter when applied.

Parallel Ethics.

It is human nature that a stronger nation should exploit a weaker (e. g., the United States and Mexico); indefensible ethically, but inevitable. Therefore The California Weekly has nothing to say against it. Let destiny have her way.

It is human nature that a stronger class in a wealthy nation should exploit a weaker (e. g., the allied corporate interests and the unorganized plain citizen); indefensible ethically, but inevitable. Therefore, The California Weekly has nothing to say against it? Let destiny have her way?

A FRIENDLY CRITIC.

The foregoing is bright and witty and very much to the point. It is written into the constitution of Man the Animal that the strong are to be stronger than the weak and are to use their strength mainly for their own advantage. The struggle is for the possession of the earth and all things desirable thereon, and that nation will have and hold the most of it that can put it to the highest use. It is destiny. That individual will have and hold the most of the earth who can put it to highest use. That also is destiny, so long as we live in the dispensation of Man the Animal. That dispensation still obtains. When we come to the dispensation of Man the Spiritual Being, Man made in the image of God with the spirit of God in his soul, the rigors of strength will be modified, as they have been faintly modified here and there through the last nineteen centuries. In our deliberate judgment, all forms of human civilization, except as they are softened, modified and humanized through the Christ idea working in the hearts of men, will inevitably resolve themselves into a plutocracy and a proletariat in which the wealth of the plutocracy will work out its destruction while the poverty of the proletariat will make its destruction equally certain. Opposition to aggression will defer the day of reckoning and give the Christ idea (love to God and Man) a chance to do its work. It is civilization's only hope, the only hope of the strong as well as the only hope of the weak. Someday the great truth will dawn upon the minds of men that Jesus did not come to bring us a theology, but a religion. Then we shall cease marking time and make progress.

Editor The California Weekly.

In the summer of 1908, when the Democratic managers were publishing the list of contributors to their campaign fund, and during the republican managers to do the same, the latter said they would publish that list "after election." If it has been published, I have not seen it. Have you, Mr. Editor?

WILLIAM CROSBY.

Livermore P. O., Cal., Dec. 27, 1909.

We do not remember to have seen that statement, although we presume it was issued as promised, but if the statement was prepared by Postmaster General Hitchcock, as it probably was, it is not likely to have been very enlightening. Sooner or later we shall make the legitimate expenditures for campaign a public charge and the illegitimate expenditures will be prohibited altogether. This will have to be done by the states first and the nation afterward. It cannot be that the side with the most money shall always achieve the victory. That will make administrations merchandise, from which we are not so very far even now.

Editor The California Weekly.

San Francisco, Cal.

Dear Sir:—I note by the local paper this morning that Mayor Taylor has received the report of the committee appointed to investigate the causes of municipal corruption in your city. Would it be possible for you to secure a copy of the same for me? I can use it here to good advantage.

Someone kindly put your paper on my list several weeks ago, and I have read the same faithfully and enjoyed it greatly. I make a point to keep pretty close track of municipal conditions in most of the northern cities, and your publication is very useful to me, also stimulating. We have here in Minneapolis no such conditions, perhaps, as you have in your city; but here, as elsewhere, the public service companies are the main source of the corruption and inefficiency in our city hall, and largely responsible for the low state of civic morals. The public are gradually waking up, however, in large part due to the facts that have come out incident to two or three franchise investigations of the past two years, and some day things are going to be in much better shape.

The Voters' League has been in existence six or seven years. Its purpose is to regenerate affairs at the city hall, with special reference to the city council and heads of departments, and in the board of county commissioners. We are also trying to help in the work of educating the public in measures as well as men.

Very truly yours,

S. P. JONES.

Secretary Voters' League.

Minneapolis, Minn., Jan. 7, 1910.

The cause of one city is the cause of all cities and every forward step that one city takes helps all the others. The good work done by the Voters' League in Minneapolis will stimulate San Francisco to new exertions, and the house cleaning that San Francisco has had during the administration of Mayor E. R. Taylor, and under the leadership of Rudolph Spreckels and Francis J. Heney, will react upon Minneapolis. Furthermore, there is no iniquity that does not contain within it the seeds of its own destruction, and if public service corporations are forced out of existence they will have only themselves to blame for it. Such a demoralization of official and private life as San Francisco has undergone at the hands of its public service corporations is a greater price than any people can afford to pay for any pecuniary benefit of which the human mind may conceive, and if the municipalization of the Geary street road were to involve the final beggary of the United Railroads the penalty would still fall short of being commensurate with the wrong inflicted upon this community by that malevolent and conscienceless corporation. Greetings to Minneapolis and the Voters' League thereof! There is something in that undaunted Norse blood up there that has been, and is, an inspiration to the whole nation.

The California Weekly.

Gentlemen:—You have performed a most valuable public service in printing and publishing in full the report "On the Causes of Municipal Corruption in San Francisco" and, as one of your appreciative readers, I wish to express my thanks. The report is a piece of work worthy of the highest commendation and publicity. Every thinking American citizen ought to have the opportunity to read it in full and to study its lessons. To aid in bringing this about I am enclosing a list of fifty or more of my friends and correspondents to whom I wish you to mail copies at my expense; a single copy to each except where otherwise stated. I shall write a personal letter to each one telling him I am ordering a copy sent him and why.

It is of vital importance that the lessons arising from San Francisco's bitter experience should be made clear and available to the rest of the American cities. Think of what could be done for the cause of good government if each of your readers were to have a copy of this report sent to a considerable number of his most thoughtful and influential correspondents.

Very truly yours,

GUIDO H. MARX.

Stanford University, Cal., Jan. 9, 1910.

The suggestion of Professor Marx is so absolutely to the point that we venture to lay it before our readers. We have this report in pamphlet form and will mail copies of it postpaid to all addresses sent us at ten cents per copy. If our subscribers will interest themselves in giving a wide circulation to this report they will help the state and the nation to a clear understanding of what San Francisco has gone through and why she went through it. The story is told without bitterness and also without deviating a hair's breadth from the solemn truth. And yet what all men know to be true, and no one of the accused has ventured publicly to deny, our system of justice was powerless to establish as true. Such is the power of aggregated, criminal wealth under our American plutocracy! Will the American people, and the people of California, undertake the redemption of their country and state from that form of government? Nothing will contribute more to that end than the wide dissemination of the report of Mayor Taylor's committee on "The Causes of Municipal Corruption in San Francisco." And all it costs is ten cents a copy.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Heney's Qualifications for the Governorship

Mention was made in these columns last week of the criticism that the Lincoln-Roosevelt League had no "commanding figure" of gubernatorial stature. Francis J. Heney is such a figure. No other man in this generation has rendered to the people of California such eminent and unrequited service. Also, there is no other so well adapted to the immediate work now in hand. There are two tasks required, one destructive and one constructive, and both radical. The governorship needs, first, some one who will knock down and drag out, who will put an end ruthlessly to the whole present regime of "pull" and subservience. Until that is done nothing else worth while is possible. But there is also needed positive, radical initiative, in constructive reforms. The governor of California is not merely its chief executive. He is in large part its legislature also. Unless constructive legislation is initiated by him, or by commissions directed by him, it is rarely enacted at all. The people may not yet know that Heney, besides being a fighter, is a man of remarkably statesman-like grasp of public questions, but they would soon learn that in a political campaign. And they know already that, whatever he does stand for, he will have the courage and energy to carry it out. As a man, as a leader, and as a statesman, Heney is the ideal "commanding figure" as the reform candidate for governor.

Obstacles in the Way of Heney's Candidacy

But there are two obstacles—one personal and one political. Heney is not personally able at this time to undertake a campaign for governor. Practically all his savings, above what he has spent in three years of unpaid work for San Francisco, are tied up in some Arizona investments, from which they may never return. He is under the immediate necessity of making money and is in receipt of many flattering offers which would enable him to do so. This situation interposes a personal obstacle to considering Heney for governor which might or might not be insurmountable. The other obstacle is the carefully-spread fiction that Heney is "hoodooed." There is undoubtedly some reaction in San Francisco, even among those genuinely friendly to Heney and his cause. City people are easily tired and San Francisco is tired. The friends of Heney in San Francisco would take up the fight for him, if he were a candidate, with unabated loyalty, but with lessened courage. This reaction does not exist in Southern California, nor in large measure in the interior, but it does in San Francisco. What the situation will be when the state conference of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League is held, of course no one can predict. That conference may be stampeded for Heney yet, even against his own protest and the caution of the conservatives. Or his name may not even come before it. There is no telling.

W. R. Davis Leading Conservative Possibility

Of the more conservative possibilities, the one most frequently discussed is W. R. Davis, of Oakland. Mr. Davis himself refuses to be considered as a candidate and deprecates all mention of his name, but it will not down, and if the nominating conference is dominated by the more conservative element, his nomination would surprise no one. There is no man in the reform forces in California more widely or better known than W. R. Davis. His loyalty as a Republican is unquestioned and has been tested in many campaigns, but it has never been sullied by subservency or affiliation to the railroad machine. As Mayor of Oakland and as attorney for the city for many years, including the present, he has rendered notable service to the city in guarding its waterfront and in restoring to the public such of it as had not been irrecoverably alienated. He has always been active in Oakland and in the state, in behalf of Right Things. He was at one time a competitor with Dr. George C. Pardee for the Republican nomination for governor, and has never belonged to what used to be called the "Pardee machine" in Oakland, but there has never been any split or friction in the good-government forces, to which he was a party. Mr. Davis is a forceful and impressive speaker, a man of tested ability, and is trusted as few men are for his unquestioned, unflinching sincerity. He is easily the leader of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League, in personal influence, and would make a splendid governor.

Present Strength of Doctor Pardee

Two years ago the League was widely berated, by the kept press, as a "Pardee machine," and it is very likely that, in reaction against that criticism, it "stood so straight as to lean backward" with regard to Dr. Pardee. No reason for any such attitude exists now, and the position of Dr. Pardee himself, before the people of the state, is much better defined than it was then. At that time recent defeat had applied to Dr. Pardee the epithet of "sorehead"—whatever that may mean—and the various disgruntlements incident to any active administration were still acute. Dr. Pardee's temperamental fault of procrastination had delayed some appointments until a multitude of candidates had developed, all but one of whom had to be disappointed, and had also postponed his outspoken and belligerent hostility to the railroad machine until after the strategic moment. These things made Dr. Pardee unavailable then, and malicious criticism taunted the League into conceding that unavailability too openly. But no such conditions exist now. However temperamentally slow to reach a decision Dr. Pardee may once have been, he has reached it now, and may be trusted to stick to it to the bitter end. Dr. Pardee's policies, affiliations and purposes are absolutely unambiguous, now, and they have been carried out long enough and unselfishly enough to refute any fling of "sorehead." With means and leisure and access to the public ear, Dr. Pardee is rendering, and will continue to render, in or out of office, probably the most active and continuous public service of any citizen of California. He made a good governor before and there would be a certain logic of retributive justice in making him the candidate again to undo the very oligarchy which prevented his renomination before. He would make a far better and stronger governor now than any one could have made when he was governor before. And, whether governor or not, he is likely to continue for many years to be California's chief citizen.

Marshall Hale a Coming Leader

One of the possibilities, until his recent illness, was Marshall Hale, of San Francisco, but that illness has added a probably insuperable objection to Mr. Hale's already strong reluctance to be even mentioned as a candidate. But prognosticators of the more distant future should not overlook the possibilities of Marshall Hale, who as much as any other man in California, if not more, has stood as the example of the merchant in politics, active for good government, and a living example of the fallacy of the tradition that a merchant must be a coward.

Chas. H. Bentley a Strong Man

Another San Francisco business man, often mentioned by every one but himself, is Charles H. Bentley. If San Francisco had the naming of the governor, Bentley could have it for the taking. Whether his state acquaintance is wide enough to make him now available is not so certain. If it is not it should be extended. Bentley is too good a man to lose to the public life of the state.

Charles H. Belshaw's Non-Committal Stand

Charles H. Belshaw is the only League man who is an active candidate for governor, but it was for some time doubtful whether Mr. Belshaw, though a League man, was a candidate for the League nomination. In fact, he has not yet openly announced himself, and it may yet be that he will prefer to run as an independent candidate without organized indorsement. Senator Belshaw, in any event, could never get the machine endorsement. He holds the record, or nearly the record, for service in the legislature, and was always indubitably independent. His acquaintance throughout the state is very wide, his record is good, and he has the advantage of being the first in the field as an active candidate. So far there has been no very organized movement inside the League, in his behalf—perhaps due to waiting for an announcement from him of his exact position—but he enjoys the friendship and confidence of all the League leaders. Developments of his candidacy will be awaited with interest.

Why Southern California Wants a Supreme Justice

One of the interesting contests of the approaching state campaign will be over the supreme court justice. The terms of Judge Sloss and Judge Melvin will expire with the end of the year 1910, and their successors must be chosen at the November election. In all probability both these incumbents will be candidates for re-election. It is on the claims of Southern California for one or more places on the supreme bench that the chief interest is bound to center. The southern end of the state feels that it is entitled to have a southern man in at least one of the vacant seats on the supreme bench. Of the seven judges but one now comes from Southern California. The amount and peculiar character of the litigation coming from the south before the highest tribunal are regarded as ample warrant for the growing demand that that section be represented in that body by at least three of the seven justices. The amount of taxes the southern part of the state contributes to the running expenses is also presented as one of the reasons why it should have more nearly equitable representation in the court of last resort. This claim of Southern California for at least one of these places is coming to be generally recognized throughout the state, and it is being conceded as just by fair-minded men in the northern section.

How the Fight Is Lining Up

A great many friends of Judge Sloss contend, naturally, that he should be renominated, but they are willing to let Southern California name the candidate for the other vacancy. Likewise the friends of Judge Melvin claim that he should be renominated, but are willing that the other vacancy should be filled by a man from the south. In Southern California both Sloss and Melvin have their partisans, and these forces are now lining up.

At the present time Southern California has two candidates, Judge W. P. James and Judge Curtis D. Wilbur, both now serving on the superior bench, Judge Wilbur being presiding judge. The friends of Judge Wilbur quite generally support Judge Sloss rather than Judge Melvin, while the local supporters of Judge James hook their candidate up with the Oakland jurist. It is not improbable, therefore, that the final line-up will be Sloss and Wilbur on the one hand and Melvin and James on the other.

The Strong Points of Judge Wilbur

Without doubt Judge Wilbur is the most popular judge on the bench in Southern California, and he is favorably known all over the state. His popularity among the voters at large is attested by the fact that at the election of November, 1908, he was chosen by the highest vote given to any candidate on the Republican ticket. As judge of the juvenile court his work has attracted widespread attention, even national notice, and he is generally recognized as the Ben Lindsey of Southern California. Judge Wilbur exhibited conspicuous ability as a lawyer before ascending the bench. In the district attorney's office he showed marked ability as a prosecutor. He has been called upon to render many important decisions on the bench and, for a long period, has had fewer reversals than any other judge. His administration has been marked by a complete regeneration in the treatment of wayward boys and girls. Wherever possible he has kept them out of state institutions, giving them an opportunity to "make good" through a splendid system of probation officers, detention home and the parental home. He has also taken a prominent part in the founding of the George Junior Republic and other quasi-public institutions intended to be helpful to boys and girls of wayward tendency. He has a calm, judicial temperament, is a man of broad sympathies and absolute integrity. As a high-minded citizen he has no superior. A side-light shows him as the only judge who ever fined Harrison Gray Otis, head of the Los Angeles Times, for contempt of court.

The Times for Judge James This fact is not apt to render the Times particularly friendly to his candidacy, and possibly accounts for the enthusiasm that paper exhibits in behalf of the candidacy of Judge James, who was formerly a Times reporter. Just how much Judge James will be able to draw from the strength of Judge Wilbur in Southern California cannot be estimated, but it is generally figured that the latter will have the practically solid support of that section, and there is slight risk to one's reputation as a political prophet to venture the prediction that one of the nominees for this post of great honor will be the present presiding judge of the superior court of Los Angeles county.

Judge Melvin a Weak Vote-Getter It may not be amiss at this point to recall the fact that at the election of November, 1908, Judge Melvin ran nearly 30,000 votes behind the head of the ticket, and yet no attack was made upon him anywhere in the state by papers known to be openly hostile to him. Many of the independent Republican papers that were strongly tempted to oppose his candidacy were restrained owing to the fact that he ran in a presidential year and they were afraid that if they attacked him they might endanger the head of the ticket. As it was, Judge Murasky, his Democratic opponent, polled within 25,000 votes of Judge Melvin's total. There is not the remotest doubt that if these papers had opened fire on the Oakland judge he would have gone down in defeat. Judge Melvin's supposed sympathies for the "higher-ups" in San Francisco and his contemptuous treatment of Francis J. Heney have convinced thousands of people in all parts of the state that, whatever qualities he may possess as an after-dinner orator or a singer of vaudeville songs, he is not exactly the style of man who should be elevated into so responsible a position as that of judge of the highest court in the state. In the approaching campaign there will be no presidential election to restrain the newspapers opposed to Melvin, and the probabilities are that they will do several things to him as the campaign progresses—that, of course, provided he enter the lists.

The Democrats Are Also Busy So much for the situation in the ranks of the Republicans. In the meantime the Democrats are not asleep at the switch in Southern California. In particular, the public recognizes the possibility of the candidacy of Judge James resulting in a split vote at the primaries, with the result that Southern California might get no judge at all. In this event a candidate from the south, even though on the Democratic ticket, would stand more than a ghost of a chance of winning. So strong is the sentiment for additional representation on the supreme bench throughout the entire southern section that should Judge Wilbur fail to secure the nomi-

THE MODERN LABOR UNION

III. THE ADVANCE IN PEACEFUL NEGOTIATION.

By CHARLES R. BROWN.

There is already a promising and a growing tendency in the direction of using peaceful measures for securing the settlement of industrial disputes and differences. It has been made plain that powerful organizations of labor and of capital can be led to negotiate in advance, quite as readily as to arbitrate after a clash of rival interests has come. We have in certain industries what has been accurately called by John R. Commons of the University of Wisconsin, "Constitutional Government in Industry." The longshoremen on the Great Lakes, a workmen's organization, and the dock managers, an employers' association, meet regularly twice a year in a parliament with its house of lords composed of the employers and its house of commons made up of the laboring men. Two labor men from each local union make up the lower house; and the upper house, made up of managers, is also representative in character. Each house has veto power over the action of the other—any measure to become operative must pass both houses. Neither side secures all that it desires but each side makes concessions, in the feeling that the compromises of constitutional government are better than civil war; and in this way many threatened strikes have been averted and the peaceful settlement of many vexing differences has been attained.

Parliament of Laborers and Employers.

The bituminous mine operators and the mine workers of four important states in the coal industry, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, for years maintained a similar arrangement for constitutional government, save that here the two houses met together on the same floor, the operators seated on the right and the labor men on the left, of the same assembly. This assembly legislated touching an industry which sends out two hundred millions of dollars worth of product annually. When the representatives of capital and labor met in this annual parliament of two weeks, to discuss the conditions of an industry, where, for years, strife was chronic, bloodshed was frequent and distrust, hatred and poverty almost universal, it was one of the most picturesque and inspiring sights in the modern business world. The leaders of the two sides came together and there face to face, man to man, discussed their differences and conferred upon matters of common interest. Here some six hundred men sat on the same floor, about 450 of them labor men and 150 of them employers. The operators had sixteen votes and the miners sixteen votes, subdivided into four votes for each state. The votes were cast by states by the chairmen of the different organizations. This parliament, like other legislative bodies, worked through committees and in that way more rapidly reached useful results.

The matter of fact, straightforward way in which the various questions were taken up helped to clear the air of all the cant and the pretence which sometimes befog the issue. There was no make-believe on the part of the employers, that their main concern in life was to bestow blessings, deserved and undeserved, upon their men; they were in the coal business for other ends than their personal health or the privilege of acting as philanthropists and they made no bones of saying so. And there was little or none of that spreadeagle style of oratory, on the part of the labor men, which uselessly heats the air with glowing references to the dignity of labor and the abounding iniquity of capital. Instead of all this claptrap each side seemed intent upon getting down to the real business before the meeting. The preliminary agreement to come together and to stay together until they reached a unanimous vote; the knowledge that a failure to do this might mean the shutting down of the mines, cutting off wages from the miners and profits from the operators; the feeling of the capitalist that he could not successfully import scabs to replace these miners, if they should refuse to work, and the feeling on the part of the miners that these capitalists with whom they were negotiating were the men who controlled the opportunities they craved to earn a living for themselves and their families—all this helped to bring about that state of mind which advances the solution of vexed questions. The very fact that such constitutional government in industry, as is here outlined by Professor Commons, is possible, and its high educative value on masters and on men as they come to represent their two sides of the business, is full of encouragement for a more peaceful and satisfactory solution of many other industrial differences in the future.

Case of the Southern Railway.

It must be said also that there is a growing disposition on the part of the workmen to regard the employers' side of the business. In 1893 when times were hard, the Southern Railway, like many other lines, felt compelled to reduce wages. After working under that reduction for some time the men on that railroad made a demand for a restoration of the former wage scale. The committee came to Washington and laid its demands before the managing vice-president of the road. This official, after conference with the other officers, and as was brought out later in the face of their discouraging attitude, invited the men to come again on a later date and he would lay before them the situation which the management of the company had to face. They came on the appointed day and he had prepared for each one a typewritten statement of the receipts and the expenses of the road, a statement as to the reasons for the non-payment of dividends on the stock, an outline of the struggle the company was making in paying interest on its bonds, and the facts in general touching the problems before the management of that road, with its four thousand miles of track and with six thousand men in its employ.

The whole matter was frankly discussed for several days, each side respecting the point of view of the other; some minor injustices were corrected but no general increase of wages was granted. And finally the working men, entirely satisfied now that the facts were laid before them, feeling that the railway magnates had treated them as fellow men concerned with them in an important enterprise, went back to their unions and recommended to those organizations that they continue work under the wage schedule fixed by the management. And thus a strike was averted and a better state of feeling on all hands was secured by this method of negotiation.

Meeting Fairness With Fairness.

There is another well-known instance, reported by Carroll D. Wright, formerly United States Commissioner of Labor, and an acknowledged expert in industrial statistics. The works of Mr. Abram S. Hewitt were at one time running at a loss and wages were reduced 10 per cent. The men in a short time rebelled at the lower compensation and asked to have the former schedule restored. Mr. Hewitt sent this reply to the demand for increase, "It is your right to know the facts and to know why we cannot meet your demand, if we cannot. If you will send an accountant here, he shall have all our books and we will abide by his report." No exception could be taken to a frank offer like this; the men chose an accountant and sent him to make the examination and when he had reported back to the union, the committee again waited upon Mr. Hewitt and said, "We have come to withdraw our request for a restoration of wages. We now know your situation; we know that you are losing money and the union has by unanimous vote asked us to recommend to you a further decrease of 10 per cent. in our wages." The suggestion was not adopted but it serves to illustrate a disposition on the part of the workmen, to meet frankness with frankness, fairness with fairness, a disposition which I firmly believe is steadily on the increase. In the face of the many charges made against labor unions of tyranny, unreasonable selfishness and the like, it is good to give some prominence to these more promising attitudes.

More Intelligent Labor Leadership.

The high value of intelligent labor leadership is seen in the final acceptance of a reduction of wages by the bituminous coal miners in 1904. The falling market of that time led the operators to insist upon a 10 per cent. reduction in wages. After a long conference, however, they agreed to a 5½ per cent. reduction. The union throughout the country strongly opposed any reduction, the action of the president of the union in accepting it was angrily denounced and in his home town bitter resentment of his course was shown in the turning of his picture face to the wall in the halls of the union and by public demonstrations of disapproval. But he and the executive board quietly carried on a campaign of education and at last by referendum vote they were sustained and the whole industry as well as the public was saved the loss of a general strike. All this indicates a growing business sagacity on the part of the union and also an increasing readiness to respond to wise and trusted leadership in the face of possible trouble.

In the great arraignment which the prophet of old makes of a people who were suffering for their moral blindness and stubbornness, he represents the God of all moral value as saying, "Come now, let us reason together." The calm consideration of the issues involved in this manner of life and in that, of the wisdom of pursuing desired ends under the guidance of reason and conscience and the unwisdom of the opposite course, these were to come up for careful survey on both sides, in the hope of inducing a better frame of mind in those who were at fault. It is the everlasting method of making advance anywhere toward those solutions which really solve something.

"Come now, let us reason together"—it is the call which ought to issue from every labor union meeting when some wrong is being discussed, it may be in angry tones! And the same inspired and inspiring call might well issue from some business office where the hot-headed insistence of some man upon his supposed "right to run his own business in his own way," without careful regard to the ultimate effect of his methods upon the health, the homes, the growing children of those other men whose lives are bound up with his own in the conduct of that enterprise, is threatening the peaceful solution of differences. Come now, let us reason together—it is the only way to make advance toward a peaceable and an equitable settlement of any industrial dispute.

A PECULIARITY OF THE WIRELESS.

Guglielmo Marconi, the discoverer of wireless telegraphy, recently received the Nobel prize for physics, and, at that time, in an address delivered before a body of scientists in Stockholm, called attention to a peculiar and little known fact connected with wireless telegraphy. This was the fact that daylight exercises an injurious effect upon the transmission of electric waves. For this reason messages can be transmitted decidedly farther and more successfully at night than in the daytime. So true is this that when a ship is under clear skies it sometimes is impossible to communicate with it, when a ship farther away, but under clouded skies, is readily reached. In attempting to account for this fact, Marconi suggests that illuminated air, for some at present inexplicable reason, probably absorbs some of the energy of the electric waves.

HENRY CLAY'S LAST PORTRAIT.

Carefully wrapped in cotton there is in an Auburn, N. Y., home the last portrait ever made of Henry Clay, says the New York Sun. The portrait is a fine specimen of the daguerreotype and it shows the famous Kentuckian in all his ugliness. It is owned by its maker, G. L. Reynolds, who tells the following story in connection with it:

"In the '50s I was a professional daguerreotype artist, and in my travels I reached Lexington, Ky. My firm, Reynolds & Ryder of New York, had sent me purposely to get a picture of Henry Clay, and when I reached Lexington I was dismayed at the stories I heard. Clay had refused everybody and only a few days before my arrival he had refused to sit for a man who had come all the way from Boston and who wanted a portrait to aid him in making a bust of Mr. Clay.

"There are plenty of pictures of me when I was young and better looking," said Mr. Clay, and he refused to sit.

"I was discouraged, but in looking around I met a man who said: 'If there is any man in the world who can do it Coombs can,' and I was introduced to Gen. Leslie Coombs. He kindly agreed to ask Mr. Clay to sit as a personal favor to him, and I agreed to give him a copy of the daguerreotype and to keep the original unpublished.

"On the following Monday I went to Clay's home at Ashland, a mile from Lexington, with my letter of introduction from General Coombs. I banged the big old-fashioned knocker on the door, and instead of a negro Mr. Clay came to the door himself and shook hands with me.

"When I told him my errand and said I had a letter from General Coombs he did not even ask to see the letter, but agreed to sit for me. He said that he had not sat for his portrait for years and was satisfied to let posterity look upon his younger features, but would sit for the General.

"When I arrived his negro, Jack, was just hitching up his team and he asked me, 'How did you come over?' I said that I had walked, and he said, 'Wait until my horses are ready and ride with me. I am going over to Lexington.' So I rode back with him and on the way he told me about having heard Jenny Lind sing for him privately at Washington a few days before that. He said she was the most wonderful singer he had ever heard in his life.

"I had a stick of ash with me. You see, while I was waiting at Ashland I got one of his slaves to get me an ash stick to make a cane. He split off a piece of an old ash rail and gave it to me, and I took it to Lexington with me and later had a cane made of it. Somebody stole it many years afterward.

"When I got out of the carriage I asked Mr. Clay when he would come to my studio and he said, 'I am coming over to the Bank of Kentucky to-morrow at noon and I'll sit for you then.' Then he drove on through Lexington.

"I was afraid that he would forget the engagement, so I had the darkey boy who did my chores watch for him next day. He saw him go into the bank and told me and I sent him over a note. Mr. Clay said that he had entirely forgotten the sitting but that he would come right over, and he came within a few minutes.

"I suppose I ought to adjust my wardrobe a little?" he asked.

"I said, 'No, Mr. Clay, if it is the same to you I'd be pleased to have you just as you are,' and he sat down with his coat all wrinkled and I got him just as you see him in the picture. Then he got up and didn't even ask to see the picture when it was done, and he never saw it.

"It took me only a few minutes to finish it and after making a copy for General Coombs—he was one of the 'Three Great C's of Kentucky,' Clay, Crittenden and Coombs—I took the original back to New York and have treasured it ever since. It has never been published.

"Henry Clay died soon after I took that picture, his death occurring in Washington, and I am sure it was the last ever made of him. He must have been at least seventy-five years old when I took it."

EARLY AMERICAN MAGAZINES.

A large number of early American magazines, some rare, others interesting, and others curious, were recently exhibited at an auction in New York, says the New York Times. Among them were found: The American Magazine, published by Benjamin Franklin in Philadelphia in 1746, and containing early American poetry; The American Magazine, a Monthly Chronicle for the British Colonies, edited by William Smith and Printed by William Bradford in New York, 1757-58; The American Museum, or Repository of Ancient and Modern Fugitive Pieces, Philadelphia, 1788, containing a list of subscribers' names, among which are those of Aaron Burr, Alexander Hamilton, Rufus King, and Robert Morris; the American Register, or General Repository of History, Politics, and Science, Philadelphia, 1807-10, a full set of this rare periodical, of which only seven volumes were issued, edited by Charles Brockden Brown; Vols. I and II of the American Magazine, Philadelphia, 1789-90, originally owned by the distinguished revolutionary patriot, Isaac Shelby, and having his autograph on the title of each volume.

Others in the collection are the Evening Fireside, Philadelphia, 1804-5, one of the scarce early magazines; the Harvard Lyceum, Cambridge, 1811, edited by Edward Everett and contributed to by James Fenimore Cooper and fellow members of the class of 1811; the Ordeal, a critical journal of politics and literature, Boston, 1809; the Pennsylvania Magazine, or American Monthly Monitor, published in Philadelphia in 1775, containing "Death of Gen. Wolfe, Set to Music by a Gentleman of This Country, the Words by Atlanticus," etc., autograph of Elias Boudinot on the first page; the Pennsylvania Magazine for 1776, containing the Declaration of Independence, and "Something, Edited by Nemo Somebody," Boston, 1809-10, a scarce periodical, edited by James Fennell, the comedian and author.

William Archer gives us an illustration of American humor: A Chicago man travelling in Louisiana wrote to his sweetheart: "Dear Mamie:—I have shot an alligator. When I have shot another, I will send you a pair of slippers."—As Others See Us.

THE assumption of a partnership in the Loose Gold mining camp hotel's proprietorship by William Stathley, late graduate of Harvard, was not traceable to the then widespread gold fever, nor to an unpleasantly romantic past, nor to any of the various reasons to which the presence of most other members of the community might be assigned. Overwork at college had produced that anæmic condition of mind and body which is fecund soil for consumption, and in consequence his doctor had thought to ward off the disease by ordering a period of "roughing it" in California. Though amply supplied with funds he did not wish his temporary absence from his chosen profession of the law to be a total loss, and the transient character of the people in a new country suggested profit in the hotel business.

The free spirit of the little mining town quickly took possession of him, as it did of nearly every man who ever encountered it, and he soon fell comfortably into at least the more wholesome part of the life about him. Men of every conceivable status of character and attainments there mingled familiarly, animated by the common quest of gold and the generous fellow feeling of comrades in hardship.

At the present moment the town was quiet, business dull. A reported "strike" up Halo creek had stampeded such of the population as could get away. As Stathley and his partner, Dave Boltus, were discussing the situation in the waiting room of the Laurelia hotel, the heat lit up the dusty road outside with yellow splendor, and quivering in the air of Halo Gulch, made the hazy blue mountainside opposite appear to be heaving as if panting with the heavy air. The conversation was interrupted by the entrance of an unshaven, disorganized-looking man whose presence strongly exhaled the aroma of the bar. His walk was sufficiently firm, however, and he approached Boltus as a familiar acquaintance. Before speaking he squared himself in front of that gentleman, drew a deep breath through distended nostrils and raised one hand in a gesture of commanding attention.

"Will yez listen tuh me?" he demanded, in singularly rich and sonorous tones.

"Yes," impassively responded Boltus.

"Won't yuh gimme a dime?"

This astonishing plea was delivered in a manner pitifully contrasted with his first appearance. His grandiose air was gone and instead there was the snivelling whine, hunched shoulders, drooped eyes of the habitual sycophant.

"No," replied Boltus, "I won't. I've given you money before that you've spent on liquor and you'd do it again now."

"No. Swear it, no. Le-le-let me tell yuh, Dave. I want to buy a meal. I've quit drink in,' honest, Dave."

"If you want a meal, why don't you ask for it? We're runnin' a hotel. You want liquor. And you ain't stopped drinkin,' either. What's that on your breath?"

The man hung his head, unable to reply. For a moment both were silent; then he threw back his shoulders and resumed the defiant attitude of his entrance.

"Will yez listen tuh me?"

"O, yes, we'll listen to you. What is it?"

He hesitated a moment. The head drooped again.

"Gimme a dime!"

Stathley turned away in disgust, but more sick at heart.

"No, I won't give you a dime, Dan. You go home and sober up and then we'll talk to you."

The man started irresolutely toward the door, and Stathley looked again. As he reached the exit he turned to the pair and gazed at them with the muddled malevolence of a man half drunk. Slowly he raised his fist.

"Ye're all Roman fathers in hyer, and may ye be damned fer it."

Stathley was interested.

"Roman fathers? Where did you ever hear anything about Roman fathers? Did you ever read a book?"

The man gazed long and contemptuously at Stathley.

"Did I ever read a book?"

ARTHUR RACH

His eyes gleamed, his chest heaved, his declamatory voice returned.

"What does Macauley say about Lord Byron? 'From his poetry his enthusiasts drew a system of ethics composed of misanthropy and voluptuousness; a system in which the two great commandments were, to hate your neighbor and to love your neighbor's wife.'"

The next moment Stathley and Boltus were alone.

"Who is that freak?" inquired the Harvard graduate.

"Well, I ain't tellin' everybody, but you're my pard and can keep yer mouth, so I don't mind tellin' you. First I knew of him, he was a good lawyer in my town in Ohio and he wasn't anybody's fool, either. He went to college like you and in his business he done well. His people up in Massachusetts were away up, and he went with the best in Ohio. Well, he run across some pretty girl there and married her. She was out of the gutter compared to him, but he liked her and thought he could make her his sort by making her his wife. It's the old story of the blood and bone. First year all was lovely. Then she began to show she wasn't made over. She had notions and a temper and she stormed at him when she was crossed, and she bled him for every cent he could spare and abused him because it wasn't more. He thought she was just spoiled and wanted more money to splurge on, so at last he got desperate and told her one day he'd be back in a year, and skipped. He left her what cash he could and came West here where he knew I'd come a couple of years ago. It's 'bout a year now since he come and the gold business he hoped to get her money with hasn't turned out. She don't know where he is, nor none of the town people, and I ain't tellin' 'em, either. What's happened there since he left I get in letters from wife. Seems it got to be town talk after Dan left that Mrs. Williams was takin' kindly to the attention of Luke Mitchell. Suddenly Luke disappeared. Ain't been heard from since. Month or so ago Mrs. Williams goes without leavin' word. You can put two and two together from that and guess six. Williams, here, don't know these last facts, but it's my private opinion for future public consumption that Mrs. Williams' tantrums wasn't due to lack of money, but to preference for another fellow, and the money she got out of him was laid by for a time she hoped to make come. That's about all I know of it. Dan gets wild sometimes because his claim don't show a bonanza streak, and then he goes on a spree. He'll come around."

Stathley meditated a good deal all morning upon the peculiar turns that fate and circumstance may seem to force upon a man, and he was so deeply involved in these philosophic questions that he failed to note particularly the various people deposited by the stage at the hotel door. The early afternoon heat grew more intense and the outlines of the pine-clad slopes more clearcut as the air drank up the mists. The heavy odor of tansy pervaded the gulch and under the somnolent influence of heat and fragrance he drifted into a doze, faintly conscious as he did so of seeing up the road the figure of Dan Williams lurching out of the Royal Arcade saloon, evidently more potently under the sway of liquor. The peaceful quiet of his slumbers was broken a few moments later by Williams' entrance, and begging for a place to sleep off his intoxication. Stathley guided him into a corner behind the counter where he could lie out of sight and quickly forgot him in a return to his own nap. Late in the afternoon his rest was again broken, this time by his partner, greatly excited.

"Member what I told you about Dan this mornin'? Well, by George, his wife's here in this hotel. She came in on the noon stage, and that infernal scoundrel, Luke Mitchell, is along. Neither of 'em ever had anything to do with me back yonder, so they don't recognize me, but I know them. And —"

"Sh!" cautioned Stathley. "Dan's in here," pointing to the corner.

Boltus stepped over and looked behind the counter.

"Drunk and asleep. He won't hear. Well, sir, if that pair ain't a precious one. They got their license at Mariposa as they came through and the parson's to get here at 10 o'clock tonight and marry them. They told me to have the parlor ready. Cooke came in with 'em and they've bought out his range and the C-cross brand and are going to settle. I figure she thinks Dan's dead somewhere East, and she thinks California's a good place to get away from what Ohio folks know of her and start in with that Luke Mitchell. But Dan ain't dead, and if—if he should run across 'em after they're married, wouldn't it be a mess? She'd be in a fix."

"We must get Dan away from here before he sees her," suggested Stathley, "and then stop that wedding. If that comes off and it gets out here how things stand, Mitchell and she'd string, sure. And think how it would hit Dan."

The man behind the counter was slowly gaining his feet. He seemed to have just awakened from long sleep, but appeared recovered from his liquor, and pulled himself together in a moment.

"Dan," said Dave, "you must go home right now and stay there a week. Hear me? Don't come around town again for a week. Promise?"

"Dave, I'll promise if ye'll do something for me. You and yer partner come up to my shack after supper tonight. I've got something I want to talk to you two about."

"Right after supper?"

"Yes. But promise faithful you'll come."

"All right, on honor," both promised, "if it's early after supper."

"By the way, Dave, give me some of that carbolic acid you keep for bugs. They're getting bad up at the shack and I want to fix them."

Boltus gave him some in the bottom of a flask. When Williams was gone, he said:

"We can get back in time to stop the wedding business if we go early."

Stathley was curious to see the woman who had driven one man to drink and was leading the other upon the brink of a great sin. At the supper table she appeared, vivacious, coarse, and at intervals displayed whims of temper that suggested what Boltus had described as a characteristic.

After the meal the two left the hotel for their appointment with Williams. As they started up the road Mitchell hailed them. He explained that the clergyman whom they had engaged had sent word he could not come, and they had decided to go on the 8 o'clock stage to Wawona. He paid the bill and left Stathley and Boltus in a quandary.

"Well, as long as they are away from here, I guess we can't stop 'em," was the conclusion of Boltus. "Let's go on and see what Dan wants."

They reached the cabin, but found it dark. No greeting answered their knock, and with a sudden sense of uneasiness they pressed in. In a chair, his face disfigured beyond recognition by the acid, and with a bullet through his heart, sat Dan Williams. On the table was a note.

"Dear Dave:

"I saw her and I heard you. For my sake let her alone and never tell anyone I was her husband. Thank you beforehand for what I know you will do in friendship to me. Burn this."

"DAN."

FATHER CROWLEY CONCURS.

Father D. O. Crowley was appointed a member of the committee whose report on the graft conditions appeared in the last number of The California Weekly. Father Crowley was severely injured by an automobile early in the investigations of the committee, and was unable to attend its later deliberations. He did, however, heartily endorse the aims of his fellow members of the committee, their integrity of purpose, and their concluding recommendations, in the following letter:

"William Denman Esq., Chairman of the "Committee on Investigation Into "Causes of Municipal Corruption in
"San Francisco.

"Dear Mr. Denman:—I have just gone over the report of our committee and wish to assure you of my hearty approval of the recommendations made at the end thereof.

"It is with great regret that, on account of my sickness and absence from many of our meetings, I am unable to sign the findings of the report. This is not because I disagree with any of them, but because I am unable either to disagree or agree with several, not having heard the evidence on which they rest.

"You do not need to be assured that, as far as my connection with the committee is concerned, I have never felt out of harmony with the ideals and aims of my confreres, nor any doubt as to the integrity of their purpose.

"Yours sincerely,

"D. O. CROWLEY."

ARTISTIC RECLUSES.

(From Tit-Bits.)

Carlyle once remarked when a friend chided him for being such a recluse that social life was work's greatest enemy. The Chelsea Sage considered that a man must shun acquaintances and friends if he wished to give the world his best work, and a study of the lives of some present day geniuses shows that it is total absorption in their work which causes them to hide from the public gaze.

Take the case of Matthew Maris, for instance, the well-known painter, whose picture "Four Mills" fetched 3,300 guineas at Christie's a few days ago. Maris lives in strict seclusion in London lodgings, the whereabouts of which is only known to about half a dozen people. He is now an old man of seventy years of age and rarely leaves his study. And not only does he hide himself from the public, but he also hides his pictures. He has not sold a painting for years, although dealers are willing to pay thousands of pounds for them, as is evident from the prices fetched by those which are occasionally put up for auction.

Maris reminds one of the great Italian sculptor, Vincenzo Gemito, who twenty years ago shut himself in his study and refused to leave it. To a certain extent Gemito's reason had become unsettled owing to overwork and distressing mental suffering and one of the reasons why he would not leave his study was that he feared the attacks of fantastic foes, who were the figments of his disordered brain, but his malady in no way interfered with his work. For twenty years Gemito has been working hard at the production of statuettes, real masterpieces, which he modelled and remodelled time after time, bringing them to the highest degree of perfection.

It was reported a few days ago, however, that Gemito had been induced to leave his study by no less a personage than the Duchess of Aosta, who frequently visited him. She succeeded in inducing him to go to the royal palace and, accompanied by two relatives, Gemito left his house and walked along the sunny streets of Naples. At the palace he was cheerfully greeted by the Duke and Duchess of Aosta, who entertained him for a considerable time. The effect was magical. Throwing off the depressing gloom of years the aged sculptor returned home full of joy, declaring that he would come out again and enjoy life.

For the first time for some years Tolstoy left his home at the beginning of October to pay a visit to a friend in Moscow. The famous Russian has for many years led a peaceful and quiet life on his estate at Yasnaya Polyana, which is situated about 130 miles south of Moscow, amid forests and surrounded by beautiful hilly country, devoting his time between writing and outdoor labor, clad in the picturesque blue smock of the Russian peasant. Tolstoy, however, while refusing to mix with the world, is ever ready to receive visitors. The consequence is that, although Yasnaya Polyana is by no means easy of access, many pilgrims find their way thither to pay their respects to the preacher of obedience to Christian principles.

In a little cottage of the simplest kind at Bromley, Kent, lives Prince Kropotkin, the famous Russian exile, whose revolutionary teachings led to several terms of imprisonment, while serving one of which he escaped to England. The Prince rarely leaves his Bromley home, where he writes his books and indulges in his favorite hobbies of book binding and carpentry. He is a man who has suffered even more than Tolstoy for his ideas, and still seeks by his writings to ameliorate the conditions under which the Russian peasant lives.

Tolstoy and Kropotkin remind one very much of Bjornson, the famous Norwegian poet, who hides himself from the world in a little house at Christiania. Bjornson was an intimate friend of Ibsen and never cared for the social world. He has a great contempt for a man who seeks social triumphs, and since Ibsen's death has become even more strict in his seclusion. He seldom leaves his study or receives friends.

Maurice Maeterlinck, who has been called the "Belgian Shakespeare," has immured himself in Normandy at a ruined abbey which he has made his home. Now and again he gives the world some new masterpiece, but people seldom have an opportunity of seeing the genius who has made for himself a name as one of the greatest of living thinkers.

ants, should not be forgotten. The members of the board of supervisors should be named individually, that the credit for their services may be remembered of each as a private citizen. They were: Paul Bancroft, James P. Booth, William Broderick, George Center, A. Comte, Jr., Oscar Hocks, Thomas Jennings, James H. Johnston, M. H. McAllister, Ralph McLeran, Charles A. Murdock, Daniel C. Murphy, Henry Payot, Allan Pollok, and, during parts of the administration, A. A. D'Ancona, W. W. Sanderson, W. E. Balcomb, A. H. Giannini, Matt Harris, Sr., George A. Connolly, Lippman Sachs, W. G. Stafford, and Loring P. Rixford.

nation the people probably would turn to a Democrat; for they strongly feel that the character and amount of litigation from the south are so important that Southern California must have better representation in the court of last resort. Incidentally, it is strongly intimated that the James candidacy is being encouraged by the machine in the hope of splitting the southern vote sufficiently to defeat the nomination of Judge Wilbur.

Boom for D. K. Trask Many influential Democrats in Los Angeles have quietly inaugurated a boom for D. K. Trask, formerly a judge on the superior bench in Los Angeles. Judge Trask is a man of high personal character and unusual professional attainments. He is well-liked and thoroughly respected by the people of Los Angeles and vicinity, irrespective of politics. As a member of Mayor Alexander's first police commission he won thousands of friends among the Republicans here. A man like Trask as a candidate for the supreme court, if he were the only candidate at the general election from Southern California, would poll a tremendous Republican vote south of the Tehachapi.

James A. Anderson Is Also Mentioned Another name the Democrats are conjuring with in this connection is that of James A. Anderson, formerly president of the Los Angeles Bar Association. Mr. Anderson has never served on the bench, but his qualifications for an eminent judicial position are generally recognized, and if he will consent to become a candidate he will be assured of most cordial and effective support from Southern California.

Two Other Democrats The possible candidates from the northern part of the state most commonly mentioned by the Democrats are Judge Maurice Dooling of San Benito county, and Judge Frank J. Murasky of San Francisco. Either unquestionably would make a strong run, for the records of both are impeccable.

He Both Made Good And Made Himself Free Amidst all the political talk the important office of State Treasurer is escaping attention, and that would not be occasion for regret if it could be taken to mean that the present Treasurer, William R. Williams, will be re-elected by general consent, for he is the strongest and safest man who has filled the office for a long time. He has had some difficult work to perform, for on him fell the duty of working out the details of the new system of depositing State funds, in place of locking them up, and as he elaborated it the scheme has gone like clock-work. For the last two years and a half the State has had on deposit in a large number of banks, under protection of ample bond security, from three and a half to four and a half millions of dollars; not a dollar of public money has been lost, or even jeopardized for a moment, although during the time the country has gone through a financial panic, and the State is collecting between $75,000 and $100,000 a year in interest—so much money found which used to be thrown away. Mr. Williams was the author of a series of bills in the last Legislature which if passed would have further modernized the fiscal arrangements of the State and been of great convenience to all who have to do business with it. But while it is admitted on all hands that Williams' management of the department has been excellent, there is some feeling against him on the part of the political machine because he has been independent and has openly avowed his support of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League. He was nominated at the Santa Cruz convention, and the machine thinks it ought to own every office-holder who was named at that gathering. It don't near own State Treasurer W. R. Williams.

Finding Out The Program There is a branch of politics in which the professional takes an immense interest and the ordinary citizen a mild one; it is finding out "what is the program"—meaning the program made up by the established organization. While the independent citizen is interested in the program principally to avoid falling into the traps it provides, the professional, who looks to politics for his livelihood, regards the program with reverence and is concerned profoundly to discover the program in order that he may follow it. To him what is a program is right and everything else is wrong on principle. There is a story that during the height of John L. Sullivan's vogue as champion pugilist of the country, when he was almost deified, a certain devout follower of his said: "No sporting man ought to be married; John L. Sullivan is not married." "But you are mistaken about that," said his friend, "John L. Sullivan is married." "Is that so?" exclaimed the astounded worshiper. "Why, then, every sporting man ought to be married." All of the Republican politicians of the State are now praying to have the program delivered to them, and for some unexplained reason it is being delayed beyond precedent. Every little while some of them will start off on the theory that they have discovered the authentic program, but they soon return, as from the pursuit of a false scent, and daily the discontent and irritation grows that the true program is not handed down. It is really cruel of Mr. Herrin to keep such faithful followers so long in the dark.

PERSONALIA

General James B. Weaver, many times a Presidential candidate on Populist tickets, has turned into "divine healer" in his old age.

Bryn Mawr college has just received a splendid gift amounting to $7,000 from one of its alumnae, Miss Cynthia M. Wesson, of the class of 1909.

William M. Ampt, the Cincinnati lawyer, bequeathed his estate of $150,000, after his widow shall have had the use of it, to provide concerts for the people.

Mr. Rockefeller and Mr. Carnegie are both making unprecedented records, but at the end of 1909 Mr. Rockefeller had given away $181,760,162, as against Mr. Carnegie's $162,000,000. Together they have distributed in the form of free gifts $343,760,162.

Not only Mrs. Cleveland, Mrs. Roosevelt and Mrs. Garfield are surviving mistresses of the White House, but also Mrs. John E. McElroy of Albany, who presided there "with such elegance and grace during the presidency of her distinguished brother, Chester A. Arthur."

Henry Phipps of New York, founder of the institute in Philadelphia bearing his name and designed to war on tuberculosis, is to turn its control over to the trustees of the University of Pennsylvania. A new hospital is to be built at Seventh and Lombard streets at an expenditure of over $500,000.

Levi P. Morton at 86 assumes the chairmanship of the board of one of the two largest trust companies in the country. That, to be sure, is "going some." The office no doubt will be more or less honorary, but at that age it is a good deal to be able to get around just to collect the director's fee.

Dr. Carl Webber, still practicing in New York city, performed in 1866 the first operation for appendicitis. There was no knowledge of stomach cutting at that time. The operation was performed without antiseptics. The instruments and appliances were comparatively primitive. The patient is alive and well in New York.

Mrs. Julia Ward Howe is said to be largely responsible for the election of George H. Fall as Mayor of Malden, Mass. During the campaign one of Mr. Fall's opponents wrote a letter saying that though Mr. Fall had served in the legislature he had done nothing to attract attention. Mrs. Howe sent an immediate answer reminding the voters that it was Mr. Fall who introduced and carried through the legislature the bill making mothers equal guardians of their minor children with fathers. Mr. Fall and his wife are both lawyers.

A. Henry Peterson of the Seattle office of the United States shipping commissioner's department, has hanging on his office wall a map of Alaska which is something of a curiosity. Like most sailors of the old school, Peterson is a handy man with the needle, and in the spare time at his disposal it took him ten months to make the map. It is all of silk embroidery, and nearly 500 skeins of silk thread were used in its manufacture. The different divisions of country are done in different colored silk, and all the names are worked in. The map is complete in detail.

James L. Davenport, the new United States commissioner of pensions, was born in Hindale, N. H. When the Civil War broke out he was 16 years old, the New Hampshire recruiting officers would not take him, and so he ran away and enlisted in the Fortieth Wisconsin Regiment of Volunteers. Because of a severe illness he was invalided home in 1864 and settled in Keene, N. H., which he has since called home. He became a commercial traveler for a wholesale Boston grocery house in 1870. In 1881 he was made a clerk in the pension office in Washington, and in 1897 President McKinley appointed him first deputy commissioner. Now President Taft has made him commissioner. Mr. Davenport has voted in Keene at every national and state election since 1868. He is 64 years old.

"I'd hate to be a millionaire." "Gosh! Why?" "Well, millionaires are always getting letters threatening them with all sorts of horrible fates unless they immediately pay the writers large sums of money." "That's nothing. I get just such letters on the first of every month."—Cleveland Leader.

"Ever noticed it?" queried the party who propounds queries on the installment plan. "Did I ever notice what?" asked the other, who did not even pretend to be a mind reader. "That the person who finds fault invariably insists upon returning it to the owner," concluded he of the prelude.—Chicago News.

A would-be author called on Mr. Fields one day at his office in the old-time Boston publishing house of Ticknor & Fields. Evidently the young man did not like Mr. Fields' appearance, for this was the conversation that took place. "Is this Mr. Fields?" "It is, sir." "Mr. James T. Fields?" "I am, sir." "Well, then, I'd like to see Mr. Ticknor!"

James R. Keene, apropos of the jumping contests at the New York horse show, talked about fox hunting, says the Washington Star. "Hunting," said he, "develops a race of very savage, selfish men. There was, for instance, Jones. Jones, on a bitter cold day, was riding hard at a brook, when he perceived the head of his dearest friend sticking dismally out of the icy water. Did Jones go to his friend's assistance? Not a bit of it. 'Duck, you fool!' he shouted, and jumped over him."

Close Quarters.

A friend was complaining the other day to Captain Barber, port captain of the state pilots of California, about the crowded conditions of a steamer on which he recently made a trip.

"Four in a room?" replied Barber. "That's nothing. You should have traveled in the days of the gold rush to California. I remember one trip out of New York we carried more than one thousand passengers, and if you put fifty on that ship to-day there'd be a holler that would make trouble for somebody. Three days out from New York a chap walked up to the old man and said,

"Captain, you must really find me a place to sleep."

"Where in the thunder have you been sleeping until now?" asked the old man.

"Well," says the fellow, "you see, it's this way. I've been sleeping on a sick man, but he's getting better now and won't stand for it much longer."—Cosmopolitan Magazine.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The Secretary of State.

The Secretary of State is the record keeper of the state government. This general function is subdivided into a great diversity of duties, and others more or less outside the original conception of the office have been added from time to time by the legislature. He registers and certifies to the acts of the governor, such as appointments, pardons, patents and extraditions; he preserves the original bills and resolutions passed by the legislature, and issues the printed volumes of statutes and journals; he has the custody of the great seal of the state; he is the keeper of the archives and the state sealer of weights and measures; he records all articles of incorporation and issues certificates of incorporation; and he is ex-officio a member of more boards and commissions than any other state officer except the governor.

In late years the secretaryship of state has become a great revenue office through the collection of large amounts of fees for recording and also corporation licenses. Ten years ago the total receipts of the office did not amount to more than thirty thousand dollars per year, while now they are nearly thirty times as great, or nine hundred thousand dollars. This result has been brought about by increasing largely the fees charged for filing articles of incorporation and similar documents, inasmuch that, with the large growth which has taken place in the number of filings, the receipts from this source now amount to two hundred thousand dollars; by establishing the corporation license tax, which brings in more than six hundred thousand dollars annually, and by the automobile license, which produces twenty thousand annually. Other receipts of the office are from the sale of ballot paper, statutes and various other official publications. It has been the policy of the state to distribute gratuitously most of its publications, but the statutes and a few other publications it sells.

To support the office of the Secretary of State, with all its connections, costs the state not far from a hundred thousand dollars a year, and this expense, like the revenues collected, has grown rapidly in recent years. In one way and another, the "patronage" of the office, outside of the number of clerks and others employed, is large, because the Secretary of State is the purchasing agent of the government for various classes of supplies used by the state officers and the legislature. He is the superintendent of the capitol building and buys the furniture and carpets and makes necessary repairs—all meaning the expenditure of considerable sums of money and the employ of many janitors, watchmen, firemen, and electricians.

The most important relations of the Secretary of State to the public come through his membership of the Board of Examiners, the Lunacy Commission and the Board of Forestry. He is also a member of the Capitol Commission and other less weighty government bodies. Belonging to the Board of Examiners, he is brought into intimate contact with the finances of the state and can exercise a wholesome influence or the reverse; he can save the state's money or can introduce laxity and wastefulness in all the departments, because upon the manner in which its accounts are checked up depends the conduct of almost every office, board or commission. If he chooses to do politics, and "make friends" at the expense of the taxpayers, the Secretary of State can be a public evil of no small proportions; and, on the other hand, if he is stubbornly honest, thoroughly independent, and regards the state's affairs as business rather than politics, he can render splendid service to the people. The Governor is busy with a thousand other affairs of moment, the Attorney General is only in Sacramento occasionally, and so the Secretary of State is likely to be a very important personage in this powerful commission, the State Board of Examiners, which is a sort of small legislature, largely governing the state when the greater legislature is not in session.

Through his membership of the Lunacy Commission the Secretary of State has a hand in the control of six great hospitals containing nearly seven thousand patients and spending all the time more and more of the taxpayers' money. The system under the general supervision, if not management, of the Lunacy Commission is so extensive that it means a great deal to the state to have the right kind of man for Secretary of State on this account as well as other accounts. And on the Forestry Board he is dealing with another set of public problems of magnitude, calling for their successful solution for the broadest qualities of mind.

The truth of the matter is that the office of Secretary of State has come to be much more far-reaching than it should be, but men love power and the secretary himself is about the last man to object to the variety or importance of his activities.

The Aviation Meet.

LOS ANGELES LOVES to be up in the air. No inconsiderable part of her real estate is up there and so are all of her ideals, and now the aviation meet has proven the upper regions accessible. The next we know they will be staked out and adorned with "for sale" signs. Seriously, however, that aviation meet was characteristically "Los Angelic." It was also characteristically successful. It advertised Los Angeles all over the world and brought all the people to town to spend their money, two fat canvasbacks killed with one stone! Our congratulations.

Look Out, Uncle Sam!

IT IS TO BE HOPED that the keen eye of Uncle Sam will not fail of falling upon the expose of the Copper River enterprise which will be found in this paper. Unless our source of information proves to have been fearfully at fault, as we do not apprehend that it will, the most colossal swindle of the decade is about to be worked on the United States government by the Morgan-Guggenheim interests. Read every word of the story and then tell your friends what you have read and where you saw it. That will promote investigation and investigation will make the truth clear. The syndicate in question has a white elephant up in the snows that it is plotting to sell to the government through a bond guaranty scheme. Money is being used to make Pacific Coast sentiment in favor of Alaskan development at government expense. The fact that the San Francisco Chronicle interested itself in this is sufficiently suspicious to put the public on its guard and we anticipate that the Chronicle will be reinforced by the Oakland Tribune, the Post-Globe, the gutter weeklies and the Los Angeles Times. If this turns out to be so we shall all know that the Copper River enterprise is bogus. The California Weekly cannot afford to have the Copper River valley explored, but Uncle Sam's geodetic, geologic and topographical surveys can, and the forestry and reclamation services can help. Not until all these have reported favorably should a bond be guaranteed. Look out, Uncle Sam!

The President's Measures Prearranged.

NOTHING ELSE in the Taft administration, so far, has been so promising of good results, by and by, as his having whipped into definite form, in the shape of bills to be introduced in the proper houses, his principal recommendations to congress. If he has the American people behind him his bills in congress will have the American people behind them. This system is British, we know, but so are all our best methods of getting things political done. What other presidents have done covertly Taft has done openly with the evident purpose of establishing a precedent. In this he has taken a splendid forward step.

Feast of Reason and Flow of Fists.

ACCORDING TO THE EXAMINER Mayor McCarthy, at Monterey, Wednesday evening, announced it as his purpose, "To bring to San Francisco every event of note capable of being conducted within the spirit of the law, so that the people of our own state, as well as people from abroad, may find themselves rubbing elbows and exchanging ideas and so familiarize themselves with the needs of California." This is splendidly laudable. But the Mayor went on to exemplify his quality and caliber by adding: "I have in mind at the present moment the heavyweight, scientific boxing contest between Jeffries and Johnson over which the people of the whole world are interested, and I hope it will come off in San Francisco." Great idea! All right for you, Mc-Carthy! A great intellectual and scientific hippodrome! Wonderful opportunity for intellectual giants to "rub elbows and familiarize themselves with the needs of California." A Daniel come to judgment! Feast of reason and flow of fists!

The Ballinger Committee.

THE ATTEMPT OF THE REPUBLICAN CAUCUS in the house of representatives to override the choice of the Democratic caucus as to the Democratic representation on the Ballinger investigating committee was outrageous. This investigation is a childish affair at best. Only one possible good can come of it and that is to have the whole dispute publicly aired. Ballinger is accused of nothing worse than having a bad disposition, a disposition to favor predatory interests as against the public interests, and the possession of a bad disposition is hardly susceptible of conviction. His sincerity is attacked rather than his conduct. He is accused of having committed no crime. There is nothing that the committee can find him guilty of except a "strong weakness" for the wrong side. To be wrongly inclined unfits him for a place in the President's cabinet, but it does not fit him for prison or for impeachment.

Needham for Speaker.

REPORT HAS IT that the California delegation are to push the claims of Representative J. C. Needham for speaker to succeed Cannon. If the rules of the house were, meantime, to be so revised as to enable the house itself, and not the speaker, to make up the committees, Mr. Needham would make a perfectly fair presiding officer, but he has not the timber in him for a czar. Therefore, if the speaker is still to be a czar, the house will not choose Mr. Needham. The interests will want tougher timber and the insurgents will want tougher timber to stand off the interests. Needham is not yet case-hardened in sin. Cannon is worn-out. The interests will drop him and try to find another as near like him as possible to take his place. Cannonism will be perpetuated if it be possible. Cannon will be permitted to go to his place as soon as Satan will consent to the intrusion.

Will Fight Another Day.

RUSSIA IS REPORTED to have declined, with renewed assurances of its profoundest consideration for the United States, the proposal of Secretary Knox that the Manchurian railroad systems be made the subject of international investment and impartial operation. Japan is known to be reluctant also. Without a buffer state between them the recent peace between those two countries will prove little better than a prolonged armistice. The peace of the world requires that Manchuria be made a buffer state. Why may not the other nations of the world force that buffer in?

The New States Can Wait.

THE SENATE, WHICH IS THE UNITED STATES government, has decided, with the concurrence of the President (who generally has to concur whether he wishes to or not) that Arizona and New Mexico can wait another year for statehood. So they can. The decision is wise. They will be a year older in 1911 and presumably more sort of settled down. There is no hurry about their coming in. They can't get away. They will be there when we want them, and the more sobriety they acquire before they come in the better for the rest of the nation.

THE REAL WORK OF THE LEAGUE.

We favor the election of a state administration free from control by the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Railroad company, and allied interests, and pledged to a policy of efficiency and economy rather than to the maintenance of a political machine through the spoils of office.—Extract from Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League platform adopted at Oakland, November 22, 1909.

If there are those who believe that the Southern Pacific company is in politics merely to forestall the adverse consequences of an uncontrolled demagoguery they deceive themselves. That corporation is in politics for what can be made out of politics, either in shirking obligations it should bear or in obtaining privilege it ought not to possess.

As an example in avoidance of obligations may be cited the fact that from 1884 to 1904, judged by the standards by which other property was assessed for taxation, and judged by the standards by which railroad property has been assessed during the last few years, the railroads of California avoided taxation in the average sum of $700,000 per year for the twenty-year period above given, or fourteen million dollars in all. What the railroads avoided paying that was their due other people paid in their stead.

As an example of obtaining what they ought not to have had may be instanced the grabbing of the water frontages along all our harbors and rivers until free access to the world's highway has, in most instances, been closed to public and competitive carrying companies. All these things were accomplished through political manipulation and not otherwise.

But even if the foregoing allegations were not true corporate domination of California should be resisted, if for no other reason than because the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau bases its political power wholly upon spoils of office. So many new offices have been created under this regime, and the salaries have been so greatly increased, that it has been rather roughly estimated that the state political patronage available for distribution cannot now fall much if any below a million dollars a year. With this mighty fund to draw upon is it any wonder that there are hundreds in public employ who may be counted on to serve the railroad interests first and the public interests afterward, if at all?

The real work of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League is to give California an administration based upon higher grounds. Not that patronage will not always be an element to be reckoned with in political affairs. Unregenerate human nature will never become wholly unconcerned for a good office and a comfortable salary, but it is possible to put the political life of a great commonwealth above the status of a cringing, crawling subserviency to a great pap-dispensing political machine. Patronage may be made an incident to public service rather than public service an incident to patronage.

To be sure there are those in the public service, here and there, who are actuated by a splendid enthusiasm, but they are relatively far between and not unlikely at any time to be crowded out to make room for some place-hunter. The state needs more such and if the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League shall be victorious at the primaries next August it will fill the public service with men of honorable ideals. The league is made up of just such men.

ANOTHER VIEW OF THE SHIP QUESTION.

This paper has said some things favorable to the ship-subsidy idea, and yet always with a feeling of hopefulness that some better way of rehabilitating our American merchant marine might be found. Our country has so suffered from the conversion of free opportunities into special privileges, and into mechanisms for practicing extortion, that the word "subsidy" has become repellant.

But in our quest for further light our critics have been of small service. One vociferates that we cannot have commerce unless we will trade free, in spite of the fact that we already have a huge commerce and do not trade free, thus missing the question at issue altogether, which is, Why are we not carrying half the commerce we have instead of less than 10 per cent. of it?

Another declares that we ought to know that special privileges and bounties are wrong and that we should find in that our all sufficient answer. This is on a parity with that pharisaical individual who rolls under his tongue the delectable morsel: "To license is to sin," and so goes on voting with the dive keepers to the end of his days fully persuaded of his own unspotted righteousness.

Such arguments make us weary and enlighten us not at all.

But in the January number of the Twentieth Century Magazine, Mr. William T. Bates has an article on the "Shipping Policy of the Constitution," that challenges respectful consideration if not immediate acquiescence. The most important point he makes is, in effect, that while a system of ship-subsidies might conceivably restore the American merchant marine to the high seas the subsidies would have to be granted in such enormous volume as to stagger the world. In other words, it would require the expenditure in subsidies of forty to eighty million dollars a year to enable our half of the carrying business to be carried in our ships, a consummation our people would not stand for a moment, while a 10 per cent. restoration of our deep sea commerce, as much as those favoring ship-subsidy dare ask for, would be merely a tantalization.

There is force in this argument. Something like half of all the commerce that goes in and out of our American harbors should be carried in American built, American manned and American owned ships, and a policy that at best can restore no more than 10 per cent of that commerce is hardly worth the candle, except that the special advantages to be derived from opening trade relations with certain countries might, apart from the general purpose, justify a special subsidy or two. Or, the need for a certain definite number of auxiliaries in time of war might justify subsidizing a number of vessels equal to that requirement, which also would be apart from the general issue of rehabilitating the American merchant marine.

Mr. Bates' remedy is the repeal of the Navigation Act of 1828, which would leave our government free to impose discriminating tariffs in favor of goods brought in American ships. Undoubtedly that act resulted in the eventual destruction of our deep sea shipping business, but whether or not the repeal of that act and the restoration of the old system of discriminatory tariff rates, would restore our American merchant marine without requiring the maintenance of an American navy big enough to whip the combined navies of England, Germany and Japan (the three deep sea draying nations) is also something of a problem. Dare we undertake it?

The President's First Mistake.

When, twenty years ago, Thomas B. Reed counted as present Democratic members of the house of representatives in their seats, but not voting, and so established a quorum and became "Czar" Reed, all that he did was to preserve government by the majority despite of the filibustering tactics of a recalcitrant minority. The "Cannonization" of the house came long after. It has come to be an intolerable burden to the house and a humiliation to the country, especially so during Joe Cannon's first term as speaker. He was the first true "Czar" of the house.

No sooner was President Taft inaugurated than he was appealed to to throw his executive influence into the scale to secure such a modification of the rules of the house as would permit the house to select its own committees in orderly fashion, confining the speaker to the function of presiding and preventing him from becoming the autocrat of the house as the leader of the senate is the autocrat of that body. The President declined to take any part in that controversy, the rules were perpetuated, "Cannon-Aldrichism" became a national scandal and the President became lined-up with his enemies instead of with his friends.

That was a strategic blunder if not more. The President had a chance to make 375 out of 391 members of that house his friends forever, but he lacked the nerve to do it. Of course it was no part of his duty as President to interfere in the making of rules for governing either house of congress, and the proprieties warranted him in keeping his hands off that which did not concern him, but, as the event proved, the reformation of those rules did concern him profoundly. They well-nigh involved the making or the breaking of his administration because they involved the making or breaking of "Cannon-Aldrichism," the issue on which the insurgents and the regulars split. The issue became great and national and may yet rip the Republican party from stem to stern leaving the President on that side of it to which he does not naturally belong. The President needs to dare and always to dare. If he takes counsel with his fears, as he did here in San Francisco in relation to the establishment of justice, he will nearly always lose out.

Let the People Guess Again.

Assuming that the Spring Valley Water company was sincere in its willingness to sell its entire plant to San Francisco at the price named, and in view of the big vote polled at the recent election in favor of making the purchase, The California Weekly favors re-submitting that proposal to the people at the earliest date possible.

This it does in the belief that the full significance of the refusal of the people to purchase the Spring Valley system has not been made clear even to P. H. McCarthy. In this particular we are proceeding upon the hypothesis that Mayor McCarthy was acting with sincerity in opposing that purchase, that he is open minded to such an extent that if overwhelming evidence were placed before him he would be free to change his policy in conformity with such evidence. We have no reason to presume to the contrary except that had a deep-laid and malevolent plot been entered into to thwart the entire Tuolumne proposition, in the interests of some power company or some other source of water supply to be sold to the city at a cost of millions, the policy that Mayor McCarthy did follow would have been the craftiest one to follow.

Our government is founded, not upon the rights of men or of cities or states, but upon the security of property and the inviolability of vested pecuniary interests. The American congress is the focal point of all such interests on this continent. That congress may be induced to sacrifice the scenic advantage of a popular outing ground (conceding for the sake of the argument only that such a sacrifice might be involved) in the interests of several hundred thousand consumers of water, but never at a cost involving the sacrifice of $35,000,000 of invested capital. The next time the Tuolumne proposition hits that snag in congress all will know that something has happened. Nor will the density of the McCarthy cranium protect the sensory system of His Honor from the disagreeable consequences of that shock.

And Ballinger, too! The personification of the potency of the financial element in public affairs! We shall hear from him. No country on earth allows the annihilation of public service investments by and through municipal ownership and this country will not. It is not the Spring Valley system that is in danger of annihilation. It is the Tuolumne system in which our people have hoped so much.

The only redeeming feature of the situation is that the Men of San Francisco voted to purchase the Spring Valley system overwhelmingly, almost two to one, but, unfortunately, not quite. Next time, with a better understanding of the reasons why, they will carry it by more than two-to-one. They should have another chance. It took four elections to bring the Geary street bond proposition to a successful conclusion.

The Central Bank Idea.

We find pleasure in placing before our readers this week a thoughtful paper, prepared by Mr. James D. Phelan to be read before the recent conference of Democrats held in San Francisco. This paper deals with two subjects, both of intense public importance whether or not the interest of the public can be so early challenged. Mr. Phelan's contribution will help. One part of his paper is devoted to a discussion of the proposed Central National Bank of America and the other to the income tax amendment to the Constitution of the United States. In this paragraph we have to do with the central bank idea.

No doubt if the original United States Bank had been honest, and had been permitted to endure, it would by now be one of the great banking institutions of the world. It is not improbable that it would have proved of value in forestalling and mitigating panics, have afforded stability to our currency and also have obviated the assumed need for the united railroads of America to undertake to run the government of America, for the reason that it would have long since taken to itself that function and probably likewise the function of financing the railroads and controlling them, too. There were boundless possibilities of power in prospect when that institution was cut off at the wildcat stage of its existence. It is to be doubted if the American people will wish to take another chance at that hazard at this time, notwithstanding the seductive wiles of Nelson A. Aldrich and the colossal rapacities for whom he is the mouth-piece.

When we come to the factor of elasticity in currency, for which there is an unquestioned need, we have only to bear in mind one truth in order to make our attitude toward a central bank perfectly clear. That truth is that the only place where the need for elasticity can be instantly and automatically known is over the counter of the bank where the individual American citizen does his banking business. It is there and nowhere else, and there and nowhere else must the requirements of expansion and contraction be met day by day if they are to be met. This means some form of asset banking currency or nothing. A central bank at New York or Washington cannot meet the exigencies at Milpitas.

The Income Tax.

What Mr. James D. Phelan has to say elsewhere in this paper in relation to the national income tax amendment to the constitution of the United States is commended to the reader's respectful consideration. It may not prove the final word on the subject, but it will count for a better understanding of it. As to whether or not we ought at all times to have an income tax in operation there is room for two opinions, although, in the opinion of The California Weekly, there isn't any room to spare. On one factor in that issue there is not room for more than one opinion and that expressed in few words and plain English. The United States government ought to have the POWER to impose an income tax whether or not it ever uses that power. On that issue there cannot be two opinions outside a madhouse. It must be given that power, if not by amending the constitution, then by the backing down of the supreme court from its untenable position.

Enough to Last a While Yet.

Again the spirit of Malthus affrights the statistical mind. The world is producing people faster than food, and soon there will not be enough, by present standards, to go around. So we must improve methods and conserve resources, and even then we must expect the development of an underfed class. It is the same specter that has confronted every generation, but, somehow, each generation has been better fed than its predecessor, and the more people there were the more food there was to feed them. Now we are confronted with the exhaustion of the supply of free land, in free countries, in the free man's temperate zone, and the insufficiency of the open range to supply us cheap meat. So bread and meat are to get scarce.

But the world is bigger than we dreamed. Recently we have annexed the Arctic, in Alaska. Next, we shall annex the tropics. Nature produces more food to the acre in the tropics than ever produced to the square mile anywhere else. When nature's work is as much improved on in the tropics as it has been in the temperate zones, the tropics alone would feed all the men that the temperate zones could occupy in all industries.

Also, in the temperate zone, we are annexing Russia, Siberia, Manchuria and the southern parts of Africa and South America. These regions, with Canada and India, could feed the world if they were cultivated as western Europe is.

And to all this, we shall annex the sea. Some fisheries are being exhausted, but only those which treat fish as wild game, to be pot-hunted. We shall conserve the sea foods, as we are doing with oysters and beginning to do with salmon, and we shall search the whole sea for food, instead of skimming the coasts. There is life enough in the exhaustless sea to feed the land forever. Very likely, under the kelp-mat of the Saragossa sea, are fish enough to feed the world.

Also, we are annexing the air. It is not square acres of land that were being exhausted but the nitrogenous fertility therein. In the air above us is nitrogen, exhaustless in quantity, but hitherto unavailable. Now, by electrical methods, it can be "fixed," and made available for plant food. The land may be limited, but the sea and the air are exhaustless, and they, too, can feed the human race.

So, with the temperate zone only scratched, with the arctic and the tropics, the sea and the sky still open, there will be room enough and food enough in the world for a while yet.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

She was broad faced, unmistakably German, roughly rather than uncomfortably clad, and her hands were bony and hard, showing that her life had not been easy. She was crossing the bay to the eastern shore for a Sunday outing that meant not a little to her. With her was a younger woman with a baby. The baby was fretful and monopolized the younger woman's time and attention, but the elder woman with the broad face and squat figure busied herself with watching the waves the boat made, the cloud shadows upon the water, the billowy greenness of the Piedmont hills, the glinting sunshine where it fell upon the bay, the flying birds, the islands, the low-lying wreaths of smoke the ferry boats left in their wake, the white sails of the yachts speeding away on a Sunday cruise. Nothing escaped her and, out of the fullness of her heart, she exclaimed again and again to her less enthusiastic companion: "Das ist so eine schone Welt. Das ist so eine schone Welt." "This is such a beautiful world. This is such a beautiful world."

Into that life of toil and economizing to make both ends meet, that life of hard conditions and few pleasures, the grace of God had somehow permitted to enter such an appreciation of beauty as illuminated the whole interior of the woman's being. No longer did her face seem broad and "Dutch," her figure squat and ungainly, her hands hard and toil-stained, for a soul glowed within and face and form stood transfigured in the radiance of an inner light. "Das ist so eine schone Welt."

Contrast that life with the life that is always looking inward and never outward! In the light of the "schone Welt" this woman scarcely realized her own existence. She did not fancy herself the center of the solar system. She did not conceive it to be the duty of providence to lay aside everything else upon hearing her complaining prayer in order that things might be made more comfortable for her. If she had aches she forgot them. If she had toiled hard all the week, and had another week of poorly requited toil ahead of her, she forgot that, too. She had seen the glory of the Lord reflected from a thousand beautiful objects, and in the light of that glory it was joy enough to be alive. As unconsciously as breathing itself she had lost her life that she might find it more abundantly. Job declared that in his flesh he expected to see God, but it may be doubted if he ever came nearer seeing God than that German woman did that Sunday morning going across the bay. She saw his glory manifesting itself in a thousand beautiful forms, and Job was fortunate beyond all his race if he saw more.

We look outward and forget what is within or we look within and forget what is without. The self-centered life is a life in prison. That soul is a caged bird either moping on its perch or beating its wings ineffectually against the bars of its cage. Those of us who are haunted with the pronoun "I" seldom find rest for the soles of our feet, and we are many, but those who can forget that based and capped shaft, erected in honor of each of us, and look off in some other direction will be wonderfully rewarded.

We are coming to have tremendous inequalities of fortune in this country. The poor we shall have always with us in greater abundance than our fathers ever dreamed of, even when inspired so to do by late suppers of mince pie and hard cider, but life cannot be made wholly intolerable to anyone who can open the windows of his soul to the glories of God as reflected from earth and sea and sky, from hill and valley, tree and flower, for in truth, thou prophetess of the Fatherland, "Das ist so eine schone Welt."

Do you want your child to live a happy life? Teach that child to look out rather than in, teach it to see the "schone" there is in the "Welt," and that you may do this hunt for it yourself.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

The Oscillation in British Government.

Now that it is apparent that the British Liberal party is to be continued in that official power which it has held since 1906, it becomes of some interest to note just how the regimes of Liberals and Conservatives have oscillated during, say, the last three-quarters of a century. During the time beginning with 1834 the Conservatives have held power ten times, while the Liberals have been in office eleven times. In total duration of time, however, the Liberals have decidedly the best of it, they having held power forty-two years and seven months as against the Conservatives' thirty-three years and one month, or about 30 per cent. longer than their rivals. The longest term held by the Conservatives (which included one proroguing of parliament) was the ten years and one month from 1895 to 1905, while the longest term of the Liberals (also including one prorogue) was the seven years and three months from 1859 to 1866. It will be seen, from these figures, that the two great British parties have maintained a fairly even distribution of power. There is neither a party which, like our Republican party, has a record of five-sixths of its existence in power, nor, like our Democratic party, that is merely a militant memory; and this is a condition wherein, for the best interests of the people, Great Britain undoubtedly has the better of us.

The Decline of Man's Strength.

When is a man at his physical strongest and best? When should he, in the course of nature, expect his decline to begin, and how rapid will that decline naturally be? These are questions which every man reasonably might ask—which, indeed, most men do ask—and an answer to them, based on averages, is given in the result of tests recently made on thousands of individuals. According to these tests the average lifting power of a youth of seventeen years is 280 pounds. From this time it increases rapidly, being 320 pounds in his twentieth year, and attaining its highest point in his thirtieth and thirty-first years, when it has reached 365 pounds. Here begins the declension of strength, but at first it is very gradual. At forty years it has declined to 357 pounds, and by the fiftieth year it is but 330 pounds. From this time the decline is very rapid, but it differs so greatly in various individuals that it is impossible to obtain trustworthy statistics concerning it. By the way, intellectual workers may comfort themselves in the knowledge that average mental decline begins much later than that of the body.

Cure for the Morphine Habit.

Some time ago a party of Chinese coolies, most of whom were addicted to the opium habit, ran out of tea while working in the forests on the Malay peninsula. Seeking a substitute for the tea, they tried the leaves of a plant known to botanists as combretum cundaicum which grows in that vicinity. After using this substitute two weeks it was discovered that the opium-smokers had lost their taste for the drug of dreams. So runs the story, and it is probable that there is a considerable element of truth in it. At any rate, a London physician of repute now claims that he is using an infusion made of the dried leaves of this plant as a cure for the opium or morphine habit, and with entire success. A wine glass of this infusion taken every four hours, he asserts, will cure a victim of the habit within four weeks from the time he begins to take it. He has treated twelve extreme cases within the last two years, and without a single failure. The alleged remedy is attracting considerable attention among members of the medical profession in London.

A Warning to Automobilists.

Now comes a London physician and sounds a note of woe for those who do disport themselves in automobiles. The big machines, according to him, are dangerous not only to travelers on the street, but as well to those who ride in them without accident; that is, it is dangerous, or at least injurious, to those who do not desire to become unduly fleshy. They add flesh to flesh, and the addition is not of the healthy kind either. Let it be told in the doctor's own words: "I have had to forbid motoring to several of my patients who have consulted me regarding their growing embonpoint. Those who have followed my advice have succeeded in regaining their figures. Motoring surpasses in luxury any form of locomotion yet invented. The seats are so tilted that one is forced to lean back among the cushions at such an angle that all the muscles are relaxed. Add to this the exhilaration which rapid movement produces and the increase of appetite engendered by plenty of fresh air and you will see that motoring contains most of the elements which make for adiposity." Of course, ladies who desire to continue to admire their sylphlike forms should pay particular attention to the thoughtful doctor's warning.

Cost of New York's Subway.

A subway is a good and essential thing for a great city which, like New York, is constructed largely on the shoestring principle, all length and little thickness. Nevertheless that such a subway, essential as it may be, is an expensive item is shown by a report just issued by the New York public service commission. According to this report the total expenditure for subway construction up to the end of last year was $59,206,423. Eventually the people must pay this sum, and, not allowing for interest, etc., it would amount to about $15 for each man, woman and child of them all. People who are acquainted with the configuration of New York will be interested to know that the apportionment of this vast expenditure was as follows: On the Manhattan-Bronx section, $48,385,376; on the Manhattan-Brooklyn, $3,869,091; on the Bridge Loop lines, $6,951,955.24. More expenditures, to meet the needs of the great, growing city will be added as time passes.

Cancer Increasing Everywhere.

Recent vital statistics, which are noticed in the report of the county medical officer of the city of London, indicate that the dreadful disease, cancer, is increasing its ravages in all parts of the world. England and Wales stand particularly high, being exceeded in this unfortunate respect by only Switzerland and the Netherlands. To show how rapid has been the increase it is noted that, while the deaths from cancer in England and Wales were but .055 to the thousand of deaths from 1881 to 1885 inclusive, the rate in 1908 rose to .092, or well on the way toward double, and this is the highest rate ever recorded. The record for Scotland is better than that of England and Wales, while that of Ireland is decidedly better still, but everywhere, whether in the United Kingdom or out of it, the hideous disease more and more is securing a hold upon mankind.

The German emperor is making a large profit by the ownership of a large majolica factory at Cadinen. He also owns five shares in the prosperous municipal lager beer brewery at Hanover. His dividend for the current year is $212 a share.

GIVE THAT REPORT A LIFT.

The report of Mayor Taylor's special committee on the history of the graft prosecution, and the causes and remedies for grafting in San Francisco's municipal life, is a production of the highest character. It ought to go into the hands of the best and most thoughtful persons in the United States. The California Weekly has a good supply of those reports in stock. It will send them on receipt of ten cents each to any address sent us anywhere in the world. If you want to help to a knowledge of the truth send us a few dimes and a list of addresses to send them to.

A SUGGESTION TO REALISTS.

Matthew Arnold names sweetness and light as the twin elements of culture, and gives us to understand by inference that by sweetness he means sweetness of character and an appreciation of the essential sweetness of life, and that by light he means the light of intelligence freely and fearlessly used. Somewhere, I think, he asserts that Shakespeare's abiding hold upon the affections and the imagination of men is accounted for mainly by his possession of these twin qualities in their highest state of perfection.

Assuming this to be true—as I believe it is—it suggests a thought concerning our modern writers of the temper now most widely honored and now more and more generally read. I refer especially to Balzac, De Maupassant, and George Meredith, our modern searchers of the heart, inexorable pursuers of the real, remorseless iconoclasts of all illusions. It was their pride, as it is the boast of their admirers, that these men have stripped all sham from life and have exposed the naked truth for every eye to see, letting us behold beauty where beauty is, and compelling us to see the reality that hides behind pretension.

In a sense, I admit the truth of this. These are undoubtedly apostles of light of a high order of incandescence. Where they could they have turned up the heap of human frailty and let the sun shine upon it; elsewhere they have turned the searchlight upon darker things; in extremities they have not hesitated to break open the black recesses with crowbars and to flash the policeman's bullseye into the festering obscurities of character.

So, I admit that they possess one of Shakespeare's claims to greatness: they possess the spirit of light. But what about sweetness? This, I contend, is their deficiency. I have read Balzac, amazed at his powers of observation and of delineation, fascinated by the art of his narrative, shaken by the emotional compulsion of his genius. But I lay him down sick at heart, my spirit bruised, my faith in humanity darkened, my buoyancy of hope waterlogged and listless. This may be life, but if it is, how futile and how terrible!

I have read Maupassant, and felt the same fog of darkness settle upon me, and heard the same hoarse ironic laughter of despair echo from the gloom.

I have read Meredith, and hurled the book at the mocking wall before me, damning the man who could paint life so lovelessly, so blind to the flowers that spring in even the most barren garden.

Not so when I have read Shakespeare. Even in the darkest hours of tragedy, when Hamlet laughs hopeless laughter or Lear raves in the storm, there is a saving grace of human sympathy, an alleviating ray of hope, a sweet reasonableness of temper that somewhat heals the wounds of anguish. Is it not so in life? Has not every heart resources of consolation that find for it sweet uses of adversity? Does not hope truly spring eternal in the human breast?

And is not life, as our realists paint it, in this most unreal? Truly they see by a brilliant light, but it is not the light of the sun, disclosing orderly perspectives and re-deeming to sweet uses even the shadows it discloses. Their light is rather a hand lantern of exceptional power, which indeed makes visible whatever it shines upon, but makes blacker everything behind and around the circle of its gleaming. With such a lantern in hand our realists have explored the world, and what they have found they have painted with marvelous fidelity. But their pictures are pictures of men taken unawares in the disorder of undress and in the raiment of sleep and with the expressions of men awakened from troubled dreams, blinking in the light of the night-prowler's lantern.

Turn from them again to Shakespeare. He, too, painted such pictures, but only so many as fairly proportion their number to the number of like incidents in life. Besides these he shows us pictures of dreams that came true—they sometimes do, you know—of hope that supports the sorriest vagabond, of gardens that every wretch has once found pleasure in, of sunlit hills, of nobility, of virtue, of true love, of justice tempered by mercy, of misery relieved by death.

Surely he saw life more as it is than they, else suicide would end the human race within a generation.

NOTES.

Arthur Dupin, the "father of the Apaches," has just died in Paris. He was a feuilletonist, who wrote stories for the Paris press after the style of Fenimore Cooper. One of his early contributions, entitled "Les Apaches de Belleville," made such an impression on the criminal classes of that notorious Paris suburb that by common consent they adopted the name of the redskin tribe. From that time on the fraternity professed a grim sort of affection and respect for M. Dupin, to whom they considered themselves under an obligation.

New York's newest playhouse, Charles Dillingham's Globe Theatre, has just opened with the former stars of "The Red Mill," Montgomery and Stone, in "The Old Town," a new musical comedy production, the book of which has been furnished by George Ade and the score by Gustav Luders. The new theatre is at the northwest corner of Broadway and Forty-sixth street.

Californian Poets' Corner

Edward Pollock was the dean of the California poets, in the sense that he was the predecessor of Bret Harte, Charles Warren Stoddard, Edward Rowland Sill and all others whose work attracted general attention. This poem has long been a popular favorite.

EVENING.

By Edward Pollock.

The air is chill, and the day grows late,
And the clouds come in through the Golden Gate;

Phantom fleets they seem to me,
From a shoreless and unsounded sea;
Their shadowy spars, and misty sails,
Unshattered, have weathered a thousand gales:

Slow wheeling, lo! in squadrons gray,
They part, and hasten along the bay,
Each to its anchorage finding way.
Where the hills of Sausalito swell,
Many in gloom may shelter well;
And others—behold—unchallenged pass
By the silent guns of Alcatraz:
No greetings, of thunder and flame, exchange
The armed isle and the cruisers strange.
Their meteor flags, so widely blown,
Were blazoned in a land unknown;
So, charmed from war, or wind, or tide,
Along the quiet wave they glide.

What bear these ships? what news, what freight
Do they bring us through the Golden Gate?

Sad echoes to words in gladness spoken,
And withered hopes to the poor heart-broken:
Oh, how many a venture we
Have rashly sent to the shoreless sea!

The air is chill, and the day grows late,
And the clouds come in through the Golden Gate.

Freighted with sorrow, heavy with woe;
But these shapes that cluster, dark and low,
To-morrow shall be all aglow!
In the blaze of the coming morn these mists,
Whose sight my heart in vain resists,
Will brighten and shine and soar to heaven
In thin white robes, like souls forgiven;
For Heaven is kind, and everything,
As well as a winter, has a spring.
So, praise to God; who brings the day
That shines our regrets and fears away;
For the blessed morn I can watch and wait,
While the clouds come in through the Golden Gate.

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHELF.

"Poetry, Comedy, and Duty."

Under this very unusual title, Dr. C. C. Everett, of Harvard, wrote a treatise on literature and ethics that combines, much as Hamerton does in "The Intellectual Life," an inspiring philosophy, an illuminating view of the workings of the imaginative genius, and an interesting array of anecdotes illustrating the theories. With the ethical part of the book we are not concerned. But the earlier chapters are most suggestive to the lover of good literature.

In these chapters Doctor Everett clearly distinguishes between poetic fancy and the constructive imagination. He shows that the creations of the fancy, such as the character Ariel in "The Tempest," are not subject to natural laws and have no relation to a serious interest in nature or man. But the constructive imagination leaps from the known to the unknown, from the proven to that which seems inevitably true but which cannot be proved. For instance, when Newton's imagination leaped from the consciousness of the attractive power of the earth, causing all things above it and not secured to drop to the ground, to the theory of the universal law of gravity, he gave a vivid example of the function of the constructive imagination in the realm of science. This function is not merely diverting; it is the most useful agent of humanity for arriving at truths that would otherwise yield only to endless research, or never yield at all. In literature, this constructive imagination gives us those works of genius, such as Shakespeare's, in which not only is life reproduced but characters and scenes depicted that suggest illimitable vistas of truth beyond the mere facts of everyday.

THE WEINSTOCK LECTURES.

On May 14, 1902, Mr. Harris Weinstock, the well-known Californian merchant, gave to the University of California a fund of $5,000 to found the "Barbara Weinstock Lectures on the Morals of Trade." In his letter accompanying the gift he expressed the wish that the lectures might impress upon the young men of the university the ideas that the only lasting business success is that which is based upon ethical ideas, and that in business it is more important to build character than to pile up gold.

These lectures are delivered annually by distinguished scholars and men of affairs, and are afterwards published for the university by the Houghton Mifflin company, of Boston. The two latest of these lectures have come to The California Weekly for review.

The first is "The Conflict Between Private Monopoly and Good Citizenship," delivered by John Graham Brooks, whose "As Others See Us" was recently reviewed on this page. In this lecture Mr. Brooks sketches the growth of the alliance between big business and corrupt politics, resulting in wholesale destruction of public resources and in a low state of business and political morals. The conclusion drawn by Mr. Brooks is, however, encouraging. He sees, in the public recognition of this debauching alliance and in the widespread enthusiasm for the conservation policy, signs of a healthy awakening of the public conscience and hopes of a progressive era of improvement. (Houghton Mifflin company, Boston, 50 cents, net.)

The other lecture is "Commercialism and Journalism," by Hamilton Holt, the able managing editor of the New York Independent. He explains the dependence of modern journalism upon advertising for financial success, and the growing assertiveness of advertisers who insist that nothing that "hurts their business" shall be said by the editors. Our space is too brief to elaborate a synopsis of his brilliant and transparent exposition of this subject, which is a matter of utmost importance to our liberties. But this lecture deserves a very wide audience. Incidentally, it is witty, graceful and entertaining, as well as profoundly suggestive. (Houghton Mifflin company, Boston, $1.00, net.)

ANOTHER GRAB AT THE TREASURY

GUGGENHEIM SCHEME FOR SUBSIDIZING ALASKAN RAILROAD.

[The facts for the following article are supplied to The California Weekly by an expert engineer who is familiar with the conditions in Alaska and in whose integrity The California Weekly has full confidence. These facts throw a new light upon further efforts to raid the federal treasury in the interest of Alaskan monopolists. Considered in relation to the Cunningham coal claims disclosures and in addition to the other known facts about the Guggenheim "cinch" on Alaska, they are suggestive of the necessity for even greater thoroughness in sifting the dubious operations of these capitalists and their related groups of coal exploiters. The Editor.]

In 1900, prospectors found a copper mine in southern Alaska which looked, at first blush, to be the greatest find in copper in America. This deposit is near the Copper river, about 200 miles inland, and about 170 miles in an almost directly northern direction from the now-famous Cunningham group of coal claims. Engineers who made the first survey of this copper deposit reported that there were in sight 23,000 tons of high-grade ore, and that the formation indicated that the vein ran back so far into the side of the mountain that the prospects were for almost unlimited additional wealth to be had by drifting in.

The mine was named the Bonanza, and the Havemeyers—the sugar people—who owned it, saw vast wealth coming to them for the trouble of getting the ore out to tidewater and there smelting it or shipping it to established smelters. They had, however, no experience in handling mining properties or in building smelters and so they let in on their find the Guggenheims, whose successful mining and smelting operations in Colorado, Mexico, and elsewhere, and whose large interests throughout the mining districts of the West gave them expert knowledge. The Havemeyers sold a 40 per cent. interest in the Bonanza to the Guggenheims for a round million and the guarantee that the Guggenheims would complete a railroad to tidewater by 1909.

This deal was made about 1906. In the meantime, however, a number of other promoters had begun a race to build this railroad and capture the prize of the rich freight traffic they saw looming up from what was heralded as the inexhaustible stores of the Bonanza and other reported rich discoveries in the Copper river district. Lieutenant Swanitz was the first in the field. He organized a railroad company and ran a survey from Valdez through the narrow pass back of Valdez to the Copper river and up the Copper river to Tonsina. He was immediately rivalled by John Rosene, a Seattle capitalist, who projected another railroad from Valdez to Copper Center, and by a Mr. Reynolds, of Boston, who with the backing of New England capital, organized the Alaska Home Railroad company to parallel Rosene's road to the same destination, or, rather, to beat Swanitz and Rosene in gaining rights of way and getting a road built, for these three routes were nearly identical.

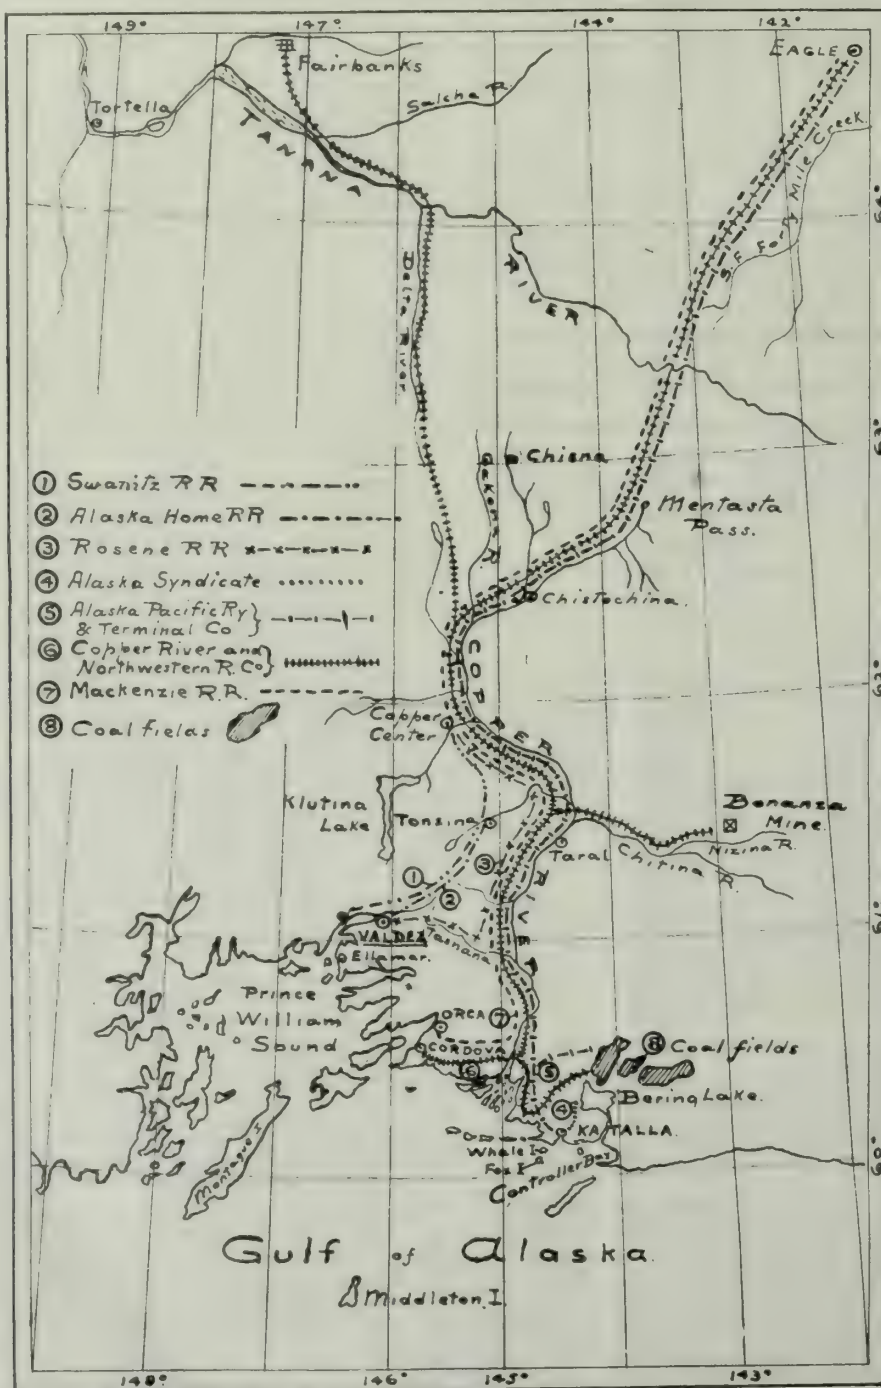

At the same time, one Bruener thought he saw a more direct route from the seaport of Katalla, farther south on the coast than Valdez, and nearer the mouth of the Copper river, and organized the Alaska Pacific Railroad and Terminal Co. A group of English capitalists, operating through M. J. Heney, started for the same goal from Cordova. Heney had built, as contractor and engineer, the White Pass Railroad, and had a practical advantage over all competitors. There was one more of these, Donald Mackenzie, who chose Orca as his port, and who, through J. M. Ashton, tried to get a subsidy from congress to aid in his project of building up the other bank of the Copper river. A glance at the map will show the relative positions of these places, and the several routes by which they proposed to reach the common objective point.

All these projects were well under way before the Guggenheim deal with the Havemeyers was closed and before it became a part of the Guggenheims' contract to guarantee the construction of this road. All these earlier projectors had spent large sums of money in preliminary surveys and construction work, and, in the case of Mackenzie, in paying for representation before congress to beg for a subsidy. Bruener had done more than this: there is no real harbor at Katalla, and he had begun to build a breakwater there to create an artificial harbor at a cost of about a million dollars.

But when the Guggenheims undertook to guarantee the building of a railroad to the Bonanza they did not contemplate sharing the potential profits of it with anybody else. They proposed to build the road themselves, and the only road.

As all the practicable routes had already been surveyed and rights of way acquired, and ports chosen, they at once undertook to eliminate all competitors. Some of these were easily disposed of. Swanitz had no very considerable backing and no resources of his own. He was driven out. Reynolds lost his nerve, and followed. Rosene is a very wealthy man and has imposing financial connections. They bought him out. Mackenzie's hope of success lay in securing a subsidy from congress. A powerful lobby at Washington defeated this hope.

This left Heney and Bruener. Bruener stayed in the fight. The Guggenheims went after him. They built another breakwater at Katalla, so placed that it closely paralleled Bruener's breakwater and they also interfered by forcibly opposing the construction of his railroad. That broke Bruener financially and

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

What if the People Speak, My Lords?

But what if the People speak, my lords, what if the People speak?
Suppose that they weary of cuffs and blows and turning the other cheek!
What if the Atlas who bears your world refuses to carry the load,
Tiring at last of penury's grip and the sting of its ceaseless goad?
Oh, steadily upward prices go, and yours is the lion's share,
While the paupers build, with a sigh of woe, the multifold millionaire,
And the skies are brass, and our God is deaf or haply His rest doth seek—
But what if the People speak, my lords, ay, what if the People speak?

Time was in Britain when your kind laughed at the cries of "the mob" accursed,
But a Cromwell rose, and the price was paid, the head of a Charles the First;
Time was in France when the nobles danced while the peasants writhed in pain,
But the People spoke, and we pray our God that never and ne'er again
Shall the streets run red with a crimson flood while fiends their orgies hold;
Yet out of that chaos a New Earth swung, displacing the shameless Old.
Oh, the tale of life is the tale of strife 'twixt Greed and the poor and weak,
But they sometimes rise in their black despair—and what if the People speak?

From out of the gulf of the voiceless depths there soundeth a muffled sigh,
The fleeting ghost of a woman's sob or wraith of a childish cry.
Palace and hovel, not far apart they stand in the murky gloam,
And one is the home of your pride, my lord, and one is your brother's home,
Your factory wheels go round and round, grinding your golden grist,
While Death draws near to the toiling babes to enter them on his list,
And the wealth to add to a wealth unused forever in greed you seek—
But what if the People speak, my lords, ay, what if the People speak?

The Dream and the Reality—Sometimes.

"The man whom I would marry," the beautiful maiden confided to her friendliest friend, "must be tall and of commanding presence; he must have a smile so winning that friends will flock to him; looking on him, all must be constrained to say, 'Here, indeed, is a hero;' he must be brilliant, witty, and intellectually a peer of greatest men, and kindness must beam from his countenance as light shines from the sun. I would not marry for wealth, yet he must have sufficient to keep the wolf of poverty from our door. All this, and a few other things that I do not at present recall, must be embodied in the man whom I would marry."

Such was the beautiful maiden's dream, as she whispered it.

She is married now, and the man whom she wedded is short, squat, and ungainly; he has a smile that drives his weak companions to drink; if any person should call him a hero that person would immediately be confined in an insane asylum; he is about as intellectual as a slab of bacon, and when it rains his wife always steps to the door to see if he is where she can call him in the house; perhaps he would be kind if he could grasp the idea, and, as for wealth, the fishing is not good enough for him to secure any of it. Oh, yes, he is a peach, and so she married him.

And the beautiful maiden's case is not strictly isolated—there are others. Yet are the dear girls entitled to their dream, for not infrequently it is about all they get out of it.

A Jawyous Event.

"I dreamed that Mayor McCarthy was mentally incapacitated."
"How did it happen?"
"Why, he broke his jaw."

The Opinions of Rufus.

Pants an' reputations are some alike—you can clean mud off either of 'em, but they never look quite es good again.

The girl that flirted an' lost both fellers es a result ought to tell President Taft 'bout it. Seems es if it might int'rest him.

If you'll step back an' hold your breaths, ladies an' gentlemen, our honnered Mayor 'll continue to give us a livin' imitation of a burro emittin' the dreaded holler roar of the King of Beasts.

They was a man that wouldn't work an' didn't work but kept travelin' round, but I'll bet you can't guess whether I'm referrin to a hobo or some son of a rich pa.

Men are divided into two classes, them that complain 'cause they don't git what's comin' to them an' them that are derved glad they don't.

God makes laws, an' lawyers make statutes, an' the diff'rence ain't any greater than I sh'd s'pose it would be under the circumstances.

Strikes me that middlin' often faith is only our best guess at something that we don't know.

Ever stop to think, Ezry, that no atheist ever hit the church sech a hard blow es some of its members do?

A good reputation ain't required to make friends. Frinstance, Satan has 'bout the worst reputation I've heard of—an' the most friends, too.

Dollars are mighty useful, but they's three things they never yit bought—long life, character an' love.

Some folks wear good clothes, an' that's all anybody ever notices 'bout 'em.

After sizin' it up, I've 'bout concluded that the hardest feller of all to git 'long with is the one that knows he's right when he ain't.

Keep Boostin'.

Some men there were, by a mudhole set,

Keep boostin',
Insistin' prosperity e'er in the wet
Is roostin'.

Oh, water or ice they did not mind,
For they all belonged to the boostin' kind;
And great Chicago was built, you'll find,
By boostin'.

* * *

Some people discovered an arid plain

For boostin',
Remarkin', "On climate our ultimate gain
Is roostin'."

They boomed the climate, and climate sold,
Referred to the "orange's sun-kissed gold;"
And the tale of the Angel City's told
In boostin'.

The moral is plain for me and for you:

Keep boostin';
Success that we seek on the deed that we do
Is roostin'.

Oh, hustle and rustle, and Nature will heed,
But she hasn't the leisure a loafer to feed.
So here is the slogan, and here is the creed:
Keep boostin'!

As Everybody Notices.

I've seen the lightning's fearful blight—
But not out here, but not out here—
I've felt the Frost King's cruel bite—
Come here, my dear; there's naught to fear,
For here no dread tornadoes blare,
And days are bright, and skies are clear,
And life is sweet as life is fair,
In California's golden year.

Better.

You may praise the man who buildeth
A great achievement here,
And I, too, have a blossom
I tender him for cheer;
But better than his doing
I hold, and hold aright,
Is his who scatters shadows
And makes the world more bright.

Thoughtful Man on the Situation.

"The Train of State," said the Thoughtful Man, "is smoothly speeding on its appointed way from the station of All-the-Traffic-Will-Bear to the delightful station of Increased-Dividends. On the velvet-cushioned seats of the cars sit the stockholders and other travelers for the station ahead, and they smile cheerily in heartfelt glee at the discordant, unreasonable moan of outsiders, 'Give us our ten million dollars back.'"

"At his post sits William F. Herrin, the intrepid engineer, oiling the legislative valves, guarding the judicial levers, and seeing that nobody is run over except the miserable wretches who demand the fruit of their labor. Never tiring and never ceasing their labors, the energetic firemen, Parker, Burke and Hatton, shovel in the coal, unheeding the occasional black eye given them in the course of their laborious efforts. All is running smoothly, the train of state is forging right ahead, and everything is precisely as it should be, as is admitted by Herrin, Calhoun and all other recognized experts.

"It is this peaceful and tranquil moment, sir, which the Lincoln-Roosevelt banditti have selected as the time for holding up the Train of State. 'With whoop and shout and wild halloo' they burst from the underbrush where lurk the canaille who want their ten million dollars back, and, with pistol at the devoted Herrin's head, demand that he give the Engine of State into their untutored keeping. The outrage of it! The infamy! To deprive the State's heroic engineer of the position which he has held so long that this generation would know him in no other capacity! And, besides, it would throw Parker, Burke and Hatton out of a job!

"Sir, it can't be did; nobody can make me believe it. The good men and true who swallowed the Santa Cruz dose will stand for anything that smells to heaven beneath the shining suns; their digestion may be warranted. Nor could the tried old engineer safely be removed from his station, and the attempt to do so is revolutionary, reactionary and shameful. All of us who are interested in dividends say so, and none others should count. Don't you think I am right?"

"Well," said I, "once I knew a dirty house that was improved by a house-cleaning."

* * *

Our Governor.

They bartered him in in a shameless way,
For Herrin and Abie were willing,
And he owns to a notion he'd like to stay,
If Mrs. Gillett is willing;
But that Santa Cruz deal was a cruel test,
And, our noses still by its smell oppressed,
We're longing to give him a long, long rest,
Whether or not she's willing.

Oh, still of the cohorts is Herrin the boss,
And he, as a trickster, is willing.
And Curry is restless, and he is a boss
Who e'er at the trough has been willing;
And I have a notion which clings to me yet,
That Jimmy will likely be caught in the wet,
And a bad "double cross" be what he will get—
And the people, Lord knows, will be willing.

* * *

I Have Not Seen—

A man helped up hill by kicking him down;
Any deed accomplished by sitting down and whining about it;
A religion that was any good with the Golden Rule left out of it;
The man who was quite as ready to forgive others as himself;
Among all loves, any that would so certainly sacrifice for the loved one as that of a mother;
A garment so well shaped and worn that it would make a black reputation white;
A face so ugly that beautiful conduct would not make it seem fair;
Man or woman who walked so straight that he or she did not occasionally wobble a little.

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Editor The California Weekly.

Kind Sir: I want to express to you my high appreciation of the Weekly and especially of your editorials. You are on the right side and in the end must win. I always recommend the Weekly to my friends.

Truly,

J. S. TROXELL,

Pastor Epworth M. E. Church, San Francisco.
San Francisco, January 14, 1910.

All such expressions of approval and good will as the foregoing are a help to The California Weekly, but they reach their highest efficiency when made publicly and, as sometimes happens, from the pulpit. The people are eager for a paper in which they can believe, but there are thousands who have not heard of The California Weekly or, anyhow, not in such a positive way as to impress the fact of its existence upon the mind and so create a desire to possess it. We are doing all that we can, with the means at our disposal, to bring it to the attention of the public, but we need help in that direction more than in any other. Everybody who likes The California Weekly and believes in it can render it a royal service by "always recommending it to his friends," in a public way if possible.

Editor The California Weekly.

My Dear Sir:—Your letter to me dated November 13th last, was received in due course and I have delayed answering it in the hope that I would find time to give you a little friendly talk on the necessity of reform, and the folly of expecting to accomplish much in that direction, as shown by the experience of the last forty years in California. However, I find that I have not the time to put my thoughts on paper, so as to embrace the whole subject, so I will take up briefly one proposition of reform, which you say your journal is devoted to accomplishing, and that is reform in "The Administration of Justice in this Country," which you say, "is on trial at the bar of public opinion as never before."

I grant you that originally and fundamentally mankind are a sorry lot, and they need constant reforming; and so the administration of justice, being a human institution, is much in the condition of mankind, who originated the institution; but according to the poets, novelists, editors, and newspaper writers, who have written the English language for the last four hundred years, and who have reflected the sentiments and manners of their time, the administration of justice has always been a solemn and pious fraud.

It was a long time ago when the following words were written by some rhymester who had the ability to jingle out his ideas:

"The law condemns the man or woman;
Who steals the goose from off the Common,
But lets the greater felon loose,
Who steals the Common from the goose."

And in the reign of Henry VI in 1450, a gentleman by the name of John Cade—famously known as Jack Cade—kicked up a row in England, and he thought, and thought correctly too, that the administration of justice in England at that time was sorely in need of reformation and he and his followers proposed that the first thing to do was to kill all the lawyers.

And so you will find running all through the social and moral history of the English race, a clamor about reform in the administration of justice. My own opinion is that the administration of justice ought to be reformed, but take it as it is, it appears to be what the vast majority of people want and, perhaps, as good as they deserve. I do not indulge in the sentiment of hero-worship, but I am free to declare that I think the greatest law reformer, as well as one of the profoundest intellects of the nineteenth century was David Dudley Field. But he, like all honest reformers, was jeered at and flouted, by not only the common people, who did not have any better sense, but also by the learned quidnuncs of the law. The very fact that David Dudley Field accomplished so much for the reform of law procedure, gives me hope, and ought to give every honest and intelligent man hope, that further reform will be accomplished. The trouble is with the masses of the people, because the great majority of them do not come in contact with the administration of justice, or the business of the courts, and they lack the opportunities of knowing what is needed in order to work out a reform.

But my letter is longer than I intended it should be, when I started to write it. I wish you the greatest measure of success, in your efforts to reform the condition of public life in California, and for that reason I have enclosed herewith two dollars in currency, fifty cents in a coin card to pay one year's subscription to your paper, and also the book you offer as a premium, being "Hitchborn's History of the California Legislature of 1909."

With kind regards to you personally and wishing for the success of your enterprise, I remain,
Very truly yours,

ALFRED DAGGETT.

Visalia, Cal., January 13, 1910.

The foregoing is from one of the brainy, thoughtful men of this state, and a man who has reached that time of life when it is clearly comprehended that great works of reform are not to be consummated in a day, without, however, despairing of the future. On one point alone in the foregoing are we disposed to found a protest, and that is that what the people get in the administration of justice is as good as the "vast majority of them want or deserve." It is a complacent means of disposing of all public issues. We are assured that the press of our country is "as good as the vast majority want or deserve," and that the syndicated theatricals are as good, the service rendered by the street car lines as good, and the government given us by the railroads as good as the "vast majority want or deserve." We beg to differ. In all of these particulars what the public gets is as bad as it will put up with without quitting the raising of corn and hogs and going into the business of raising a rough house. The public gets as good service in all lines as it will have or fight, and only now and again anything better. This is for the reason that that way lies the direction of least resistance, the direction that everything takes except in the face of a most vigorous protest or by the inspiration of an exceptional sense of moral responsibility.

The California Weekly.

Dear Sirs:—Please send your paper and the American Magazine; check for $2.50 enclosed. I rely on your paper more and more. Of course we differ on many points but that is healthy for both.

Very truly,

H. J. TOMPKINS.

The constituency The California Weekly is building up is one that does more independent thinking per capita, we dare say, than any other similar constituency in the state, and we cannot hope to make them all see things as we see them although we'll do our best to that end. But a turn about is fair play, and so we shall be glad to have those who cannot see things as we see them try their hand at making us see things as they see them. They might succeed better with us than we with them. There is nothing like trying. Letters in candid criticism of whatever appears in The California Weekly will always be thankfully received.

Editor The California Weekly,

San Francisco, Cal.

My dear Sir:—I note in the issue of your valuable paper, "The California Weekly," of January 14, 1910, you say, touching the election of Mr. McCarthy, that, "The bills of his campaign were paid by influences hostile to the honor of the city. Certain large blocks of votes were delivered by influences inimical to the purity of the city. Mayor McCarthy is under obligations to these influences which he must disregard, or, still better, repudiate. He has a chance, such as Schmitz had, after the earthquake. Schmitz failed, because he did not repudiate Ruef. McCarthy has not yet repudiated Ruef. Neither has he repudiated the Calhoun interest, which paid his bills, nor the saloon and tenderloin interest, which furnished a very large block of his votes."

Judge Parker charged Roosevelt with accepting $600,000 and over, from the great corporations and trusts of New York city. Roosevelt retorted that it was a lie. Investigation by a Republican investigating committee proved that Parker spoke the truth. No investigation has passed on the question as to who paid Mr. Taft's election bills, but I think the evidence that they were paid by the same interests is fully as clear as the evidences that Mr. McCarthy's were paid by a like interest, and even a more dangerous and deadly influence operated to elect Mr. Taft than the influence of which you complain, i. e., the false and vicious cry and threat of the already too rich eastern monopolist and manufacturer, to the effect that if Mr. Bryan were elected mills and factories would close and business would shrivel up and poverty would stalk abroad in our land.

Now, Mr. Editor, I have never seen any condemnation in your paper of Mr. Taft or Mr. Roosevelt, or their methods of obtaining votes. Do you not think it just as bad and just as likely to bring a corrupt administration in one instance as the other?

Very truly yours,

J. F. FASSETT.

San Francisco, Cal., January 18, 1910.

There is no greater evil in our political life than corporation financing of political campaigns and when honors come to be shared between the parties on that issue the Republican pot will be found as black as the Democratic kettle and no blacker. Both parties have gotten all they can get, partly by hold-up methods and partly by downright sale either of "protection" against adverse legislation or such special privileges and immunities as the contributing rich men or corporations have desired. These things have generally been more tacitly understood than specifically agreed upon and it is rarely if ever that the leading candidates have been allowed to be touched by any of the dickerings. It is even probable that both Theodore Roosevelt and William Howard Taft have

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Lincoln-Roosevelt Executive Committee

The conference of Lincoln-Roosevelt League leaders, held in San Francisco last Saturday, received President Chester H. Rowell's announcement of appointees to the executive committee for the several congressional districts, as follows: Lee C. Gates, Marshall Stimson and A. J. Wallace, Los Angeles; Judge W. A. Stone, San Diego; former United States Senator Thomas R. Bard, Hueneme; H. W. Johnstone, Redlands, M. C. Zumwalt, Tulare; E. A. Forbes, Marysville; former Mayor Clinton L. White, Sacramento; Rolfe Thompson, Santa Rosa; Frank R. Devlin, Vallejo; Mayor Frank K. Mott, Oakland; Assemblyman C. C. Young, Berkeley; Senator George S. Walker, San Jose; Assemblyman A. M. Drew, Fresno; Irving Martin, Stockton, George G. Radcliff, Watsonville. This list completes the executive committee except for representatives from the first district.

Choice of Candidates to Be by Representative Body

The conference devoted the day to an informal discussion of candidates and platform. No action was taken except to adopt a resolution to defer the choice of candidates until the meeting of the state general committee later in the spring, consisting of representatives to the number of nearly 500 from all parts of the state. This leaves time for local organization throughout the state, and for these local bodies to make clear their preferences to their representatives at the final meeting. A large share of the work of organizing the local bodies will fall upon Charles R. Detrick, of Santa Clara county, who was chosen unanimously to be secretary of the state organization.

Leaders Present

The conference of last Saturday was geographically representative as well as representative of the best leadership of the League. Among those who attended the meeting were: President Chester H. Rowell, Fresno; Vice-Presidents Hiram W. Johnson, San Francisco, and W. R. Davis, Oakland; Secretary C. R. Detrick, Mayfield; F. R. Devlin, Vallejo; William Kent, Kentfield; State Treasurer W. R. Williams, Sacramento; Assemblyman A. M. Drew, Fresno; A. E. Graupner, Max Kuhl, Olin L. Berry, Ralph L. Hathorn, Daniel A. Ryan, San Francisco; Assemblyman C. C. Young, Berkeley; State Controller A. B. Nye, Sacramento; Arthur Elston, Berkeley; Marshall Stimson, Los Angeles; Rolfe Thompson, Santa Rosa.

San Francisco Clubs' Full Co-operation

The work done by the conference related wholly to state matters outside of San Francisco. The conference left to the Municipal League of Independent Republican Clubs the solution of the problem of local co-operation of the independent forces in San Francisco. That problem is complicated. The name "Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League" is only two years old in San Francisco, and the name of many of the independent Republican clubs is seven years or more old, and loyally liked. In some districts in this city the League was discredited two years ago by some of the men who were allowed to direct its policies. The question as to the policy of using the League name again in San Francisco was threshed out at a meeting of the local league of Republican clubs, held Monday night. The decision was to retain the name of the Municipal League of Independent Republican Clubs, but to co-operate fully with the Lincoln-Roosevelt League in the state campaign. Max Kuhl was elected secretary, and on motion of Olin Berry, the following were appointed a committee to select eleven more to act with them and provide a plan of organization: George E. Crothers, Rolla V. Watt, Hiram Johnson, C. H. Bentley. Others who participated in the conference were Byron Mauzy, Doctor Plince, John Gillson, Adolphus Graup-ner, Joseph Cutten, and about forty others. A significant feature of the meeting was the fact that every vote of the evening, despite lively debates, was unanimous.

Is Hiram Johnson The Coming Man?

The mind of the Republican reformer is engaged in evolving the fittest candidate for governor of California and in doing so men are discussed without saying "by your leave?" to the parties concerned. During the week the name most in the mouths of men is that of Hiram W. Johnson. Mr. Johnson does not want to run for governor or to be governor, at least not now. Neither does any of the other gentlemen whose names have been prominently mentioned, with the exception of Charles M. Belshaw, who would both like to make the race for governor and to be governor. Mr. Johnson would like to attend strictly to his large and increasing law practice; but he will be a self-willed man indeed if he can turn down the appeal to him to make the race, if the reform mind of the state shall reach the conclusion that he is The Man. At present writing that mind seems to be weighing in the balance, the one against the other, (but in all kindness to both) not the "claims," for neither has "claims"; not the availability, for the reform candidate must have more than availability; but the respective elements of character, fitness and strength for gubernatorial honors, and for making the campaign before the people, of W. R. Davis and Hiram Johnson. Each of these men is heartily in favor of the other, and it would be a sacrifice to either of them to take the nomination and make the campaign, and yet it is unlikely that either of them is so centered in self that he would not make the sacrifice in response to a unanimous reform sentiment. They both of them have too much patriotism for that.

Who Is This Man Hiram W. Johnson?

Hiram W. Johnson is forty-four years old. He is a son of Grove L. Johnson whom he little resembles in any particular save that he possesses an alert mind, and no man in California possesses a mind more alert than that of Grove L. Johnson. But the mind of Hiram Johnson is more than alert. It is broad and deep and strong and, above all else, it is sincere. It is a mind that cherishes ideals above and beyond the American dollar, the intoxication of power, the appetite for praise. It is a buoyant mind, a mind that abounds in hope and looks to the future, not the past, for the golden age. And yet Mr. Johnson is no visionary. In the practice of his profession he is successful because he is practical. He does not leave the main traveled road to chase some idealistic will-o'-the-wisp over the common. He is a strong man and a true and if he were governor of California he would be a sane governor and a practical, but he would not mark time. He would keep the state moving and would bring to bear upon public sentiment and the legislative department all the powers of his executive office for the reform of the laws to the end that justice may be the better administered in California. He knows where the statutes and codes are lame as few other men do, and he knows, as few others do, how to remedy that lameness. If he were to become a candidate for governor he would wonderfully appeal to the younger generation of voters. He abounds in enthusiasm and that enthusiasm would prove contagious. He is classed as a radical, and whether or not that classification can be accepted as accurate, he can be counted on to head the procession of reform and be no laggard. On the crucial issue of the emancipation of California from corporation control he would prove as unwavering as Mount Shasta. The only element of questioning in any mind as to Hiram Johnson is that conservative men might fear him as being too radical in temperament. Those who know him are not concerned for his radicalism. The fear, if there may be said to be fear, is that those who do not know him may not be made to know him well enough to remove that doubt as to what he would do if he were governor. This is the case of Hiram W. Johnson, plainly stated.

The Case of Davis Stated As Plainly

Some things regarding W. R. Davis were said in these columns last week. He is an older man than Hiram Johnson, but in his prime, physically able to make a campaign and financially able also. Mr. Johnson has his fortune yet to make, and wants to stick to that job a few years longer without interruption. Mr. Davis has a comfortable fortune already made, made right in Oakland with his profession as a foundation for it, by prudent investment, careful economy, good sense, and some three decades of time, but without avarice, grinding the faces of the poor or pocketing a dollar that did not come to him so legitimately that he dare look every man in the face. On the issue of corporation control of California he is a rock. There is no spirit of compromise in him on that issue or any other of vital concern to the public. The public has treated him well, and he has not been reluctant to take a hand in public affairs, but never in a spirit of self-seeking. He has "pulled his own weight," as Theodore Roosevelt would say, and generally the weight of a whole boat load of indifferent citizens along with his own. He does this because of an exalted ideal of the duties of citizenship, and for no other reason. He is regarded as a conservative radical. He is progressive in all his instincts, but he has the patience to wait until tomorrow for the things that he cannot get to-day, and without making a fuss about it. In the event of his leading the progressive Republican hosts the business interests of the state would not be concerned for the result. They would know that no revolutionary or ill-considered legislation would get by him, and they would know, too, that the state would not be marking time but would be going forward, sanely, steadily, certainly. As with Mr. Johnson, so with Mr. Davis, the reform of the laws would be a matter of profound concern, in civil matters as well as in criminal. Mr. Davis prefers that Mr. Johnson lead the fight against railroad domination in the belief that he would be able to arouse a more lively enthusiasm among the younger voters of the state. Mr. Johnson prefers Mr. Davis on the ground that the business interests of the commonwealth would feel more assured of the preservation of an even tenor along the path of progress. There rests the issue so far as these two men are under discussion and, the past week, they have been more under discussion than any others.

The Primary Buzz-Saw

Gentlemen in political life hardly know what to make of the new direct primary law. As they stand and look at it revolving with a musical whirr peculiarly its own they are not certain whether its edge is toothed or not, but they hesitate to test it with the finger for fear that it may be. The California primary law is not true blue all the way through. It was enacted by a legislature that did not want any direct primary law and one that only yielded to the superior force of an aroused public sentiment that demanded a direct primary law of some sort, but had no clear idea of what such a primary law ought to be like. Something of the nature of a direct primary was therefore enacted, but it is full of hitches and hindrances that make against its frictionless operation. That it will have to be tinkered radically at the next session of the legislature everybody admits, and it is expected that this year's use of it will show how.

What Is the Essential Spirit of the Primary?

A great deal hangs on the answer to this question. There are those who affect to believe that the spirit of the primary law is that, in August next, the Men of California, Republicans and Democrats, will go to the polls and, out of the candidates who have volunteered to serve the people in official capacity, without suggestions from any source or leadership of any kind, and with no previous effort from any quarter to bring out the best candidates that they may be impressed into the public service (against their wishes it may be), without any of these aids for reaching right conclusions, the aforesaid men of California will, at the primary election, make up for their respective parties the best tickets that can be named to be voted for at the general election. That, they contend, is the spirit of the new primary law. It is no such thing. The spirit of the primary contemplates that there will be a general public interest in naming the party tickets; that groups of men will rally around their friends and support their candidacies before the voters of their respective parties; that other groups of men, being little satisfied with any of the candidates who have volunteered their services, will consult together and look about them for better men to fill such positions and, finding them, will persuade them to allow their names to go before the voters of their party and will campaign for them before the primary as before the final election. Some of these groups of men within the respective political parties may be small and some of them may be large, as in the case of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League. When primary election day comes it will be in the light of all this voluntary and associated aid and leadership that the voters of each party will go into their voting booths and there make choice of all the suggestions and appeals that have been made to them. That is the "spirit of the primary" and any portion of a political party less than the whole has a right and a duty to hold such conferences, conventions, caucuses (or whatever else they may wish to call them), as they desire for suggesting to the people such candidates as they favor.

Political Gophers Those who oppose the Oppose This View foregoing view do so either because they do not understand what the spirit of the primary really is or because public agitation, conventions and conferences held preparatory to a primary election might interfere with their plans. It is conceivable, for instance, that the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau might heartily oppose such activity on the part of citizens who take the initiative in such matters. That bureau has super-servicable servants in every community in this state, working under cover, who might be inspired from headquarters to work up a seeming spontaneous combustion of the public mind on behalf of the subservient candidates of that bureau. Nothing would be easier if nothing else were doing than to accomplish this by "passing the word down the line" through gin mills and redlight districts while the better element were indifferent or asleep, as they commonly are, until the business is over. It is conceivable that Mr. Charles F. Curry, who has spent a dozen years laying the wires for a submerged mine to be exploded at the psychological moment, might prefer a spontaneous generation of a state ticket. If these untoward political influences do not in fact take the political gopher's view of the spirit of the primary it is because they are laying their plans to "steal the livery of heaven to serve the devil in," by calling regular party conventions in advance of the primaries, a thing that the spirit of the primary absolutely abrogated. The contest at the primary is within the parties. At the election it is between the parties.

The Feet of Democrats Also Well Nigh Slipped

The "spirit of the primary" haunted our Democratic friends, at their recent conference in this city, like a veritable ghost. They were not sure whether it was a buzz-saw or only a glass disk belonging to a toy electrical device and their uncertainty nearly betrayed them into the hands of the Southern Pacific's Democratic gopher contingent. It would be a great misfortune if those Democrats who

THE CENTRAL BANK AND THE INCOME TAX

DELIVERED BEFORE THE DEMOCRATIC CONFERENCE IN SAN FRANCISCO, JANUARY 10, 1910.

By JAMES D. PHELAN.

Jackson Day is an appropriate time on which to call the attention of the people of California to two proposed measures of fiscal reform—the Central Bank and the Income Tax.

President Andrew Jackson, during his administration, opposed the United States Bank—the Central Bank of that period—and in 1836, when the charter of the United States Bank expired, so violent had the opposition become that there was hardly a Congressman who dared to vote for its renewal. We are told that in 1828 there was not a single local bank left in Kentucky, Mississippi, and Alabama because the branches of the United States Bank had absorbed all the business. The unpopularity of its operations and the political danger which it threatened led to its downfall.

The idea of a Central Bank, whose revival is attributed to Senator Aldrich, chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, is substantially one with the United States Bank. In the earlier days of the republic that bank possibly had partial justification in the disorganized condition of financial institutions. But since then national banks have been organized to the number of 7,000 and the State banks are doing business under laws designed to protect the public, and the suggestion now of a Central Bank is more, it seems, for the purpose of concentrating and controlling capital than of remedying existing conditions. The question is, does the danger outweigh the possible benefits?

Several schemes for such a bank have been proposed: One is to organize with stockholders among whom shall be the Government of the United States, with a capital of $100,000,000, and the main consideration is that such a bank, once established, shall receive all Government deposits including, not only the moneys now deposited in national banks by the Government, but the funds that are now kept in the Treasury of the United States. It is proposed that this bank shall also hold the reserves of all the national banks and issue currency to them in time of need upon the deposit of securities, and that the national banks shall be denied the power of issuing bank circulation which is now done against the deposit of United States bonds with the Treasury. The national banks now also enjoy the privilege of receiving deposits from the Custom House and the Internal Revenue in the several districts throughout the country against the security of bonds, so that the government collections shall freely circulate. It will at once appear that the measure is of a most revolutionary character and is modeled after the Governmental central banks—banks of issue and discount—of such European countries as England, France and Germany. It seems that the bankers of the country however, very generally approve of the idea, claiming that it can be made a bank for banks and that its business will be exclusively with banks; that they can deposit there and in time of stress and panic, the central organization can relieve the pressure and avert the danger. But will it not ultimately seek to establish branches throughout the country? That certainly would be its natural tendency. There is no question about giving the Government better security for its deposits because under the present system the deposits are amply secured, nor is the capacity of the 7,000 National banks to issue circulating notes questioned, because the National banks do issue circulation as the business of the country requires it. Nor is there here involved any question about the better protection for depositors and stockholders because the bank offers no greater guarantee than a hundred other banks, honorably and ably conducted, in which national banks are authorized to hold their reserves.

According to Mulhall, the statistician, the total banking power of the world is $50,000,000,000, and of this the United States has two-fifths, while all other nations combined have only three-fifths, and the public as a rule is generally well served and probably better served than by any other system. Laws have been recently enacted by the Congress by which the banks can combine in case of stress for the purpose of issuing emergency currency and when the emergency is passed the notes are redeemed. California has passed laws for the better protection of banks and their customers, and the clearing houses exercise sleepless vigilance.

The Central Bank is a menace to the independence of our banks and would undermine their business if carried to its logical conclusion. It would tend to damage the commerce and trade of the States while creating an institution which might possibly be used to jeopardize our prosperity and our liberties. Such a bank would have the power to control the supply of currency, to extend or refuse aid to other banks, to create fictitious prices by a plentiful supply of currency, or by contracting it. By calling in loans and otherwise exercising the power to fix the rates of interest, it could seriously interrupt the ordinary course of business, and, in the flotation of Government bonds, it would be in a position to embarrass the Government itself. In other words, it concentrates the power which is now distributed throughout the land in every community where a bank is established; and, while ordinarily concentration makes for efficiency and economy, in a matter which involves so much to the people—the safeguarding and the circulation of the medium of exchange—it would be exceedingly perilous to allow that power to repose in a few hands. But this is what many fear, that it would ultimately become an appendage to Wall Street, where the rise and fall of quotations is the game at which the great money magnates play, and if the enormous funds controlled by such an institution were made available for speculation, the commercial world, as well as the common people, would be the sufferer. There would be no protection outside the personality of the managers or trustees, and they would not be responsible to the people, but only to their stockholders who would be the moneyed men of the street, and therein lies the crux of the opposition. The conflict in this country is between men and money, and the great interests of humanity must not be further exposed to unnecessary danger. There is no assurance that panics would not be created by manipulation—instead of being averted by prudence. Panics afford an opportunity to those who control money and are the source of many fortunes.

The vice of centralization in the matter of the medium of exchange is in the withdrawal of the earnings and accumulations of the people in the many communities of the country to a central point, where it is not available for local purposes. The health of a community can only be maintained by the circulation of money and the re-investment of capital, and if, as soon as the earth is drained of its wealth, it is sent to a remote point, as Washington or New York, in the form of minted money or currency, then that community will suffer on account of its departure from the great economic law. If all the blood of the body goes to the head, no matter how good a head it is, it is apt to suffer from apoplexy or other derangement. Every part of the body must be nourished and sustained. I would quote this statement by way of example, from the London Statist of December 22, 1906, referring to the concentration of English money invested in national funds and in the Bank of England, and consequent acute local disturbance:

"Ireland is a very poor country. Her resources are quite undeveloped. Practically it is hardly an exaggeration to say that she has not yet entered upon her economic life. Naturally, therefore, she requires abundant capital and abundant labor." It goes on to say that Irish savings amounting to £13,-

000,000 sterling are employed not in developing any Irish industry, but are exported to London and "invested in Imperial funds to bolster up the credit of the United Kingdom."

There is no trust more fraught with danger than a money trust. When President Jackson was told that the United States bank could elect or defeat not only minor candidates, but even presidential candidates, that democratic statesman and warrior replied with an oath that if such were so, it had more power than it ought to have and more than he was willing for it to retain. Since McKinley's administration and including it, there have been created 283 trusts and they to-day dominate and control the government at Washington. They have enacted a tariff that insures them excessive profits and the President, although well known to have favored a downward modification of the tariff law, has accepted the Aldrich schedule, praising its maker and declaring that the higher interests of the country demand the maintenance of Republican Party solidarity. But dissension and revolt have followed and it may be that the insurgent will march side by side with the Democrat, putting country above party, which is the right and duty of the citizen.

There is always an appeal to the people and to the people we appeal with confidence against the creation of this latest federal Frankenstein—a trust which if once established, may permanently dominate if not destroy our republican form of government. The Central Bank cannot be regarded in any other light than an attempt to create a money trust—which would be the most menacing of all trusts and overshadow them all.

Related to this discussion is the Income Tax.

The Income Tax is properly before the people, not as a mere suggestion but as a definite proposal. Both houses of congress have passed and proposed to the states a constitutional amendment conferring power upon the federal government to impose an income tax on individuals. Congress claims power to impose the new corporation income tax as an excise. It is necessary that thirty-four states through their legislatures shall ratify the amendment, and most of the legislatures which shall vote on this proposal will be elected this year. There is a grave question about its success because of the powerful interests arrayed against it. It is confidently predicted that New York, Massachusetts, Rhode Island and other eastern states will refuse to ratify it. Alabama has been the first state to ratify, while Georgia, after a heated discussion in the legislature, failed to take action. The story of the Georgia campaign seems to indicate the lines upon which the battle will be fought. The protected interests and the great trusts opposed the income tax, not only because the individual members thereof are loth to make their contribution to the support of the government in proportion to their swollen profits, but because of the fear that the income tax will provide a revenue for the government so large that the protective tariff as a means of raising revenue will be discounted and the tariff itself revised downwards. The demand for the income tax amendment became a popular movement when the supreme court decided by a vote of five to four that congress had no power, and at the same time an impetus was given to another remarkable movement of which we have heard but little—that of calling a constitutional convention for the amendment of the constitution itself. This movement was started for the purpose of providing for the popular election of United States senators, but when once such a convention is assembled there is no doubt other questions, such as the income tax, will be considered, and if the income tax amendment as now proposed be defeated, additional strength will possibly be given to the movement for the call of a constitutional convention, which has never been held since the famous instrument was drafted by the convention of Philadelphia, under the chairmanship of George Washington. Such a convention can be called by congress when two-thirds of the legislatures of the states make application to congress therefor and already thirty states have so applied. All other constitutional amendments have been proposed by the congress and ratified by the states.

The federal constitution provides that all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States and that direct taxes, levied by congress, shall be apportioned among the several states according to their population. The Income Tax was first levied by the United States government as a war measure. In 1861 congress authorized a tax of 3 per cent. on all incomes over $800 per annum. In 1862, an act was passed taxing all incomes under $5,000 5 per cent. with an exception of $600 and house rent actually paid. In 1864 the law imposed 10 per cent. on incomes of more than $5,000. This law was repealed in 1872, and the amount collected under it was $347,000,000. And again it was levied when in August, 1894, the Wilson Tariff Law imposed a tax of 2 per cent. on all incomes in excess of $4,000 and it was this tax that the supreme court in 1895 declared unconstitutional by a vote of five to four. It did not differ in any material respect from the war measures which stood. The supreme court unexpectedly held that taxes on land are considered to be direct taxes and that a tax on rent or income derived from land is a direct tax within the meaning of the constitution, and that a tax upon income derived from bonds issued by a municipal corporation is a tax upon the power of the state and its instrumentalities and is consequently repugnant to the constitution. Where congress has the power to levy direct taxes, it must apportion them according to the population of the states and because there was no attempt to do this by the Wilson bill, the law was declared void and of no effect.

The income tax as an economic proposition is sound because, first, it is the most just and equitable tax and is borne by the citizen in proportion to his ability to pay; second, it would be collected wholly by the government, which would receive the whole tax instead of allowing the special interests through the tariff to act as "tax farmers," one of the evils which led to the French Revolution, to collect it largely for their own benefit; third, it is a direct tax and is felt by the citizen and impresses upon him the fact that he is contributing to his government and that he should be interested in its economical management; fourth, it is not a tax on business.

As to the justice of an income tax, Adam Smith says: "The subjects of every state ought to contribute to the support of the government as nearly as possible in proportion to their respective abilities, that is, in proportion to the revenues which they respectively enjoy under the protection of the state."

It is needless here to dwell upon the extravagance of the government—the billion-dollar congress of a few years ago which shocked the country has now yielded to the two-billion-dollar congress which is sitting in Washington—and yet, because our federal taxes are collected through the custom house and the internal revenue departments, where not being general, and being indirect, they are not recognized as taxes, you hear no insistent demand for retrenchment. We have entered on a reign of extravagance and the people are lulled into silence by false pretensions.

Unlike the tariff tax, the government can safely approximate its revenues under an income tax, and it is not exposed to the frauds which have but recently been revealed in the matter of the sugar trust in the New York custom house. The income tax does not bear upon business. It does not harass industry, nor obstruct the production of wealth. It is levied on the net profits, and, if there are no profits, then there is no tax. If there are great profits, the tax can easily be paid. If there are small profits, the impost is light. The federal government should have this power because in time of war it is necessary, and in time of peace it can be used to reduce the burdensome protective tariff schedule which bears so heavily upon the people and which has led to the creation of the "criminal trusts." But on account of the deficiency in our revenue to-day, the income tax apparently is necessary; that is to say, the tariff schedules are so excessive that importations have fallen off (where they have not been practically prohibited) and the trusts, by reason of the high protective tariff, control the market, selling their manufactured goods to our own people arbitrarily at high prices while selling foreign people the identical goods at greatly reduced prices, thus giving to foreigners the benefits which are supposed to accrue to this country by the protective policy. The Wilson Tariff reduced the schedule and, in order to make up for any deficiency in revenue on that account, provided for the income tax which was set aside by the supreme court.

No greater hardship could befall the country if the tariff were held at its present proportions, or increasing proportions (which tends to cut off importations and leave us absolutely at the mercy of the trusts) and at the same time, there be imposed upon us income taxation; and yet, under the present rule of the Republican Party that might possibly be our fate. But the big interests know that if the government has the instrumentality for raising revenue by the income tax, there will be less hesitancy in reducing the tariff tax and that is why the big interests are opposed to the income tax.

The Democratic Party is committed to a tariff for revenue with incidental protection, and on account of the great cost of maintaining this government, the custom house will always be a large source of revenue and the income tax at best will be only supplemental thereto. Therefore, it is in accordance with sound public policy to advocate not only the downward revision of the tariff, but the creation of a tax on income. For this reason the constitutional amendment should prevail.

An Informal Introduction.

Moses Brayton was born in the James River valley in Virginia, but, a few years before the Civil War, his father's family removed with their few slaves and a carload of good horses to Bates county, Missouri, and there acquired a considerable acreage suitable for a stock farm unfortunately near to the Kansas border. The Braytons were ardent pro-slavery people and early lent a hand in shaping the territory to the west to the pro-slavery interest. In fact they were soon thick in the "border ruffian" troubles with consequences more injurious to themselves than to their opponents. They became marked for the reprisals of the Kansas "Jayhawkers," with the result that their brood mares were one by one transferred to Kansas ownership while Colonel Jennison did a nice stroke of business with their stallion up in Iowa.

All these events were impressed indelibly on the mind of the boy, Moses, and inspired him with hatred of the "Yankees" before he was old enough to understand what it all meant, but by the time the war broke out he was able to understand more of the matter, yet was not old enough to take a part in it with his elder brothers. The quarrel between Missouri and Kansas had now resolved itself into feuds between neighbor and neighbor. It was in one of these quarrels that his elder brother lost his life, after having killed one of a neighbor's sons and wounded another. His remaining brother, next older than himself, lost his life fighting under McCulloch at the battle of Dug Spring, August 2, 1861, and his father was brought home wounded unto death in the second day's battle at Pea Ridge under Van Dorn. He remained with his mother on what was left of the farm a year longer, the slaves having all escaped into Kansas, when she died of a broken heart and he found himself slightly over seventeen years of age, alone in the world with none of kin that he knew of nearer than the James river in Virginia.

Somehow, his father's saddle horse, the most likely colt the farm had produced, had been brought home with its wounded owner, together with his father's side arms, consisting of a bowie knife and a pair of as good revolvers as the time afforded. Having spent half a night in the company of the graves of his annihilated family, Moses mounted his father's horse and, with his father's arms, rode northward with the purpose of joining Quantrill in the "Sni Hills" south of Kansas City, bent on selling his life for as many of the lives of his Yankee enemies as would even up the score of family losses. He was tall for his age, with a grave face and with an old head upon his shoulders. He was a fine horseman and a good shot, kept his head and planned for results. He was a stranger to fear.

It was a hot August morning in 1863 that three hundred butternut-clad men of the border rode into the little city of Lawrence, Kansas, to pay off old scores, and in the company captained by the notorious Bill Todd, rode Moses Brayton, athirst for revenge. It was just daybreak and only early risers were astir. In a quarter of an hour the entire town was covered in detachments. Wherever a man was seen he was a target for bullets and wherever a home looked pretentious it was made food for flames. The stores, banks and hotels were looted and, in the stillness of a sultry atmosphere, the smoke from a hundred conflagrations rose straight into the air and, there uniting, lifted aloft a canopy of cloud to notify the surrounding territory of the fulfillment of the long prophesied sacking of the abolition town.

The carnival of crime against a surprised non-combatant and defenseless citizenry had been going on for perhaps three hours when a squad of the raiders, to which Moses Brayton had attached himself, stopped in front of a small cottage on the northern slope of Mount Oread. The men leaped from their horses and, leaving one to hold them, strode into the yard. A girl of eleven or twelve years of age appeared upon the veranda. "What do you want?" she asked.

Had the men been less under the influence of whisky obtained from the looted saloons

THE CONQUEST OF LEMOILE

BY

ARTHUR J. PILLSBURY

her simple question should have been sufficient to apprise them that she was of their own strain of American blood. Her tone and enunciation were unmistakably Southern, but none noted it save Moses Brayton, who had let liquor alone, satisfying himself with blood.

"We want your men folks, quick," demanded the corporal in charge.

"There is no one here but papa and he is ill in bed with fever and ague and delirious. Surely you won't disturb him. It might kill him."

"We'll be the judges as to that," was the reply as the men strode in and ransacked the house from cellar to garret.

"I was born in Virginia, boys," the sick man said as the men rushed through, and then fell to babbling of the farm on the Waukrusa and the stock that needed his attention and how he must get back to the farm as quickly as possible.

"The hell he came from Virginia!" exclaimed the corporal commanding, as he pulled out of a pile of clothes on the closet floor a union soldier's uniform. "We'll fix him, damn him."

"It ain't mine!" the sick man screamed sitting up in bed, "you fool, it ain't mine!"

"You lie, it is," thundered the corporal as he drew his revolver and leveled it at the sick man's head, the same instant giving the command to fire the house.

There was a scream and the half-grown schoolgirl flew into the face of the corporal like a wildcat. She kicked and clawed and scratched and clung to him so that he could not use his weapon, except to try to beat her off with it. The while the sick man was calling, "Lemoile, Lemoile; don't, Lemoile. Let him have dad. Dad can't get well no-how. He'll kill you, Lemoile! He'll kill you, daughter! Don't."

The unequal struggle went on and then there was a shot and the sick man fell back upon his pillow, the blood pouring from a ghastly wound along the parting line of the hair that thinly covered his head.

The whole incident, only one out of more than a hundred similar ones enacted that morning, had scarcely taken more than a moment of time, and yet it was time enough for Moses Brayton to take in the truth of the matter and to resolve how to act.

He, too, rushed upon the drunken, frenzied corporal, who was trying to get a second shot at the sick man, and wrenched the smoking revolver from his hands. "Fight men," he cried, "and not school girls and sick men."

"You hound!" was the retort, "I'll fix you here and now," and shaking himself free of Lemoile, the corporal drew back and reached for his second pistol. For an instant Lemoile stood at the foot of her father's bed like a statue. Then she saw that which never after left her memory. Looking into the face of her butternut-clad champion she saw a second pair of eyes come into view from behind and beyond the first pair. They were beady and cruel and gleamed like the eyes of a cat at night. Then she saw a flash of steel and the corporal lay disemboweled at her feet.

The house was aflame in a score of places. The young man threw a blanket over the sick man, called to the girl to follow, and, bearing the father in his arms, strode out into the yard and to his horse. "Take the next house, men," he commanded. "These are our kind of people. I must take them to a place of safety." He threw the inert body into the saddle, helped the girl up behind to hold on to her father and, running by the horse's side to help hold the sick man in the saddle, hurried toward a bit of timber to the north and west, partly surrounded by a dense cornfield. Arrived there he laid the sick and wounded man on a blanket in the shade, found some water in the bottom of the ravine, and washed the blood from the wound. He found that it was only superficial, but the bullet had plowed a furrow along the skull from forehead to crown; and so he assured Lemoile.

Bidding Lemoile to hold his horse until he came back, Moses plunged into the cornfield, revolver in hand, and presently returned with a citizen he had found in hiding. "Here, take care of these people," he commanded. "I have just killed my own corporal to save the lives of this man and this child, whom I believe to be my kind of people. I am a reb. I hate you Yanks and I have killed enough of you to-day to square accounts with my family, but I went into this thing to fight men and sack cities, not to assassinate school girls and bedridden ague patients. If I go back to Quantrill's band they will shoot me to-night for killing my commanding officer. If you Yanks catch me, you will hang me. It is me and that horse for it, so off with your clothes and on with mine and be quick about it."

"Good by, Lemoile," the young man said, holding out his hand. "The fight you put up for your father's life made me love you, made me sure that you are my kind of people, however you come to be here. It ain't likely we'll ever meet again. I'm off for Pap Price and the Confederate army down in Arkansas, so good bye."

He reached for the reins. Lemoile handed them to him and stood looking at him with quivering lip. Then she sprang forward, threw her arms about his neck, kissed him and burst into tears, the first she had shed. He leaped into his saddle, put the spurs to his horse and made for the tall timber along the Kaw river off to the west.

Finding a secluded place where his horse could feed he threw himself upon the ground and slept until nightfall. He was at home alike in woods and prairie and, under cover of darkness, made his way back to his old home in Bates county, Missouri, and to the family burial place in the corner of the orchard. There he gave an account to his own dead of the lives he had taken in requital of theirs, but promised henceforth to be a soldier and not a guerilla. The Lawrence raid had sated him with that. It had made him heart-sick of, if not soul-sorry for, murder, just plain murder inspired by hate.

He made his way into Arkansas, enlisted as a private in Price's army and went with it on its raid into Missouri and to the Kansas border in 1864. When the war closed he was a first lieutenant and a good soldier, but penniless, and so he followed some Texas volunteers back into the cattle country and became a vaquero.

But wherever he went there was scarcely a quiet hour that did not bring to him remembrance of Lemoile, a girl with whom he had spent scarcely a half hour of his life, and always he was saying to himself, "She is my kind of people. She is my kind of people." Whether riding the cattle range, following the trail to the market in Kansas, or watching the sleeping herd at night, thoughts of Lemoile were seldom out of his mind. Then he remembered what a beautiful child she was, not more than a dozen years old, he reckoned, on the day that Lawrence was sacked, but immature as she then was she gave splendid promise of a beautiful womanhood. Three years had passed since then. She must now be fifteen and perhaps in her sixteenth year, as he was in his twenty-first. Would she remember him? Well, why not? Did her father get well or succumb to the fever, rough usage and his wound? If he had died what had become of Lemoile?

Then he remembered that all he knew about her was that her name was Lemoile. What her other name was he had not the remotest idea and he had not told her his own name at all. Why not go back to Lawrence and look her up? Having little else to think of through the lone watches of day or night, he thought of Lemoile, and so by and by resolved that the next time he went with a drove to Southern Kansas he would just keep on going until he struck the trail of Lemoile. And he went; but not until after he had followed the cattle for two years, had become the head vaquero of the ranch and a terror to cattle rustlers in that part of Texas.

his company will probably have to quit and lose their investment.

Then the Guggenheims discovered that their breakwater at Katalla was no good either. They had spent $3,000,000 to break Bruener, and had succeeded, but otherwise their money had been thrown away. Then they discovered that Cordova was the only feasible port and they transferred the fight to that point. Here they encountered Heney, whose operations had been based on Cordova as a port from the first.

Heney was a successful builder of railroads in Alaska, and had all the advantages of that nearly unique experience. Besides, the English capitalists behind him were financially powerful. The Guggenheims "backfired" Heney. They went to London and bought off his backers. They then showed him where they had knocked the platform from under his feet and offered him the job of percentage contractor in the construction of their road. He accepted.

The field was now clear, and the Guggenheims pushed the construction from Cordova to the Copper river and up the river toward Copper Center. In the extensive operations incident to the elimination of their competitors, they had embarrassed the finances of their road, and, to repair these and for other reasons, they sold a half interest in it to J. P. Morgan & Co., and this partnership of the Guggenheims with the Morgans is known as the Alaska Syndicate. Besides supplying financial deficiencies, Morgan also agreed to supply some old steamers from an Atlantic line for the sea connection between Cordova and Seattle.

The railroad construction was now continued up the Copper river, and to date about 100 miles of the road has been completed and pioneered. This cost $100,000 a mile, or $10,000,000. This sum, added to the $3,000,000 thrown away at Katalla, the cost of buying out Rosene and the English backers of Heney, and the cost of cleaning out the other competitors, brought their total expenditures up to some $15,000,000. A branch line, also, was surveyed to the east toward the Cunningham group of coal beds, but the actual construction was pushed only on the Copper river and far beyond the branching point, going on north toward the Bonanza.

Then came disillusion. The final report of the engineers at the Bonanza was filed last year, and, after eight years of painful exploration, the original known body of copper ore—23,000 tons—was increased only to 30,000 tons. This included all hidden deposits, and represented all the hope the engineers held out as to the total capacity of the mine.

This was staggering news. The rich promise of inexhaustible copper so shattered was bad enough; but the bursted bubble of endless freights was worse. Comparatively little had been spent in developing the mine, but here were $15,000,000 gone into a scheme to control transportation that would end at an exploded bonanza. For 30,000 tons of copper ore, running 60 per cent. pure, would be 18,000 tons of pure copper. The cost of mining, transportation, smelting, and marketing is ten cents a pound. The market price is fourteen cents. That leaves four cents a pound net profit on 18,000 tons of copper—$6,000,000 pounds—or $1,440,000 profit in the entire mine. And this the return that might be expected on a road one-third completed at a cost of $15,000,000, with the prospect of having to spend about five millions more before the mine could be reached!

The Guggenheims and Morgan were dazed but not despairing. On the fifth of this month the following despatch appeared in newspapers throughout the country. The despatch was sent out in the ordinary routine by the Associated Press, but we add the illuminating head used over it by the San Francisco Bulletin of the next afternoon:

GUGGENHEIMS WANT GOVERNMENT TO BACK ALASKAN R. R. PROJECT. Exhibit of Innocent-Looking Vegetables in Washington Reveals Scheme to Get Hand Into the Public Treasury.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 5. A scheme for a Government guaranty for a through railroad project from tide water to interior Alaska, in which the Guggenheim interests figure, looms back of a display of near Arctic grain and vegetables that stocked the room of the House Committee on Territories to-day.

The Guggenheim mining interests have copper properties in the Copper river section and until recently it has been claimed that they wanted no guaranty.

Now a movement has been given new life looking to general legislation to guarantee the interest on the bonds of railroads built in Alaska after a certain amount of construction work has been completed. Its advocates claim that capital cannot be induced into the territory without government co-operation. The matter has not yet come before the committee.

The railroad project with its proposed connections contemplates a tide water outlet at Cordova, east of Valdez, the eastern terminus to be at Fairbanks, not far from the Arctic Circle, and the exhibit on the territory committee's table is intended to show what that section can produce and promise in the way of agricultural traffic.

It would be interesting to know just how fertile the Copper River valley is for agricultural products. The photographs of it in government reports show a barren and uninviting country. Its population now is certainly nil, and its present or immediately prospective need for a railroad, so far as agriculture is concerned, is about the same as that of the Sahara desert. One government report says that there is "enough timber for local uses." The other conceivable resource for freight for such a railroad is the coal country to be tapped by the proposed branch, but this branch is only "proposed"; the actual construction does not go near it. And the suggestion that the ultimate destination of the road is Fairbanks is nonsense, because the route from Skagway (which would be about two inches to the right on an extension of our map) is so much more direct and has so much the easier grades that any feasible road from Fairbanks to the sea would certainly be built that way.

Hence the conclusion that the Guggenheims are beseeching government aid for a practical railroad benefit to Alaska seems to be questionable. The more plausible view of the case, in view of the facts, seems to be that the Guggenheims and Morgan got badly bitten on their copper mine and railroad, and are now begging the federal government to make good their losses.

It is a beautiful scheme, and it may work—it should not be forgotten that the Cunningham coal grab nearly succeeded, and may yet succeed. But the public is at least entitled to know that such a subsidy as is asked will pull about $15,000,000 worth of scorched chestnuts out of the fire for the proponents of the scheme, without any immediate or even approximate return to the public.

Now comes the humor of the situation—at least it is grimly humorous in California, where the San Francisco Chronicle is known. On the morning of the 8th, two days after the despatch quoted above appeared in the Bulletin, the Chronicle lumbered on the scene with the following editorial, written in the Chronicle's characteristic style:

RAILROADS IN ALASKA. A Proposal That the United States Government Shall Aid Them.

There is a proposition to build a railroad from tide-water to the interior of Alaska, which will reach some copper deposits in which the Guggenheims are interested. The mines would contribute a large tonnage to the business of the road, but not sufficient, as those interested claim, to justify the building of the road as part of the mining plant. It is claimed that the route would pass through a country suitable for settlement, and it is said that congress will be asked to guarantee interest on cost of construction.

The fact that the "Guggenheims" are interested in the mines, and presumably expect to make money by working them, will be reason enough for a certain class of our people to make the heavens ring with their protests. Upon the theory of a certain cult it would be better that Alaska should remain forever a wilderness than that any one should make money by developing its resources. The proposition should, nevertheless, be considered on its merits. Nobody yet knows whether the proposed railroad will pay or not. Nobody will ever know until the experiment is tried. If the mines will not supply a sufficient traffic the road can only pay by the development of the country. The United States owns the soil of Alaska, and thus far it has proved an exceedingly profitable investment. The treasury itself is way ahead in its outlay, to say nothing of the profit made by individuals and diffused among the people. The United States as a government and a people have more to gain than any individual or group by the development of Alaska, and there is much force in the contention that they should share the risk of experimental development. What ought to be done depends on the facts in the case.

It is not a new thing for this government to assist railroads pioneering in a new country. It aided by bonds the first transcontinental road to be built, and has been repaid, principal and interest. Congress has authorized the Philippine government to stand behind railroads for the development of those islands. It is by no means certain that the nation ought not to get behind the first railroad of Alaska. If there is traffic developed to make the road pay, it will cost the government nothing. If there is a loss, it is certainly as proper for the government to stand a loss to a moderate amount on a railroad constructed within its own territory for the use of its own people as it is to stand whatever loss may accrue from the building of an isthmian canal which will be used mainly by our commercial rivals.

Whether the Chronicle's familiar fondness for all forms of corporate exploitation, or more utilitarian reasons, induced it to rush to the aid of the distressed Guggenheims, it hit the nail in one respect at least: "The fact that the 'Guggenheims' are interested" has truly come to be "reason enough" for nervousness in the public as to the safety of the public's interest. Since the bald announcement by Simon Guggenheim of the exact price he paid for a seat in the United States Senate as the representative of Colorado, the public has listened with growing apprehension to the chorus of complaint from all parts of Alaska where their operations have created panic amongst smaller men who have mining claims to protect.

In the course of a rambling interview in a recent issue of the New York Sun, Daniel Guggenheim made the following statements, which the Sun report prefaces with the sentence "In advocating that the government should take a hand, he said:"

While I deprecate all unnecessary interference with business matters on the part of our government, yet I appreciate this necessity and cannot but admire the results which have been attained by the German government in its efforts to foster the welfare of German commerce.

The demoralization caused in the past in the manufacturing industry using copper by such excessive prices as twenty-five cents a pound and the losses in subsequent decline to twelve cents are fresh in our minds. Such excessive fluctuation in value results in serious injury to the whole community. The advantages of a stable or fairly assured price are beyond dispute. The enormous capital required to develop a prospect to a producing mine and to build the necessary reduction works with railroad connection should be more readily attained at a greatly reduced risk. The spirit of speculation which is engendered in connection with such radical advances in prices is most unhealthy, and on the decline those are sure to lose who are least able to do so.

If a "campaign of education" can do it, the Guggenheims will hand this $15,000,000 gold brick to the American people, and keep whatever gold is in the brick! We earnestly commend this transaction to the attention of the congressional investigators.

UP AND DOWN THE STATE.

The city trustees having provided for the payment of $1,000 annually for the expenses of the institution, Hollister will have a $10,000 Carnegie free public library.

Alden B. Anderson having resigned his position as a member of the board of trustees of the Chico state normal school, F. J. O'Brien, of the Chico Enterprise, has been appointed to the place.

In the Coalinga oil field, natural gas from a well being bored for oil caught fire and, some days later, still was burning fiercely.

A. W. Lando, who was one of the San Francisco vigilantes in pioneer days, recently died at the home of his sister in Stockton.

It is reported that, commencing about April 1st, a half-hourly service will be established between San Francisco and San Rafael.

The supervisors of Shasta county have adopted an ordinance illegalizing all sorts of gambling.

The electors of Arroyo Grande will vote on a proposition to incorporate that place as a city of the sixth class.

The Madera Tribune issued a twelve-page "industrial edition" which was full of information concerning that city and the surrounding country.

The Placerville Mountain Democrat has passed its fifty-eight birthday, and still, as it has been for many years, is in charge of G. J. Carpenter, one of the oldest editors in the state.

During the year 1909 the Coalinga fields produced more than 15,000,000 barrels of oil, thus establishing its position in the first rank of the world's producing fields.

are really in earnest in their wish to emancipate this state from corporation control were to hold no conferences, evolve no leaderships, bring out no candidates, but leave all those functions to be performed by Mr. Herrin's gophers working under ground. When these who stand for Right Things do get together, however, they should be careful whom they do not invite to participate in their deliberations. There were men at their late conference who would sell out every sound principle for the consideration of receiving the support of the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau in the event that the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League were successful in nominating a reform Republican for governor. The Democratic sheep need to be separated from the Democratic goats at such conference as certainly as the Republican insurgents need to be separated from those who take orders from Mr. Herrin, and the pity is that the Democratic and Republican sheep cannot somehow make common cause against the goats of both persuasions. They are likely to do it to a greater degree this year than ever before. They fought together shoulder to shoulder in the last legislature, why not in the open? That way lies victory for Right Things—ever so much more important than victory for Republican or Democratic parties.

Not a Very Bad Guess The Oakland Tribune seems to have been responsible for the story that Governor James N. Gillett had determined not to run for re-election and had decided to throw his influence to Mayor Mott of Oakland, in the hope of uniting the two factions of the Republican party. The story is denied in toto both by Governor Gillett and Mayor Mott. What else could the poor men do? Having originated with the Oakland Tribune the improbability of the truth of the story amounted almost to a certainty, and yet the story was not inherently improbable and may not have been a bad guess. Unless outward indications are deceiving Governor Gillett has been kept on the anxious seat between a sweat and a shiver in order that Charles F. Curry might make good, if he could, his claims to a popular backing that would carry him safely through the primaries, and Gillett would be more than humanly patient, as well as subservient, if he did not resent that cooling-off process. It would not be unnatural for him to try to get even, if he must break with the "organization," by trying to throw his influence to an anti-organization man. Mayor Mott of Oakland is such a man. The Lincoln-Roosevelt people entertain no suspicions as to his loyalty to the cause of making California a free state and, in the event that neither Hiram Johnson nor W. R. Davis are centered upon as The Man, the stock of Frank K. Mott might easily climb to first place in the camp of the reformers. He has made good as mayor and that is not a bad training school for the gubernatorial office.

Chas. M. Belshaw Wants The League's Endorsement Last week The Watchman expressed doubts as to whether or not former Senator Charles M. Belshaw wanted the endorsement or nomination for governor of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League. He has since removed all doubt by saying that he does. Well, the thing that is worth having is generally worth asking for and, if one wants it, the manly way is to ask for it right out in plain language, as Mr. Belshaw has done. The Watchman is not able to say what the league will do about it. No one can answer that question yet, and it is sufficient for this time to say that Mr. Belshaw is before the Progressive Republican element in California politics as an applicant for its favor, and he is also in the hands of his friends. Some of those friends are reported to have said that $100,000 can be raised to put behind Belshaw's candidacy if the league looks with favor upon him. Mr. Belshaw is himself a very wealthy man. They are also claiming that he can draw more largely from the "organization" than perhaps any other Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican so far mentioned as a candidate. There might be something in that, too.

They Almost Wish That They Had Not Done It There are some indications that some of Mayor McCarthy's plug hat supporters wish that they had not thrown their support to him in the recent election. They are beginning to feel uneasy through fear that he may not "come through" when their plans to loot the public come up to him. Perhaps not. So far there is no reason why the higher-up hold-ups should mourn without hope. The unswerving, uncompromising integrity of the mayor of San Francisco is yet to be demonstrated. He is not unlikely to prove a surprise in more ways than one and proving thoroughly and impeccably honest may turn out to be one of those surprises. Certain it is that the support he got at the expense of Crocker was not given him with any such expectation. So far the characteristics he has mainly manifested have been a low standard of public morality and pugnacity. As to Spring Valley he deserves to be canonized along with the cow that kicked over the lamp that set fire to the stable that burnt Chicago. His antic, unless remedied, will have a similar effect upon San Francisco. He has flaunted the flag of defiance in the face of a congress and an administration that stand for the inviolability of investments, and especially investments in public utilities. No British city is permitted to render valueless any public service investment by municipal trading in competition therewith and no American city, dependent upon congress for a source of municipal water supply, will be permitted to do that either if "the interests" can prevent it, and they can. Unless some good angel of the unforeseen comes to the rescue McCarthy will prove the marplot that wrecked the Tuolumne water proposition.

Building Trades Council Is Doing Some Politics The State Building Trades Council, over which Mayor McCarthy presides, and which he was certain to try to run to his own liking, has been in session this week at Monterey. The delegates are citizens of this commonwealth and it is the part of good citizenship for them to take an interest in political affairs. Therefore it is not improper or surprising that there should have been considerable political talk at that council. It was bruited about during the late campaign in San Francisco that the offensive and defensive arrangements entered into between McCarthy and his labor party managers and the Southern Pacific Political Bureau, whereby Crocker was slaughtered in the house of his friends and McCarthy elected, were to extend to and through the state campaign for the purpose of perpetuating the power of that Political Bureau. A bit of evidence in confirmation of this deal is to be found in the fact that it was at this council that the candidacy of Frank McGowan for attorney general of the state was announced. He it was who made the race for district attorney of San Francisco against Langdon two years ago, with all the influences that were behind Fickert last fall behind him. His candidacy also affords at least cumulative evidence of the rumor that the Political Bureau has soured on General Webb. Frank McGowan is too careful and experienced a politician to enter the contest for an office like that without a pretty straight tip from headquarters that his candidacy will be looked upon with favor. The fog seems to be lifting.

HELP THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY.

If you want to do so, whenever you have a dollar to spend, remember its advertisers, and when you spend that dollar with one of its advertisers see to it that that advertiser is made to remember The California Weekly. That will help.

"I suppose your art finds reward for waiting and self-denial in the applause that greets you." "Applause!" echoed Mr. Stormington Barnes. "Even that has been monopolized by the grasping hand of politics. What artist could hope for an hour and a half of solid applause? been deceived as to the sources of party contributions by the managers of their own campaigns. It is certain at least that neither one of them ever deliberately lied to the public about that or anything else, but this paper has no disposition to make flesh of one and fowl of the other party in this respect. The whole system of financing campaigns is wrong. The time must come when all such expenses as are needed to be incurred for public education in political campaigns must become a public charge and all such expenses as are not legitimate must be forbidden under heavy penalties. The California Weekly has advocated the devoting of the poll tax to this purpose. With compulsory voting a great part of this vast expense can be avoided. Our present method of conducting campaigns is extravagant and inefficient for purposes of education. The issue raised by our correspondent is one that we shall all have to do some head-cracking study over before we work the problem out, but it can be done and must be.

In the Matter of the Petition of THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY, to ascertain and establish its standing as a newspaper of general circulation. No. 26,667. Dept. 12.

DECISION AND JUDGMENT.

In the above entitled matter, the petition of The California Weekly, by A. J. Pilbury, its editor and manager, for a decision and judgment ascertaining and establishing said The California Weekly as a newspaper of general circulation, having come on regularly to be heard this 31st day of December, 1909, W. H. Payson, Esq., appearing as attorney for petitioner, and no other appearances having been made, herein.
And it appearing to the satisfaction of the Court that due notice of said petition was duly given and published, as required by law and the order of the Court herein, and the hearing of said petition having, by order of this Court, been set for this day at the hour of Ten o'clock, A. M., in the courtroom of said Court, Department No. 12, No. 216 McAllister Street, in the City and County of San Francisco, and now, at the time and place specified the said petition having been heard, and testimony taken, and no person appearing to contest the said petition, and the matter having been submitted to the Court for decision, and the Court being fully advised in the premises,
NOW, THEREFORE, it is hereby found, ordered, adjudged and decreed that all the facts stated in said petition are true; that the said newspaper, The California Weekly, is and for upwards of one year last past next preceding the making and filing of said petition, has been, a newspaper published for the dissemination of local news and intelligence, of a general character, and during all of said time has had, and now has, a bona fide subscription list of paid subscribers, and that said newspaper has been established, printed and published at regular intervals, to-wit, once a week, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, for upwards of one year next preceding the date of filing of said petition; that said The California Weekly is not devoted to the interests or published for the entertainment or instruction of a particular class, profession, trade, calling, race or denomination, or for any number thereof, or with the avowed or any purpose to entertain or instruct such classes; and that said The California Weekly is hereby ascertained and established as a newspaper of general circulation as that term is defined in Section 4460 of the Political Code of the State of California.
Dated December 31st, 1909.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The State Controller.

The State Controller, or Controller of State (both names are used in the statutes), is the same officer who in a majority of commonwealths is designated as the State Auditor, and in a few as the Comptroller. Indeed, the latter spelling was used in the original constitution of California, but in process of time the word got into the statutes as Controller, and in that form it was adopted into the constitution of 1879. However spelled, its primary significance is that of an accounting officer, which is what the Controller of California is.

In the earliest days of our state government he was the chief auditor of claims against the treasury; but in the later '50's, after there had been considerable laxity in the allowance of questionable accounts, the legislature created an ex-officio auditing board, called the State Board of Examiners, composed of the Governor, the Secretary of State and the Attorney-General, whose approval is required in nearly all classes of claims before the Controller can draw warrants for their payment.

But notwithstanding the institution of the Board of Examiners, the Controller still has functions to perform, and very important ones, too, in the auditing of accounts. He is the final auditor, and his specialty is passing upon the legality of the claims presented; he is responsible upon his bond (of $50,000) for the payment of an illegal claim, and he is not relieved of that liability by the fact that the claim in question may have been approved by the Board of Examiners. The latter body in passing on claims against the state devotes consideration to questions of public policy as well as legality; the Controller has little to do except with the technical correctness and legality of the claims.

The Controller is the state's head book-keeper, and all of its accounts must go through his office. No money can be paid out of the treasury except upon a warrant signed by him, and this enables him to keep an exact check upon the income and outgo. By requirement of law he must keep his books so that at all times they will show to a cent the amounts of money which have been received, which have been expended, and which should be on hand in cash. Not only can no money be paid out without the Controller's warrant, but none can be paid into the treasury without his order to the State Treasurer to receive it. The books of the Controller and of the Treasurer must agree, and their agreement is a proof of correctness of the accounts. A third set of books covering most of the expenditures of the state is kept by the Board of Examiners, which is an additional check, and, of course, all the different departments, offices, boards, commissions and institutions have their own accounts, which are checked by the Controller's books. All officers and departments which collect any money must report once a month to the Controller and at the same time pay their collections into the treasury.

In the Political Code several pages are taken up in enumerating the duties of the Controller, the first mentioned being "to superintend the fiscal concerns of the state." In other words, he is to the state government what the Secretary of the Treasury is to the government of the United States. It is his duty once in two years to make such a report upon the finances of the state as will give the Governor and the legislature a clear and comprehensive idea of the revenues and the expenditures, and he must also "suggest plans for the improvement and management of the public revenues."

A very important function of the Controller is to make up the estimate of expenses of the coming two years. This is a part of his biennial report, and this estimate is always made the basis of the general appropriation bill which is reported by the Ways and Means Committee of the legislature. To compile the estimate properly calls for careful study of the work and the needs of all the state offices and institutions, and usually it is the unpleasant duty of the Controller to make large cuts in the requested appropriations of all departments.

"To direct and superintend the collection of all moneys due the state" is the way in which the code states one of the most important duties of the Controller. To enable him to do this he is authorized to inspect the books and accounts of all officers, to require them to report in any form he deems proper, and to sue them when they are delinquent. To a considerable extent, the County Auditors, Treasurers and Tax Collectors come under the supervision of the Controller, for they all act as agents of the state in the collection of its revenues. Questions of the administrative construction of the laws which these officers encounter and find it difficult to solve are usually passed up to the Controller.

But They Get It, Nevertheless.

IN HIS ADDRESS at Williams College, a scathing arraignment of Theodore Roosevelt, James R. Garfield and Clifford Pinchot, Secretary Ballinger assured his hearers that not one acre of government land or one reservoir or power site, can be alienated without the sanction of the law. This would be comforting were it not that millions of acres of the public domain, worth hundreds of millions of dollars, have been alienated where the compliance with the law was perfunctory and its spirit was violated at every step. It is against that kind of compliance with the law that the American people are protesting, with what unanimity is well exemplified on another page of this paper, where the voice of the interior press is accepted as the voice of the people.

Does the Voice of Labor Smell of Whisky?

THE ROYAL ARCH is the fraternity of saloon men and represents the saloon interests in city and state. It honored the governor of California and the mayor of San Francisco with a banquet at which it claimed for itself and its interests that social respectability which recognition by high office is presumed to confer. Mayor McCarthy acknowledged that claim in specific terms. Governor Gillett acknowledged it by his presence and participation. Mayor McCarthy went further. He assumed the right to speak with the voice of union labor and, so speaking, thanked the Royal Arch for the service it had rendered labor and pledged the support of labor for the protection of its traffic. He also pledged the voting strength of the Union Labor party to James N. Gillett for renomination and election as governor. May we assume, then, that the voice of labor smells of whisky and that the candidacy of James N. Gillett exudes a similar odor? Or has Mayor McCarthy a right to speak with the voice of union labor, thereby to taint its breath? The California Weekly challenges that right. It holds organized labor more reputable than the organized liquor traffic, the mayor, or the governor who lent his presence to that occasion.

As the Regulars See It.

RAY STANNARD BAKER has been investigating the insurgent movement throughout the Middle West, for the American Magazine, interviewing "regulars" and "insurgents" alike. He finds the regulars amazed that a people should find fault with a policy under which they are prosperous and they have no conception of the hold the insurgent movement is getting upon the minds of men. According to their philosophy, when Big Business thrives no man need be out of a job, and whoever has a job and is not content is a malcontent. They recognize that Big Business runs the government, but see no harm in that and rest secure in the belief that the perfection of their political organization will preserve themselves and their party from harm. They are fat and sleek and in office with the "machine" behind them. What more?

As the Insurgents See It.

THE ISSUE IS, government by Big Business for Big Business, with industrial prosperity a possible incident thereto, or government by the people and for the people with the interests of humanity paramount. The insurgents stand for the regulation of such private and corporate wealth as needs to be regulated for the common good. The movement is general, deepseated, manifest in voters' leagues, civic clubs, good government leagues, and a more independent press. It is unselfish. It is a reaction from that materialism which looks upon money-making as the end of all things. The immediate occasion for the movement is the renewed aggression of corporate capital upon public wealth while it may yet be had, fearing that if there be delay the conservation policy of Roosevelt may put it out of reach. "No one," declares Mr. Baker, "can tell how far the fortunes of this war may carry the antagonists," but his investigations lead him to believe that the insurgents are so deadly in earnest that they will not stop short of the uttermost need. We are participants in one of the great movements of human history.

The Fight Within the Party.

THE INSURGENT MOVEMENT is not defined by party lines. It cuts across both parties, but is puissantly within the Republican party because that party is in power. The struggle is for the possession of the party. The regulars have the President's cabinet and probably the President, the oligarchy of the senate and the autocracy of the house with the sympathy of the federal bench, the millions of Big Business and the ramified machinery of a politico-corporate "organization." The insurgents have a few doughty fighters and awakened public conscience with a zeal for human rights. Whether Republicans or Democrats, the insurgents love the parties with which they have been long associated and are loth to give them up. At present there is no inclination so to do, but rather than fail of restoring government to the people the movement may not only break up old political parties but old systems of industrial and commercial life.

The President's Plan Made Plain.

ONE DAY THIS WEEK it was announced from Washington that the President had determined to make the federal courts the arena of his campaign against illegal trusts and unlawful combinations, from which none guilty might escape. Stocks fell. The next day the President denounced the statement and recalled attention to his anti-trust message, reaffirming his fidelity to the policy therein laid down, which is, first, the enactment of an optional national incorporation law by which all interstate corporations may come under federal control to be regulated; second, the institution of proceedings to drive into such control all who do not voluntarily come in. The President will not be ready for the second act in the drama until the first has been played unless a reluctant congress forces the playing of the second act first. Has the President the grit to "sit tight"? And would it not be as well to make the national incorporation law directly compulsory as indirectly?

Venus de Milo.

THE IMAGINATION LEAPS at a brief line in the despatches describing the Paris flood. "The flood threatened momentarily to inundate the sculpture gallery, where are kept the Venus de Milo and other priceless art treasures." Strange have been the vicissitudes of this masterpiece of the nameless sculptor of ancient Melos. Did she see the sack and rapine of the Greek city before she descended under dust, to lie until the centuries had seen Caesar rise and fall, the Dark Ages gloom and the Renaissance dawn, and Napoleon stride the world and sink like a meteor? In a strange land, amid aliens, she saw the Commune. Now, her lustrous beauty still undimmed, her fate is a deep concern of all the nations. The sculptor's art has triumphed over the fame of kings.

CRUSADE AGAINST HIGH PRICES.

The present crusade against high prices is ill-timed. It should have been started a whole year sooner when something might have been done about it. Nevertheless, it is a good thing to help along, for good may come of it, although not as certainly as a year ago before the tariff bill was disposed of.

It is not easy to put the finger on any one fact and say: This is the all-sufficient cause. Nations as well as individuals suffer from complications of maladies.

One cause of the increased cost of living is the enormous increase in the production of gold. There is no gainsaying this and there is nothing to be done about it, but when men undertake to make it appear that the increased production of gold is the sole cause of high prices they say what is not so.

The tariff has increased the cost of living. In the item of woollens it has enormously increased the cost and outrageously cheapened the quality and comfort of clothing which persons in moderate circumstances are able to buy. In this particular it is a robber tariff and the President would have done both bravely and wisely to have vetoed the tariff bill and sent the issue back to the people rather than submit to extortion from the woolen trust.

There were other schedules in which the duties imposed were of the quality of robbery and not of protection, and they have all conspired to increase the cost of living. Neither the President nor his party can escape responsibility for this factor in the increased cost of living. The American people are being robbed by a tariff policy that was intended, and rightly intended, for their protection.

But more potent, in enhancing the cost of living, is the extortion practiced by trusts and monopolies of high and low degree. The example set by Big Business in the elimination of competition has been imitated by Little Business until there is scarcely a commodity whose price is not injuriously affected by it. Men no longer feel that they can do business at all unless they can be advantaged by some sort of "cinch" on their customers. The price to the retailer is fixed for him by his wholesaler, and the price to the wholesaler is fixed for him by the manufacturer. The manufacturer is in league with other manufacturers sheltered by the tariff wall.

The tendency to eliminate competition has done worse than to enhance the cost of living. It has debauched the moral standards of the commercial world. It has legitimized extortion and has supplanted the spirit of enterprise with that of greed. The government's legal machinery for dealing with such crimes against the common good is clumsy and ineffective, and not until our judicial system is reformed throughout may we expect effective relief from that quarter.

Unquestionably a source of waste is to be found in the clumsy machinery whereby farm products are gathered up and conveyed to the consumer, but this is not a new source of cost and does not account for the enhanced cost of living now being complained of. It is no more wasteful than it has always been.

If the existing movement to reduce the cost of living would be effective it must fight the robberies which hide in the tariff; it must fight for the restoration of free competition in the commerce of this country; it must uphold the moral principle of public service in commerce and industry, as contradistinguishing from brigandage and extortion; it must fight monopoly as it would fight the plague; it must retrieve the powers of government out of the hands of predatory Big Business and restore it to the citizenry; it must struggle for a reformed criminal procedure and a reformed standard of legal ethics on the bench, at the bar and in the minds of the people themselves, who also have had their standards so debauched that they have lost the power to hate evil and are willing to condone rascality if it be successful.

Except we do these things wealth and power will come to be centered in fewer and fewer hands and the cost of living will tend more and more to equal the earning power of men, leaving no margin for saving and making the standard of living ever lower and lower. This is the issue which humanity has at stake in the present crusade against high prices. Could there be a greater?

Two Kinds of Wealth.

To hate wealth is as unreasonable as to hate life, but there are ways of living that deserve to be hated, as there are forms of wealth that are despicable. Mankind needs to be rich, to be surrounded by beautiful things, to have capital wherewith to found industries, furnish employment, keep the industrial and commercial life active and healthful, an inspiration to enterprise and a stimulation to thrift. Perhaps most of the wealth in the world is of this character. With it humanity has no quarrel. The need is to have more of it more widely distributed. Its purpose is service and that wealth which seeks service is humanity's friend.

But there is another kind of wealth. Its purpose is not to serve, but to exploit. It is used to take from other people that which belongs to them by the exercise of superior power. That kind of wealth we hate. It is a public enemy and if it cannot be controlled it were better to have it destroyed, for it is destroying the foundations of human society.

The money invested in the meat packing establishments, whereby every part of the creature was utilized, quickly gathered from off the ranges and speedily sold over the counters of the whole country, was splendidly serviceable until it began to fix the prices for the growers of live stock, without regard to real value, and to extort from the consumer the last cent he could pay for his meat short of going without. When wealth did this it became a robber and deserved the fate of the robber caught in the act.

There is nothing more useful than a railroad, so long as it confines itself to the business of fetching and carrying with reasonable care and expedition at reasonable rates. Capital invested in such service deserves to be protected by law and to be respected by the people; but when railroading becomes only an incident to stock gambling and the usurpation of free government, the debauching of the bench and the prostitution of legislation, it deserves the function of the public executioner.

The black, sticky, stinking oil that is found deep in the earth is of little value in its natural state. What service more splendid than taking this stuff and resolving it into its constituent parts, making each one useful, and then distributing all of them all over the earth? If the Standard Oil men had stopped there they would have been looked upon as among the most valuable of public servants, but they did not. They went on to multo one community that they might destroy competition in another, to violate every law that stood across their path, to crush those whom they could not control. Not all the good these men can ever do with their millions can compensate for the evil they did in getting them.

No, we must not hate wealth nor wealthy men. The world has need of them. We must hate only the robber, the extortioner, the corrupter of men, the debauchers of courts and legislatures, the subsidizers of the press, the bribers, grafters, gamblers who use wealth for their fell purposes, use money instead of rifles, dollars instead of bludgeons, capital instead of a mercenary soldiery. It is only when the servant becomes a robber that we must apprehend him and punish him. We do ourselves and all mankind a wrong when we fail to discriminate between these two main kinds of wealth, the kind whose essential purpose it is to serve and that kind whose purpose it is to exploit. The one we should honor and cherish. The other we should reform or destroy.

Taking the Platform Seriously.

The President has taken the platform of the convention that nominated him in earnest and appears to have made it the chart by which he is to sail the ship of state during his term of office. What a surprise that must be to the gentlemen who made that platform! They intended it for that campaign only.

The President's view of a proper chart to follow during his administration is not the highest or broadest view that might be taken, but it is higher and broader than the politician's view. A better view would be to shape the presidential policy by the nation's needs whether expressed in the Republican national platform or not, but to know that the President accepts the platform upon which he made his campaign in sincerity is reassuring. To be sincere is almost to be great, for few public men are great enough to be sincere.

It appears, too, that the President is going to try to hold the "regulars" in congress responsible for redeeming the pledges made in the party platform. He is reported to have read the riot act in this matter, Aldrich being away, to Penrose, Carter and Crane. These men are representatives of Big Business and Big Business stands on no platform. So far as argument is concerned the President has them. So far as effective legislation is concerned they will have him. Nothing making for the general public good will be extorted from them without swinging the big stick and if the big stick was to be swung at all it should have been when the tariff bill was before congress.

The sincerity of the President is not to be questioned, but his sagacity is. He appears to have early reached the conclusion that if he was to secure legislation for carrying out the Roosevelt policies he must make his appeal to the enemies of those policies for the reason that they and they alone had the power to enact legislation. If he came to this conclusion he will be a disappointed man. Platforms or no platforms, he will get nothing from Big Business or its agents that Big Business does not want. He will get nothing worth while from them without a fight and he cannot win his fight without the support of the American people, and he has not felt it worth while to ask the American people to help him make a fight.

He may get the postal savings bank system, which is relatively unimportant. His optional federal incorporation bill may come through, inasmuch as Big Business has come to hold all laws as optional in their obligation. The fate of the transportation court is not so sure. His conservation measures are scarcely to be hoped for and we may doubt the imparting of any real additional strength to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

There is just one way of getting affirmative, remedial legislation through congress and that is to whip the "interests" out of the senate through a reconstruction of the senate and the sooner that issue is made The Issue the better for the President and the nation he so sincerely desires to serve.

Look Out For Senate and Assembly.

How to secure the nomination of a superior class of men for members of the State Senate and Assembly—that, next to the election of the right kind of governor—is the "to be or not to be" with reform in California, for without improvement in the calibre and character of our legislative representatives nothing will be gained by a change of names. That was well illustrated by the failure in the last session of several assemblymen who were nominally chosen as candidates of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, though they were the same kind of material as the machine has always given us. This is the costliest mistake which reform can make, and especial care ought to be taken to avoid it this year.

There is some danger that, under the direct primary, it may be even easier than it formerly was to put up unfit representatives, and nothing save a stern determination not to allow such a thing to happen can prevent such a misfortune. An easy acquiescence in the candidacy of any young man who wants to go to the assembly as a matter of personal gain has been the most frequent cause of the trouble, and since the direct primary makes self-nomination perfectly practicable it is likely to happen oftener than before unless there is some kind of concerted effort to elevate the standard of qualifications for legislative office.

Not many men of calibre and character will volunteer as candidates for senate and assembly; they must be looked for and brought out by their neighbors; the right kind will be reluctant to serve, but they will consent if it is set before them as a duty they owe to the community. This sort of selective process ought to be going on all over the state of California now, and it should be kept up until the primary and the general election have insured the choice of a class of men who will give to the people such representation in the legislature as they have not had for a great many years.

The Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, having gained some knowledge through the sad experience of having some of its legislators "fall down" promptly upon taking their seats, has appointed a committee to look after legislative nominees and that committee will soon be at work. It will need all the help it can get and good men everywhere should be looking for good men everywhere fit to be sent to the legislature. It is no place to send a timid, immature or money-hungry man.

Who Are the Disrupters?

The San Francisco Chronicle fears that the unpleasantness between the insurgents and the regulars in congress might hinder legislation against the trusts and possibly disrupt the Republican party. Later the Examiner began to sing the same tune, albeit pitched in a different key. Aldrich and Cannon have said something to the same effect. It cannot be doubted, of course, that the Chronicle and the Examiner, Aldrich and Cannon, are all deeply and affiliatedly concerned for such legislation as will fetch Big Business under control of just laws efficiently executed! That goes without saying. Then why should those terrible insurgents be so stubborn about "taking program" from Aldrich and Cannon, the Chronicle and the Examiner?

But who are the disrupters? Why is it always those who are fighting for Right Things and never those who have entered the service of Satan at so much per line? Why, in California, are the Lincoln-Roosevelters the disrupters of the party and not the men who serve the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company? Why, for instance, did the President—in all frankness and sincerity—decline to use his influence to obtain a reformation of the rules of the house through the expressed fear that to join issue might disrupt the party? It seems never to have occurred to him that his refusal to join that issue might disrupt his party and yet nothing that has happened in a decade has come nearer to disrupting the Republican party than the refusal of the President to exert his executive influence for the reformation of the rules of the house in the interests of free government.

Was Speaker Joe Cannon, or was he not, a disrupter of his party when he made a bargain with Tammany democrats whereby his power as autocrat of the house was extended for two years? And was Nelson A. Aldrich, or was he not, a disrupter of his party when he bargained with enough Democratic senators, at the cost of protecting their especial iniquities, to put the robber tariff through? Are those who fight for Right Things the only disrupters of political parties, or are there others?

Direct or Simple?

Faith in government by the people is not dead yet, in spite of the frequent and visible failure of governments ostensibly by the people. We are beginning to discover that the main trouble is not the failure of popular government, but the failure to get popular government. The people vote, but do not rule.

Among those who would cure the ills of democracy by more democracy, the two favorite devices are "direct legislation" and the "short ballot." One is an effort to make popular government more direct; the other is an effort to make it more simple.

Directness and simplicity are, of course, both virtues, where both can be obtained. But the larger the political unit, the less simple the referendum is, and the more rarely it can be used. In a village it may be used every week, on every measure. In a city it may be used as often as the people will stand the strain of a city election. In a state it can only be used for large and simple issues, and for only a few of these, scattered far enough apart to make it possible to sustain interest in a campaign of education. In the nation at large, the referendum could scarcely be invoked twice in a generation. If we had a "parliament of the world," a plebiscite establishing that parliament, and a referendum once a century, fixing its constitution, would be the limit. So, the bigger the unit, the more rarely the "direct method" can be used, and the fewer the evils it will cure. Also, the further it gets from combining simplicity with its directness.

But on the contrary the bigger the unit the more applicable the "simple method" is, and the more effective. Elect few officials, and these the responsible ones, and elect them under circumstances that will fix their responsibility. England practically does this already by electing no national officials but members of parliament, and electing these on an issue, when the issue arises. That makes the election itself practically a general referendum and is quite as "direct" as our proposal to vote on certain issues separately, when they occur, while continuing to let the calendar fix our time of holding the election of the persons who must vote for us on all other issues. We are proposing to get directness at the expense of making more complex a system which is already too complex. The "short ballot," added to a system which would let issues make elections, instead of having the elections make issues, would give us both simplicity and directness.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

A pessimist is one who is always sure that he is going to miss the next car, but doesn't often. That attitude get to be a habit of the mind. Mind is a creature of habit. It will wear grooves a foot deep if its owner will let it. Know the time card and keep the watch right, and one can afford to be an optimist because he will know whether he is going to miss his car or not.

These habits of mind need to be watched. They are as easily formed as habits of the appetite or habits of the body. This is being written on a writing machine whose keyboard the writer's fingers know, but his mind does not know it. Take him away from the machine and require him to testify to the position on the keyboard of each of the letters and characters, and he would break down under cross examination, yet he has fingered that keyboard for twenty years. His fingers know, if they do not always do as well as they know.

When one's fingers learn to manipulate a set of keys swiftly and accurately, as on a piano or writing machine, we call that skill. Skill is habit wisely and perfectly formed, but we seldom think of the mind becoming skilled in the same way, and yet it is quite possible. The untrained mind is the unskilled mind, and to have a head full of vagrant whims and fancies, doubts and fears, impulses and misgivings, is to make of the cranium an attic or lumber room full of cast-off trumpery, almost too valuable to put into the furnace, and yet scarcely worth storage. We all of us do this more or less and so we are all of us more or less distempered, but we should look to it that our malady does not get the better of us.

Somewhere inside of us there is a something that is as far above and beyond the mind as the mind is above and beyond the hand. Under the microscope one brain is as like another as one pea is to another pea, and yet how different the personalities of every two there are in the world! That something in back there somewhere is the responsible party, and it can not divest itself of responsibility.

To be habitually pessimistic is wrong. It is a sin. It implies a lack of faith in God and his ability to carry out his purposes. But it may be just as wrong, just as much of a sin, to be habitually optimistic, although it may be rather more comfortable, on the whole, to others. There is a deal of optimism that comes of intellectual shiftlessness and lack of personal responsibility. The whole obligation, our own including his, is trustingly thrown upon God with a careless, "Oh! it will come out all right," that is neither more nor less than flunking.

The correct habit of the mind in this particular, and the mind will form its habit in spite of us if we do not watch out, is to look the facts squarely in the face, face the disagreeable as well as the agreeable and then remember that God's responsibility does not begin until ours ends. Stick a peg right there so that it will stay.

Were it not for one fact we should all of us, or so many of us as are not wholly irresponsible, be pessimistic as to the future of the race. Evolution never made of an animal anything but an animal. If it evolved man it was man the animal, and not man the son of God the Father. Before he became that there had to be breathed into his nostrils the breath of a living soul, that something that is somewhere back inside of us that is greater than the mind. This living soul comes to us in the form of the Christ idea in the world, which has been here since "before Abraham was." We have a right to be optimistic just in the measure that we have faith in the ultimate triumph of that idea in the world, and no farther. It is humanity's only hope for justice, equality, fraternity. Economics and evolution can not attain unto these things without its puissant aid.

WHAT REPUBLICAN CALIFORNIA THINKS OF TAFT

The interior press of California may be assumed to reflect fairly the popular sentiment of the state on matters of public importance. California is a Republican state, and most of the papers quoted below are Republican papers. These papers are, furthermore, scattered throughout California. They show a surprising unanimity of opinion regarding Mr. Taft, Mr. Ballinger, and Mr. Pinchot.

Imperial County Standard. (Rep.)

Not only has this president, who went into office as an alleged follower of Roosevelt, forgotten all the lessons Roosevelt taught, but he has allied himself so definitely with the factors which stand for anti-Rooseveltism that any possible usefulness to the country is at an end.

This is not a local view of the situation, but throughout the country there is a realization that the president is a disappointment, and his renomination has become an impossibility.

Stockton Record. (Rep.)

Ballinger—no matter how many times he is whitewashed, and regardless of the interpretation placed on his official acts by the congressional investigation—will still be distrusted by the people. Pinchot, on the other hand—no matter how much he may be condemned in administration circles—will still stand in the estimation of the people as the champion of conservation and the upholder of the Roosevelt policies.

Berkeley Independent. (Rep.)

There is no doubt but Taft is right about a conspiracy that has "cropped out in many widely separated localities." It is not an organized conspiracy, but a conspiracy of patriotic public sentiment, and it does mean "trouble" for public thieves and their backing in and out of office. The patriots of this nation do not propose to sit quiet while being ruled by private interests and robbed by corporations. It is a conspiracy against the greed that would put manacles on generations to come.

San Francisco Call. (Rep.)

The ousting of Pinchot for the preservation of executive dignity goes in no way to the merits of the charges against Ballinger. The public is not satisfied with the technical defenses for Ballinger woven by Wickersham. It was taught by Roosevelt to believe that irreproachable honesty in the public service was paramount to any consideration of official dignity.

Santa Barbara Independent. (Ind.)

This is the Taft policy: An employee of the government, even though he may know that a robbery is being committed, must close his eyes and hold his tongue.

Not faith to his oath of loyalty to the people of the country, but support of his chief in all things, is demanded of the man who hopes to continue in public service.

Chico Enterprise. (Rep.)

The decent thing now for Ballinger to do is to resign. His face has been saved beyond his deserts by the dismissal of Pinchot.

Fresno Republican. (Rep.)

But Pinchot knows the American people better than President Taft does, or than most of congress does. The people will look, not to the immediate occasion of his leaving the public service, but to the circumstances that led up to it.

Humboldt Times. (Rep.)

Mr. Taft has been president for ten months; but peace cometh not. At the present time, due to a series of most unhappy events culminating on Friday with the dismissal from the public service of Chief Forester Gifford Pinchot—a man in whom the country has great confidence and for whose splendid achievements it has entertained the liveliest admiration—the Taft administration is admittedly embarrassed and the Republican party is confronted by a situation more serious than any that has arisen for many years.

Marysville Appeal. (Rep.)

Will the Republican party survive the Taft administration? Perhaps it will if he throws overboard such Jonahs as Ballinger, Cannon and Aldrich.

San Francisco Bulletin. (Rep.)

Whether Secretary Ballinger overstepped the law or kept a few inches on the safe side of the line is still a matter of controversy, but there can be no doubt that the nation is weary of that scrupulous "law-honesty" which never fails to result in the strengthening of the forces of special privilege and the injury of the people. If President Taft had not been so quick to give Secretary Ballinger the benefit of the doubt Agent Glavis of the interior department would have been retained in office pending a congressional investigation of his charges, the presidential dignity would not have been "riled" and the country would not now be regretting what former Secretary of the Interior James R. Garfield calls "one of the greatest losses the national government has sustained in recent years."

Oakland Enquirer. (Rep.)

It will be difficult for the President long to retain the confidence of the people of the country under these conditions, even though both he and Ballinger give us messages to congress that out-Roosevelt Roosevelt in verbal conservation fervor. This, too, is unfortunate, very unfortunate, for the country and the President.

Oxnard Courier. (Rep.)

Mr. Pinchot stands for a principle of vast and vital importance. His separation from the service of the government does not impair in the slightest degree the strength of that principle. It must prevail in the end if this is to be a government for the people, administered primarily to promote the general welfare.

Pasadena News. (Rep.)

If the interior department under President Taft and Ballinger had been what it was under Roosevelt and Garfield, Pinchot might have continued his fight for the people and been acceptable to the administration.

Grass Valley Union. (Dem.)

The dismissal of Pinchot taken in connection with the proved attempt of the president to use official patronage of his office to whip into line the insurgents have placed him where he has evidently been secretly during his political career—on the side of the special interests. It means with those of the people who give any thought to governmental affairs that Taft has discredited himself; that he has shown that he has been attempting deception of the people while really working in the interests of those special interests. As a political leader Taft has lost all the prestige with which the friendship and support of Roosevelt invested him.

Rivera News.

When Pinchot first made his charges and substantiated them with some pretty good evidence, Ballinger crawled into his shell and has been there ever since, and the fact that Taft has protected him has not added anything to the reputation of that now famous smile.

Sacramento Bee. (Ind.)

The great west has been stirred to anger and indignation by the course of events. The ranks of the "insurgents" are swelling mightily as the conviction grows that the interior department under Ballinger is being used to further the schemes of land grabbers and monopolists.

Santa Rosa Republican. (Rep.)

The split in the Republican party grows wider day by day. Coercion or attempted coercion is not likely to aid in bringing the contesting elements together. The people are behind the senators and representatives who are against Cannon and Aldrich, and the quicker President Taft awakes to this fact, the better will it be for him and his party.

San Diego Sun. (Ind.)

The big facts are that President Taft has chosen to ally himself with such reactionaries as Ballinger, the representative of the old Plattism, and to carry himself against Pinchot, the representative of Rooseveltism.

Santa Cruz Surf. (Rep.)

Ballinger, at present secretary of the interior, is the agent, or tool, if you wish an uglier word, of the private ownership interests. He has persuaded the President that these properties can be acquired by these private interests legally, and that as long as robbery is legal, it cannot be called stealing. Hence Taft stands with Ballinger and has "fired" Pinchot.

San Jose Mercury. (Rep.)

If President Roosevelt were in the White House, strict disciplinarian that he was, it is more than probable that Pinchot's little breach would have been passed over. That, however, would not have justified it, nor is Mr. Roosevelt Mr. Taft. The latter does things one way. Mr. Roosevelt another, and while neither is perfect, the people love Roosevelt because he dealt with general principles rather than with what he considered inconsequential in carrying out his policies. For this reason he was popular with the masses. For the reason that President Taft is apparently more exacting in matters of lesser moment, he is not a popular favorite.

Sacramento Star. (Ind.)

Taft has chosen between the enemies and friends of the Roosevelt policies. And chosen wrongly.

South Pasadena Record.

Gifford Pinchot may possibly be out of harmony with the administration at Washington, but it is quite certain he is entirely in harmony with that large element of the population of this country that is inclined to support the policies of former President Roosevelt.

Santa Ana Bulletin.

Dismissal of Gifford Pinchot from the position of chief forester is a disgrace to the administration and an affront to the American nation.

San Bernardino Index. (Rep.)

Gifford Pinchot is not only devoted to the policy of the conservation of natural resources for the benefit of the people, but has the rare gift of expressing his views in a striking and convincing way.

Santa Barbara News. (Ind.-Rep.)

It will be found that Mr. Taft made a great and very grave mistake in writing his angry letter dismissing the Chief Forester.

Ventura Free Press. (Rep.)

Many people will regret that the President has taken the side he has in the controversy, and all will hope sincerely that he will see the matter differently as time passes and that he will fall entirely into the Roosevelt way of thinking—that it is country before anything else.

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES.

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHELF.

"In Memoriam."

To name "In Memoriam" is enough to call back to most readers' minds a flood of recollections of the emotions that arose when this august hymn of the Christian soul appeared on the horizon of English song. For the poem is as much the song of the spiritual conflict of the nineteenth century as it is the poet's threnody upon the untimely death of his beloved friend. The pitiless logical conclusion of the Darwinian theory was being carried to its final goal of despair, and faith in anything was being vanquished by it, when Tennyson's music rose with its solemn chant and helped to stay the rout. He chose, we may think by design, verse of an organ's tone, to recall by its suggestion the house of worship which is "by faith, and faith alone."

The tide has now turned, and men's hearts again seek a mystery, after the materialists have cleared the air of old illusions, so that the poem, though it does not speak with the moment's answer to an instant need, as at first, is yet in tune with the spirit of the time.

But even when times are wholly changed, the spirit of man is not; and much of the poem's thought appeals to hopes that are eternal and answers to a cry as old as earth. The "infant crying in the night," the "infant crying for the light, and with no language but a cry," was Buddha, was Socrates, was Omar, was and is every man whose spirit lifts up its hands to pierce the veil of human fate. And Tennyson's music and passion are of all times and races and beliefs, sweet as the tones of the evening bell that sounds before the dark.

THE APPOINTED HOUR.

Your true lover of books feels toward them as he does toward men and women—some are his enemies and some his friends. He can no more endure the presence of the one than he can endure the absence of the other; so we may be sure the booklover has no volumes on his shelves save those that answer to some inward attraction.

But even toward these he has varying moods of kindness. Not all friends supply the moment's want at any time. As he looks at his shelves he feels the affection of a brother for all the variously bound and lettered volumes before him. But his eye roves anxiously from back to back, searching for one especial friend whose spirit meets the hunger of his present appetite. To-day that one may be Shakespeare, and only one of the comedies, of these, will do. To-morrow it may be the eerie delights of Poe's tales. Another day a book of jests and whims is the sole dish to satiate him.

This dissolving variety of taste has another side. Books have ages, as people have. The schoolboy's earliest love is apt as not to be his teacher, old enough to be his mother. So his earliest love in books may hap to be "Les Misérables," which he admires with the same dazzled adoration and with the same lack of comprehension as that with which he adores the incomprehensible feminine charms and the infinite variety of his unconscious teacher.

And as the bachelor of forty often turns fondly doting eyes upon the fifteen-year-old daughter of a boyhood friend, so the lover of books at forty often finds a flood of joyous appreciation in reading "Alice in Wonderland" or "Huck Finn" for the first time.

These thoughts are brought to mind by a recent experience with "The Shaving of Shagpat." A gifted friend presented it five Christmases ago in a moment of proselyting zeal for the Meredithian cause, and we manfully assailed the first chapter, mastered it as a mountaineer achieves the Matterhorn, and descended swiftly and joyously into chapter two, being the wondrous tale of "Bhanavar the Beautiful." This chapter left us drunk with enjoyment, waterlogged with sensuous beauty, captive in Lotos Land. We felt no zeal to follow further the starving varlet of a Shagpat after having felt the spell of Bhanavar. So there we rested, for five years and more. Then, the other day, we idly plucked Shagpat from the shelves, began at chapter three, and found absorption to the end of the book.

It was simply that the appointed hour had come. Like two spirits preordained to meet and mingle, though rebuffed at first introduction, we had revolved within our several orbits through the years until the ordained hour, when we must fly together by inevitable attraction.

It is so with many books. Only we would note that such attractions cannot be forced. If the book offend thee, put it from thee; the hour is not yet come. If you attack it, you may conquer it, but never make it friend. Leave it, and it will come again, in brighter light and with a virgin smile, and you will enjoy it forever, if it be one that was predestined for you.

Eden Phillpotts, whose new book, "The Haven," has just been issued, has refused to grant permission to magazines and the newspapers generally to reproduce his portrait. In response to several urgent requests, he has begged his publishers not to give out any photographs for reproduction. He feels that he has already given to the public the best that he has to offer in his work.

"Farming It," the new book by Judge Henry A. Shute, will startle many readers from its audacious frankness in the use of real names of its characters.

A GREAT BOOK ON ART.

The completion of a monumental art work is in sight, says the New York Sun. We refer to "Noteworthy Paintings in American Private Collections," edited by John La Farge and August F. Jaccaci. It is to consist of fifteen volumes of about 500 pages each, sumptuously illustrated, printed and bound, the letter press furnished by world famous critical authorities, the edition limited to 126 copies, to be subscribed for. The price is moderate, $15,000, or $1,000 a volume. A hundred private art collections in the United States are treated, and in a preliminary booklet, entitled "Concerning Noteworthy Paintings in American Private Collections," Mr. Jaccaci sets forth the aims of the publication and has pertinent things to say on the subject of popular misconceptions both at home and abroad in regard to great pictures in America. When this work appears in its entirety—the first volume is quite ready—the world will be surprised at the richness of our private galleries, at the genuine masterpieces they contain. The time has passed when the American collector was gazed as a good thing in Europe. He is now a positive menace, not alone on account of his wealth but because he knows good art and is not satisfied until he secures it. We congratulate Messrs. La Farge and Jaccaci on the passing of the first milestone in so adventurous an artistic enterprise.

WHISTLER ROUTED.

This new anecdote of Whistler is printed by the the New York Sun:

After the lawsuit over Lady Eden's portrait Whistler was in a bitter humor for a long time. Particularly bitter was he with George Moore, novelist and art critic. He damned all art critics to the nethermost boiling pitch. He called Moore names that were not fit to print. The two men gave each other a wide berth. But if you stay long enough in Paris, as some philosopher has noted, you will meet all your friends and enemies. The art world is a still narrower milieu. One Sunday afternoon at the atelier of a mutual friend Whistler and Moore almost collided in the hallway. George got in before James. Their hostess heard peculiar sounds outside, something between the breaking of china and the stamping of hoofs. It was only James in one of his naughty rages.

"Dear me!" said the lady. "What is wrong, dear master?"

"Whistler won't come in! Whistler won't stay under the same roof with that wild Irishman!" The poor lady was embarrassed by the tantrums of the artist and started toward him to abate his transports. Said Mr. Moore in his modulated voice:

"Why drag in Whistler?" Thereat the screams of Whistler were too terrible to endure. Not only insulted, but his best mot "Why drag in Velasquez?" actually parodied, his own witticism turned on him like a hose stream by his foe, he fled. Mr. Moore remained and was warmly congratulated by the company. Who says George Moore has no sense of humor?

J. M. Barrie's health is giving his friends serious concern. He was never a robust man, but latterly he has been looking sadly worn and aged. Since his divorce suit Mr. Barrie has been seen about London much less than formerly, and the acquaintances who happen to meet him are shocked by the change. Barrie's only solace nowadays is found in the company of children, of whom he was always very fond.

One of the interesting features of the present political contest in England is the way literary men have laid down their pens and taken up public speaking. Maurice Hewlett has held forth for the Liberals. Sir Gilbert Parker is speaking for the Conservatives. Silas Hocking has put aside stories of adventure and is deep in contesting a constituency: Quiller-Couch, better known as "Q," is in the midst of the fray. Marie Corelli has indulged in a characteristic jeremiad over empire.

Californian Poets' Corner

BACK, BACK TO NATURE.

By Herman Scheffhauer.

Some of the strongest verse produced in California in recent years has been the work of Herman Scheffhauer, a young man from whom much may be expected in future. The following, which was printed in one of his earlier volumes, gives an idea of his style:

Weary! I am weary of the madness of the town,

Deathly weary of all women and all wine,
Back, back to Nature!—I will go and lay me down,

Bleeding lay me down before her shrine.

For the mother-breast the hungry babe must call,

Loudly to the shore cries the surf upon the sea;—

Hear, Nature wide and deep! after man's mad festival

How bitterly my soul cries out for thee!

Once again would I embrace ye, Titan trees,
Once again these thirsting lips would kiss your sod,

Wet with tears so deeply-drawn, leaping tears that freedom frees,—

The sacrificial flowers heart-blooming up to God.

Hidden in the grasses of the darkest vales I'll lie,

Silently the happiness of Earth my heart shall fill;

Blue eyes, are ye kindred to the blue, eternal sky

That looms above yon Earth-contemning hill?

Though the child be blinded by the world-dust, he shall know

His mother—well that mother knows her child!

Him impulse star-compelling bids with panting breath to go

To thee, great heart of Nature undefiled.

In the heart that holds the stars harmonious, O Soul

Go bathe—where worlds on lustre-worlds in awful orbits blaze.

Until the spirit's compass encompasses the Whole

Of God and of God the wondrous ways.

SAN FRANCISCO'S ART INSTITUTE

The Mark Hopkins Institute of Art, on Nob Hill, was one of the conspicuous landmarks of San Francisco before the fire, and one of the city's chief objects of pride. The commanding site and the magnificent Hopkins mansion had been deeded in trust to the board of regents of the University of California by Mr. Edward F. Searles, of Methuen, Massachusetts, for the use of the San Francisco Art Association. The Institute and School of Design were moved into these quarters on March 4, 1893. Here the accessions of works of art and art literature were rapidly increased, until hundreds of valuable paintings hung in the galleries and a large and valuable collection of books weighted the shelves.

The fire of 1906 completely destroyed the building. A few of the most valuable paintings were hastily cut from their frames and saved, and a few books were rescued, but the most of the collections of thirty-five years were lost forever. One curious fact, however, is noteworthy: One of the most val-also disorganized and scattered. Many of the students never returned. In the necessity for immediate rehabilitation of the city, the esthetic side had to be temporarily neglected.

But in a surprisingly short time funds were acquired to put up the present spacious, though unpretentious, building on the old site.

Gradually classes were gathered together, until to-day 193 students are enrolled under six instructors. These classes are instructed in elementary drawing, drawing from life, painting in oil and water color, portraiture, modeling, illustration, decorative design, composition, anatomy, and perspective. There are, besides, classes in the history of art, and classes for students who wish to become instructors. The classes are arranged to suit students who can attend all the time, for those who can devote only their evenings, and for those who have only their Saturdays free.

New collections of works of art have also been founded through the generosity of such uable books in the library was a set of Audubon's "Birds of America," in four volumes, printed from the original plates, being one of the fifty or sixty complete sets in existence. The set was valued at about $2,000. After the fire, one volume of the four was taken to the University at Berkeley amongst other salvage. The other three volumes were despaired of, but they, also, turned up, about thirteen months later, and were restored to the art association.

The art classes, which numbered several hundred students at the time of the fire, were friends as Mr. Searles, Miss Sarah M. Spooner, James D. Phelan, Mrs. Phoebe A. Hearst, Mrs. Benjamin P. Avery, and many others, who have donated oil paintings, water colors and statuary, being in all about one hundred examples of the various arts. One notable recent accession is a large oil painting, "Wallenstein on His Way to the Castle at Eger," by Karl von Piloty, a fine example of this celebrated German painter's work, presented by Mrs. David Bixler in memory of her late husband.

Little Tommy's Views.

Sister Susie's tryin' for
A elocution prize.
She waves her arms and stamps her feet
An' also rolls her eyes,
An' pa an' ma they both allow
She's certain to succeed.
I guess she is, but, anyhow,
I wish that she could read.
My brother William's new degree
Is Bachelor of Lit.,
An' pa an' ma are proud of him
An' certain that he's It;
An' sometimes William writes to me
When he has news to tell—
I wonder why some Bachelors
Ain't reely taught to spell.
My ma she is a suffragette.
She says that Woman craves
A chance to vote, so she will be
No longer 'mongst the slaves;
But pa he sets around an' reads
A paper or a book,
An' when he eats he mutters, "Gosh!
I wish these slaves could cook."
An' so you'll see our family
Is of the learned kind.
We may be short on common things,
But we are long on Mind.
We're full of learnin' as can be
That's warranted the best,
But sometimes 'most it sems to me
It doesn't quite digest.

King Edward and His Pants.

Proclaim it to the world! Announce it to the nations! Megaphone it to the peoples! King Edward has decided no more to wear knee-breeches at evening receptions, but, instead, to drape his aging legs in the coy modesty of trousers; and Society of the truly tutti-frutti kind naturally is startled—not shocked, for nothing shocks Society of the tutti-frutti variety, but startled. As a matter of fact the king recently appeared with draped legs at a dinner given by Lady Paget, having first notified other gentlemen in attendance to continue their trousers a foot or two in a southerly direction, presumably so that their legs would not be disgraced by catching cold when the royal legs did not.

So the fiat has gone forth, Society legs must come in out of the climate, and knee-breeches may be given to the poor, by whom they can be used as shopping-bags or something of that sort. The blow has fallen, and yet it is not wholly a blow. Thin men will welcome it, fat men will give it smiling greeting, and only those whose underpinning neither reminds of the coy beanpole nor of the bibulous beer-barrel will deeply regret the royal command.

But oh, my brethren and sisters, did ever you reflect what a lot of glittering donkeys there are in this world? To think that there are men, or those shaped like men, who will wear knee-breeches or trousers, something, anything or an approximate nothing, solely because they are so ordered by a man who is without distinction save that he is the son of his pa and ma—let nobody tell me that 1776 was not ripe for a republic, if for no other reason than that men might gradually learn to respect their individual selves and cease to be as sheep following an accidental leader.

The Opinions of Rufus.

Gener'ly speakin', I dispise cussin', but there are deeds an' occasions when a man that can't say damn must feel awfully handicapped.

Lyn's shameful, too, but when a lie's told to help a human brother or sister in distress—an' I've heerd such—I shouldn't wonder if it's entered on the credit side of the big book upstairs.

You can't judge a man's character by the kind of an automobile he rides in.

There are plenty of cases where it's better to have loved an' lost than it is to be the feller that loves an' gits her.

Lots of times the diff'rence 'tween an optimist an' a pessimist is just the diff'rence 'tween the real estate agent an' the feller that buys the property.

It's a mighty good reformer that's es willin' to begin on himself es on his neighbors.

I don't dispute any man's claim that he's follerin' the Lord, but I've heerd 'em claim it when it seemed to me they wus so fer behind that they'd never ketch up.

Young Ezry Dobbs says he knows a lot of girls that look so good he knows it can't be so.

They's no man so wise that a few questions from his five-year-old can't make him reelize how little he knows.

All the logic some men have is summed up in the three words, "I'll bet you."

Use some judgment in givin' advice, Lycurgus. It's no use to tell a man to keep smilin' when he has the toothache.

I understand that Secretary Ballinger is goin' to engage in the interestin' feat of demonstratin' that there can be a hull lot of smoke without any fire.

Mixed Fable of the Peace-Loving Boys.

A certain small boy who had carefully read the history of the world's most enlightened nations, and consequently knew the sagacious thing to do, appeared in the schoolroom one morning clad in armor of mail from head to feet; moreover he wore a revolver strapped to either side of him, and a belt of cartridges about his waist, and a hunting knife was fastened therein, and over his shoulder was a repeating-rifle of the latest approved murderous pattern, and he certainly was a walking armory.

"Wh-why," the teacher gasped in his astonishment, "are you thirsting for blood and out to kill this morning?"

"Not at all," the interesting youth replied. "I dote on peace, and I am prepared to maintain it if I have to whip every boy on the school ground in order to do so."

It is submitted that just at this point the teacher might have introduced a thrilling and rightful diversion by unsheathing the urchin and practicing on him with a lath, but he did not, and so it came to pass that the other boys said, "Well, he sure is the walking battery, and, as it is, he can do any of us up in one round. It it up to to us to get some boiler-plate, guns and knives and be prepared for round second." So they did as they said, and after a time that schoolroom in business hours looked like a jousting tournament in baronial days with modern improvements, and the pupils gradually attained the idea that the star-eyed Goddess of Peace was a twin sister of Mars under the influence of a fighting jag.

Moral 1—The boys have too much common sense to do such a thing; so.

Moral 2—Their fathers, who haven't too much common sense, do it in their stead, and the teacher (which is another name for the common people who pay the tremendous price of armament) lacks the judgment to disarm them and take them across his knee.

The Dance of Life.

Swing on the corner, and forward all—

Ho, but the dance is great!

Almande left and notice the call.

Then dance to the music of fate.

Oh, monarch and peasant, and noble and clod,

Join hands in the mimic strife,

And they all give heed to the Caller's nod,

For the dance is the Dance of Life.

The music, the music! It rings from where

The hidden musicians stand,

And it's sometimes a sob, and again a prayer,

Or a voice from an unseen strand.

Inward and outward they dance and play

Through moments with passion rife;

Then the caller nods, and they turn away

From the wonderful Dance of Life.

And, princeling or pauper, it matters not

After the dance is done,

When the dancers rest in an earth-strewn spot

Under a heedless sun.

The dancers go; yet ebbs and flows

The music, with ecstasy rife,

And only the deathless Caller knows

What meaneth this Dance of Life.

To Make Money, Save It.

The philosophical gentleman was right, son, when he announced that the way to make money is to save it. The benignant old chap was right, I say, but I have not been able to escape a regret that, while he was about it, he did not tell us how to save money in order to make it. It would have been a great relief had he done so, for there is the rub. Let us see if it is not.

According to the United States census, the average workman in this country—and he is the individual whom we must consider—receives somewhat less than $500 for a year's labor, or hardly more than $40 a month. He is, let us say, the head of a family of four. With the price of meat over our heads, with eggs and butter taking wings and flying away from us, with most foods so high in price that a megaphone is needed to call them down, with clothing generally more expensive than ever we knew it to be before, with rent always to be paid, with occasional doctor's bills, with life a dreary, monotonous wilderness of all work and no play—oh, why didn't the wise philosopher tell this workman how he is to save in order to make money, for you and I cannot tell him; the chances are fair that we could not live in accordance with our idea of comfort on twice what he receives.

It is all very well to tell this average toiler that he must save in order to make money, but what I am contending is that we have got him where he cannot save and live in a decently civilized manner; in fact, he cannot live very decently and not try to save. The philosophy of our glittering aphorism becomes a cold douche when it is applied to the existing situation, as we have created it. A Rockefeller can't help saving; with care, a man on a salary of a thousand or two thousand dollars a year may save, but when we tell a man, not improbably with a family on his hands, to save on a wage of forty dollars a month, we will do well to issue plans and specifications giving him an idea how it can be done by any other than the starvation route.

The Whistle Toots for Charlie.

He's on the list, he's on the list—

The suns may yet forget to rise.

The moons be lost in deathless mist,

And stars drop down from pallid skies;

But when these things have come to pass

We'll yet hear Charlie Curry's plea:

"I give the office-seeking gas,

And want the office—vote for me."

The whistle toots at Herrin's word,

The loud bell clamors, "Pap and pie!"

If you don't think that Curry heard,

Just watch him wink his other eye.

Oh, office, office, food and drink

For Charlie, likewise mash and oats;

When Gabriel blows his horn he'll think

The engine toots—and ask for votes.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

The Radium Bank Is the Latest.

Paris was the first of the world's cities to possess a radium bank; London followed, about a month ago, by establishing a similar bank, Berlin and Vienna are to have such institutions, and now negotiations for the establishment of one in New York city are in progress. As even a fairly well posted person may be pardoned for not knowing what a radium bank is, a brief description of its purposes will not be out of place here. A radium bank, then, is a bank that keeps on hand a supply of radium to be rented to medical practitioners who desire to use it. For this purpose it is proposed to keep on hand about 100 milligrammes—scarcely one-third of 1 per cent. of an ounce—which will be rented to physicians for $200 the first day and about $40 a day thereafter. This may seem like stiff interest on an almost inappreciable amount of the wonderful substance, but as forty milligrammes of it recently sold for $3,750, and as the bank must take considerable chances in letting the radium out of its direct keeping, it probably is not very, if at all, excessive. In this connection, it is of some interest to note that the high price of radium is due, not to lack of knowledge where it may be found, but to the extreme difficulty of extracting it after it has been found, a difficulty which ultimately may be remedied.

What German Thrift Accomplishes.

The area of Germany is not one-third greater than that of California, yet the amount of the European country's foreign trade is $400,000,000 in excess of that of the United States, and the balance of her trade with this nation is, in round numbers, $100,000,000 in her favor—this, it will be noted, in connection with a country which might be added to Uncle Sam's domain without much more than appreciably increasing the size of it. The distinction exists, not in superior soil or climate, but in that which is expressed in the one word, thrift. The German husbands and makes the most of his resources; we scatter and frequently waste ours. To illustrate: Germany utilizes the sewage of her great cities to fertilize the lands about them, receiving the reward in fruits of the soil; the sewage of our cities is wasted or worse than wasted in poisoning the waters of our rivers. Out of her carefully conserved forests Germany makes a profit of $60,000,000 annually; ours cost a million dollars in excess of the income from them. These are but illustrations of a very general distinction between German and American methods, and the moral of them is found in that balance of $400,000,000 in foreign trade in favor of the Kaiser's realm. Withal, such facts constitute an argument in favor of conservation of resources which grows more potent with each passing year.

The Wealth of New York City.

All of us are aware that in New York city we have quite an active, progressive, prosperous and wealthy little bailiwick, but, after all, it requires figures to make us entirely appreciate the real importance of "little old New York," and here are a limited number of such figures: The assessed valuation of real and personal property in that city is $7,875,000,000. We have not the least appreciation of what such a sum means, but a little comparison will make it clearer. The entire assessed valuation of property in the state of Massachusetts—including, of course, the great city of Boston—is about $5,000,000,000, that is, less than two-thirds that of the American metropolis. Again, the wealth of New York city is greater than that of all Spain, and is about equal to that of Portugal and the Netherlands combined. These are the comparisons that give an American at least an elementary idea of the tremendous wealth that is concentrated in the greatest of American cities, a wealth vaster than is localized on any equal part of the world's surface unless London or Paris be an exception.

Feeding School Children of the Poor.

In a public school on Mott street, New York, a system of feeding school children at noon which is a decided departure from the prevalent system is being tried, and apparently with much success. The school is in the congested district of the city, and most of the children are of Italian parentage. A large proportion of the parents work away from home, and cannot provide their children with lunch. To meet this condition, the school authorities now provide lunches for them, the prices running from three to five cents. The three-cent lunch consists of mararoni or spaghetti, bean or pea soup and three slices of bread, tomatoes and rice sometimes being substituted for the soup. The four-cent bill of fare is like the foregoing, with a baked apple or a cup of cocoa added, and the five-cent meal includes both of these luxuries. As a large proportion of the parents can spare at least three cents a day to a child, it is observed that children now lunch who rarely or never lunched before, and it is considered probable that the system will be extended to other schools in the congested quarter.

Aluminum Garments Now Are Manufactured.

The extreme cheapness and ductility of aluminum have led to its use in a rather unexpected manner, viz.: in the manufacture of clothing. In such garments threads of aluminum are used as the warp, and silk, of any desired color, as the woof of the fabric, although garments may be made of aluminum alone. Of the metal already are being made cloaks, theatrical costumes, hats, neckties, belts, shoes, and, in fact, there is no limit to the articles of apparel which may be manufactured. Textil-Woche, a German publication, described a woman who wore a close-fitting gown of this fabric as looking "as though dipped in silver;" which might, or might not, add to a woman's beauty, it all being a matter of taste. Net fabrics of aluminum and silk combined are said to be strikingly beautiful. Aluminum garments still are beyond the reach of the ordinary purse, but if they become popular and are extensively manufactured, of course they also will become cheaper; so milady, who would like to look as if she were dipped in silver, still may live in hope.

Those Who Come and Go.

America still is the recipient of the surplus population of the world's nations. During 1909 a total of 1,757,565 persons crossed the Atlantic between New York and Europe. Of this number, 1,269,291 came to this country, while but 488,274 departed from it. That is, the comers exceeded the goers by more than two and one-half to one, and it probably is safe to say that more of those who go than of those who come will return. A peculiarity of this ocean travel is that a greater number of people than ever before are journeying in the second cabin. This increase comes, not from the steerage, which holds its own, but from the first cabin, and it is asserted that it is due less to economy than to the fact that second-cabin service is so good as to make transportation therein about as easy and enjoyable as in the first cabin.

Curiosities of the London Directory.

The great names of history have fallen on troublous times, if one may judge by the part they play in the latest directory of London. For example, William Shakespeare is a barrister; he also is a tailor, and a van-builder. Robert Bruce and John Bunyan are green grocers. John Milton is a chandler, Sebastian Bach is a dealer in horses, James Boswell is a mason, Julius Caesar is a chemist, Livy keeps apartments, Homer is a lighterman, Pindar is an electrician, Mars is a saloonist, Venus sells candy, and Francis Bacon is an architect. Seems like a fall in historical prices, does it not?

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

The Kind of Men Wanted For Railroad Commission.

California has never had a fit railroad commission, probably for the reason that the nominations had to be made through conventions, which have been dominated by the railroads sought to be regulated by the commission. It is time we had one. One of the members should be a practical railroad man. The present chairman of the board, A. C. Irwin, is a practical railroad man and, according to his lights, he is an honest man; but he is so schooled in the railroad job that he cannot see why the railroads should not have about what they want. We doubt his ever having drawn a dollar from the railroad treasury for serving their interests on the commission, but they put him on the commission to serve them and he has served them faithfully. If the people had put him on the commission to serve them he might have served the people as faithfully. The last time Irwin had to fight for his own nomination. Mr. Herrin wanted to pass the job on to another, but Irwin won his fight and remained in the railroad camp just the same. He was never in any other camp and might not know how to behave if he were. How to secure a trained railroad man who will not prove a railroad tool is something of a problem, but it can be done. Often how a man behaves in office depends upon who puts him in office. Then there is need for a good lawyer on the board, a man who can get to the bottom of the legal aspects of the case so that the commission will not have to run to the Attorney General every time it turns the corner, a man who will know whether the Attorney General is perfectly frank with the commission or not. Finally there is wanted on the commission a business man to whom a column of figures is not a fifteen-sixteen puzzle. There is one kind of man that absolutely is not wanted on the railroad commission and that is the man who can see nothing except in its political aspect. He will spoil everything he touches. He will prove insincere and insincerity will destroy the power of the commission for good. The public does not believe in the sincerity of the present commission, as the public has not believed in the sincerity of previous commissions. Therefore the people have not troubled the commission with their troubles.

Some Democrats Talked Of For Railroad Commission

The Watchman has it on the faith of the present railroad commission that Joseph A. Call, of Los Angeles, and A. Caminetti, of Amador, will be candidates before the Democratic primaries for membership on the state railroad commission. That both of these men would be improvements on the present incumbents goes without saying. The Republicans may have to do a deal of hustling before they find a better man for a place on that commission than Joseph A. Call. Personally, The Watchman knows little of him, except that for years he has been a student of railroad legislation and litigation and would bring to the board a valuable fund of knowledge of the subject and an enthusiasm for making the commission of use. Mr. Caminetti is a not less valuable man to the state. In the state senate he is a power to be reckoned with, but he is a natural born Democratic politician. He never can forget, even for the sake of argument, that he is first of all a Democrat, and he never can see a chance to "turn a trick" for the Democratic party without leaping into the breach with the agility and fighting instinct of a spotted leopard. He can't help it. It is second nature to him, and, too, the quality of his Democracy is that of Jefferson and Jackson when men talked of the "sovereign states of this confederation." He is a good man, though, and his elimination from the state senate would be a misfortune to California. Long may he live to "pester" the "organization" in the state senate, not in the railroad commission. The state needs a few Democrats scattered around where they can do the most good and Caminetti's proper sphere is the state senate. As to Mr. Call, we move that Democratic nominations close.

Phil Stanton Is In the Running

Phil Stanton appears to be definitely in the race for the Republican nomination for governor. He has been up this way assuring his friends of the north that south of Tehachapi will be solid for him. There has been a fear lurking in the mind of The Watchman that this might prove to have more truth than poetry in it, that even among the progressive Republican element to the south local pride might overcome local scruples. How Phil Stanton behaves is largely dependent upon the kind of company he is in. If he were the reform candidate he would be a reformer, but as he has been with "organization" men he will be for the "organization," except that his tendency to be erratic rather than independent may cause him to fly off on a tangent and do some unexpected thing, good or bad. That element in his character needs always to be allowed for. If, as some seem to think, Gillett is staying in the field until such time as Mr. Herrin and his associates can develop someone to beat Curry, Phil Stanton might be settled on as the most likely man, in the expectation that while North-of-Tehachapi might easily be divided South-of-Tehachapi would plump for its local candidate. Phil Stanton has more integrity of character than Curry and more clarity of mind than Gillett, but would prove more of an uncertain quantity than either. Then, too, he failed to attend the opening of the Alaska-Yukon exposition (at state expense) until near the closing, a tardiness that will plague him mightily before the campaign ends if he makes the race.

The First the Worst And Should Be Beaten

The first man, so far as heard from, to take out nomination papers for election to the assembly is Grove L. Johnson of Sacramento. He represents the seventeenth assembly district in the legislature. The seventeenth assembly district comprises that part of the city of Sacramento lying north of the center of K street. It has been a sort of pocket borough for Mr. Johnson who has been able to secure an election from that district any time he wanted to go to the assembly, with the exception of during the Pardee administration. Governor Pardee was able to bring enough executive influence to bear upon the district to induce it to send a substitute for Johnson. Grove L. Johnson is the most unfortunate influence in the assembly. He knows the ropes of legislation as he knows his own back yard, and he possesses one of the acutest intellects in California. He has a sweet old face and a simulated candor that carries conviction to all who do not know him and often he beguiles those who know him best but he manages to fetch up on the wrong side of every important issue at the critical moment. He is "organization" through and through and if he is not made chairman of the judiciary committee, as he is likely to be as "patriarch" of the house, he is always a member of it by virtue of his profession and, whether chairman or member, he can be counted on as a power for evil in that very important committee. The seventeenth assembly district owes it to the state to keep that man out of the assembly, and there are good people enough in the district to do it if they will go at the job in earnest. There will be no reforming of criminal procedures with Grove L. Johnson on the judiciary committee of the assembly.

Walter D. Wagner Wants the Office

Walter D. Wagner, who holds the office of secretary of the state railroad commission, has added himself to the army of candidates for secretary of state, and will strive to obtain the Republican nomination. Like H. S. Morrow and Frank Mouser, two other seekers for the same position, Wagner comes from south of Tehachapi; when not engaged in holding a state office he resides in San Bernardino, and at home his ordinary avocation is that of being county auditor. It is said that he has excellent abilities of the clerical order, and that he has been a faithful servitor of the machine during all his years in politics is the report of those who know him. Whether Wagner has a tip from the machine that it will support him no one can say, but it is not improbable; in the old days of convention politics it was the custom of the machine to be liberal with such tips, for then there was a distinct advantage in having an abundance of candidates, and although politics has now become a different game, the habit of promising all things to all men is one which politicians find it not easy to break off. It appears inherently probable that the next secretary of state will come from south of Tehachapi, because there are so many other officers from the north, but the right candidate has not yet been named. It is time to be looking for him, and he should be a good big man, for it is a big office.

McCarthy's Party Means Mischief

P. H. McCarthy has undertaken to make his breeches-pocket Union Labor party of state size. He cannot make his kind of a political party of state significance, because the state at large has few of the kind of men that go to make up the McCarthy party. Outside of the group that he has herded together there are not many, in the ranks of labor or out of such ranks, that will change their party affiliations at the beck and nod of the party boss. McCarthy's men did this, in the San Francisco election, by the thousand. They registered as Republicans, knowing that they were not Republicans, that they might vote for the Republican "machine" candidate for nomination for mayor and, when they had nominated him (and so prevented the nomination of a really good and sincere man) they went back to their own camp, taking a lot of "organization" Republicans with them, and helped to elect McCarthy mayor. It was bruited about at the time that if this bit of chicanery proved successful in the city election it would be tried on the state, and the action taken at Monterey last week tends to confirm that report, but it is to be doubted if any considerable number of Union Labor men outside of McCarthy's own San Francisco herd can be induced to play any such miserable game. As a general rule those who register as Republicans will be Republicans to the end of the contest, and those who register as Union Labor Party men will stay on their own side of the party fence. They will be too honorable to do otherwise. In San Francisco, where there are some thousands who have lost the power to discern betwixt good and evil, a McCarthy party is possible. Outside that influence it will not thrive.

Unamerican and Undemocratic

There ought to be in congress and legislature representatives from the laboring interests. The Watchman would like to see men like John Mitchell and Samuel Gompers, like Walter Macarthur and perhaps Furuseth, in congress; but they should be there as American citizens. There should no more be a union labor party than a farmers' party, a bankers' party or a lawyers' party. A democracy founded upon class will be a Roman democracy, not an American. There is no more moral sanction for a government by wage earners than by coupon clippers, by labor leaders than by the managers of great corporations. What we want, and the only sort of democracy that there is any hope for, is government of, by and for all of us—the whole American people. We stand for manhood, not class suffrage. The McCarthy policy can have but one of two results, if it have any result at all worth mentioning. One of these might be to cause the members of other callings, like the retail merchants and small shopkeepers, the farmers and employers generally, politically to classify themselves, or else to solidify against union labor rule all classes and conditions of men except wage earners. In either case democracy would be at an end. From whatever point of view, the advent of the McCarthy party presages no good, but the most likely view point is that of being an accessory before the fact to a conspiracy in aid of the political bureau of the Southern Pacific company maintaining California as a political dependency.

Other Offices Besides The Governor's Office

The right kind of a head for a ticket is important to have, but it is as important to have the right kind of a ticket as a head of a ticket, and of this not all appear to be cognizant. For several months now Gillett and Curry, of the "organization" crowd, to say nothing of half a dozen eligibles in the Lincoln-Roosevelt camp, have had their gubernatorial good points looked over and discussed with critical interest. There have been a dozen or so of impossibles and one or two good men suggested for secretary of state, and, lately, a few weak or worse men have been suggested for members of the state board of equalization. Is it not about time to take into serious consideration some of the really important offices to be filled? The office of lieutenant-governor has come to be very important. It is now a good job, and, besides being a good job, the lieutenant-governor, unless he turns the task over to the Southern Pacific's political bureau, may make up the senate committees. Then California ought, before it throws over the railroad commission system altogether, to have one honest, capable, sincere, energetic commission, composed of honest, sincere, and energetic men—all three of them. The state board of equalization, a most important body of men, has been affiliated with the political bureau of the Southern Pacific company for twenty-five years if not longer. Four mighty good men are wanted right there. Will the attention of good citizenship kindly direct itself to finding second growth hickory timber, sound and straight grain, for filling these offices?

Frank Otis' Frank Way Of Going Before the Public

Assemblyman Frank Otis of the city of Alameda has given a good example of the way in which a candidate for the legislature, or, for that matter, any other office, should go about getting nominated under the new law. He has sent to the newspapers a card reading in part as follows: "I beg leave to publicly announce to the voters of the Fourteenth Senatorial District * * that I shall be a candidate for the Republican nomination of State Senator at the coming August primary election, to succeed the Hon. J. Clem. Bates. * * I have served two years in the Legislature as Assemblyman from the Forty-seventh Assembly district and invite the closest scrutiny of my record." Thus, seven months before the primary election takes place, Mr. Otis has put the voters on inquiry to find out what kind of a man he is and to decide whether or not they want him to represent them. There is an openness and frankness about this which is promising; Mr. Otis is certainly acting in the spirit of the new primary law, and if all candidates would proceed in the same manner satisfactory results ought to flow from the direct primary, because the people would be given all the opportunity they could reasonably demand to learn about the men they are asked to vote for. How much better to have an aspirant to office take the people into his confidence seven months before election than to have him spend most of that time in conciliating ward bosses and special interests, as used to be the way of doing under the old convention plan of nominations! Without desiring to do for the people of Alameda what they should do for themselves in exploring Mr. Otis' record and deciding whether he ought to be elected, we will say simply that if he is chosen he will be a great improvement over his immediate predecessor in the office.

Go After Frank Leavitt With Hammer and Tongs

The senatorial term of Frank W. Leavitt expires with this year, and he is a candidate for re-election from his old district, which comprises the western portions of Oakland and Berkeley with Emeryville sandwiched in between. He is the senator from the race-track district, and he has represented the race-track with perfect faithfulness and exceptional ability. He has had a swing in the senate which would be hardly credible by anyone who had not seen it, and nobody has had a greater share in the shaping of the laws of this commonwealth during the last six years at least, though he is now serving his third four-year term, than has this same Frank W. Leavitt. He is one of the Men Who Do Things, though usually not in the right way. He is a force, but three times out of four for evil. Will he be re-elected? It is to be hoped not, but it is to be feared he will be, unless the people of Oakland pluck up more courage than they have manifested heretofore when confronted by the same issue. There has been a disposition to deplore the continuance of Leavitt in the senate but to acquiesce in it without a fight, on the theory, apparently, that West Oakland, Emeryville and West Berkeley are naturally wicked and would not elect a good representative if given a chance; and so they have not been given a chance. Prevalence of this same opinion would insure Leavitt's return for another four years. The only thing to do with a fellow like him is to go for him hammer and tongs without stopping to inquire just how large or how small are the chances of beating him. It is even more important to put up a good fight against him than it is to defeat him, and there are reasons for believing that, this time, his defeat would not be a thing of great difficulty.

Isn't It Good Enough To Have Made Good?

Lincoln - Roosevelt men have been discussing with considerable interest, in a quiet way, the question whether Surveyor-General Kingsbury ought to be supported by them for renomination on the Republican ticket and, inasmuch as the open way is the best way, there is nothing against discussing this question in print. Mr. Kingsbury, whose nomination four years ago was unquestionably brought about by Walter Parker as a part of his program for the capture of the Santa Cruz convention, has been reckoned as an organization man of the thick-and-thin kind. Yet the organization, except in the matter of the appointment of certain deputies, and the borrowing of them for political work in Los Angeles at election time, has not run the office, so far as could be seen. On the other hand, Mr. Kingsbury has been much the best surveyor-general the state has had for years, perhaps ever. Under him the office has ceased to be a nest for the land grabbers; he has turned them out and has reformed the laws which enabled them to fatten, for the change in the statutes governing state land sales, which was effected last winter, was almost wholly the work of the surveyor-general, himself, aided, of course, by legal advisers in the attorney-general's office. The meaning of the reform is seen in a concrete way in the fact that the state lands for which the state used never to get more than $1.25 per acre are now selling for an average of $6 per acre; though they cost settlers no more than they did before, the difference being that the state now gets all of the money, whereas before the speculators—the Hydes and the Bensons—got most of it. Such is Kingsbury's record, and the question asked by his friends is whether any organization of sincere reformers can afford to turn him down? It is well known that the land grabbers are interested in preventing his re-election, and it is asked whether good citizens ought not to stand by him, regardless of faction? The organization has not made manifest what it intends to do about renominating Kingsbury.

Some Big Things Which Look Like Right Things

The renomination of the present Attorney-General is an issue considerably larger than that involving the Surveyor-General, inasmuch as the office is one of more potency in the state government. Indeed, without the right kind of man for Attorney-General the state cannot have the right sort of government, and just now there appear to be an unusual number of state problems, such as railroad regulation

THE MODERN LABOR UNION

IV. THE ECONOMIC FAILURE OF UNREGULATED SELFISHNESS.

By CHARLES R. BROWN.

[This is the final article in Mr. Brown's series. We feel sure that these articles have stimulated the thought of everyone who has read them. Their temperate spirit is of the sort which is the hope of a closer sympathy between employers and employees. We should be very glad if everyone who holds a view different from Mr. Brown's, or who has further light to throw upon the subject, would consider this an invitation to use the columns of The California Weekly to make it known. Our heartiest thanks to Mr. Brown. The Editor.]

It is being demonstrated on many fields of human interest that unregulated selfishness is neither good morals nor good business. "Every man for himself and the devil take the hindmost" will not work in economic life any more than it will in the building up of individual character or in the securing of social advance. "We are all members one of another" in this great body of activity, in this great business of production. The head cannot say to the feet, the highest cannot say to the lowest, "I have no need of you." Nor can the feet say to the head, the lowest cannot say to the highest, "we have no need of you!" The groundwork of muscle and brawn cannot ignore the presence, the interests, the imperative necessity of that organizing, superintending, planning capacity which is as vital to the proper earning of good wages as is the readiness on the part of the men themselves to use their strength in their appointed work.

Golden Rule Good Business.

We are all members one of another, and one member or one class of members cannot suffer without involving the whole body ultimately in suffering. Where wages are pushed up beyond what can reasonably be paid, the industry is at once crippled and the manufacturers are, if the unreasonable demand persists, driven out of the field and so the chance of any wages, high or low, at that point is at an end. Where wages are reduced below what is just and right, it breeds constantly that feeling of ill will among the workers which makes against their highest efficiency and productiveness, thereby reducing the volume of the output. Low wages also reduce the standard of living for the working men and for their families and this makes against a steady supply of employable and profitable labor. Low wages, furthermore, reduce the purchasing power of the workingmen so that the markets are depressed and the profits of the industry are thus ultimately affected. High-handed, unreasoning, tyrannical selfishness, no matter where we find it, is suicidal. The golden rule is the only rule which works well in the production of gold if we consider the wider implications and the ultimate tendencies of the various lines of procedure. The iron rule of self interest—each man for himself and the devil take the hindmost—is wicked in morals and stupid in business. Love your neighbor, as well as yourself, is good morals and in the long run it is good business; it is the only principle upon which widespread and lasting prosperity is at all possible.

I have spoken in this series of articles somewhat hopefully—some of you may feel with an unwarranted optimism—as to the growing spirit of fairness on the part of labor unions but in scriptural phrase, it is a hope which has been worked out within me by experience. I have been for some years the appointed delegate from the Ministerial Union in the city where I live, an organization composed of all the protestant clergymen of the various denominations, to the Central Labor Council. This Central Labor Council is made up of the delegates from all of the labor unions of the city and county, excepting those which belong to the building trades—because of the very large number of men in those trades, they have a separate council of their own.

In this Central Labor Council I was accorded, upon my election as a delegate, a voice and a vote the same as any other member. The meetings are held every Monday night and I have made it a point to attend as often as my other engagements would permit. When I first began to attend these meetings

I was regarded with a certain measure of suspicion by some of the labor men who did not know me at all and who feared I might have come among them with some of the spirit of the propagandist for my particular religious faith. When they found this was not so, that I was not there to induce Catholics to become Protestants, or to persuade Hebrews to forsake their ancestral faith, but simply as a man among men interested especially in better conditions for working men, then they took me to their hearts and I have been on the most cordial terms with those men ever since.

Open-Mindedness in the Union.

I am often asked to speak at the conclusion of the business of the evening for "the good of the order;" I frequently participate in the debates which arise touching those questions which naturally come before such a council. And whether I happen to be for or against that particular measure I am heard with the same open-mindedness which is accorded to any other speaker; the sort of reception given to my utterance and the actual influence of it depends, as in the case of any other speaker, solely upon the amount of reason and justice I can put into it. I am sometimes called upon to act with the labor men on committees; I have been called in by both parties to some dispute regarding wages or hours, as an adviser. I have spoken at the meeting of the State Federation of Labor and have contributed articles to The Clarion, the labor union journal of California.

It has been throughout an experience in the highest degree educative to me, and I trust not entirely without value to the working men and to the community in helping to bring about a better understanding between the churches and the unions, as well as between the employers and the employees. We have in the membership of the First Congregational Church of Oakland, California, to which it is my privilege to minister, some rich men and a great many employers of labor as well as a large number of people in modest circumstances. Some of these men felt, I think, considerable uncertainty as to the wisdom of my course, when I first began to act as fraternal delegate to this Labor Council. But there has been no open opposition offered by them in any way in the church and I believe they have all come to feel that this is now an important and useful part of my service to the community as a minister of Christ.

Workingmen Reasonable.

In the discussion of the various questions which have come up during these years on the floor of that labor council, I have found the average workingman intelligent and reasonable, making allowances for those exceptions which would be found in any large group of men. They betray no more prejudice, no more selfishness, no more lack of readiness to share some other man's point of view for the moment, than would a company of employers. The millenium in all its glorious completeness has not come in their hearts and lives any more than it has in the hearts and lives of the rest of us who may not belong to labor unions; they still show signs of being flesh and blood; they walk on the ground and have mud on their boots and are in every sense men and not angels. But taking them as they come, by and large, they do show a splendid and an increasing disposition to see the issue on all sides and in the end as the outcome of their discussions to take that course of action which fairness might dictate.

The growing spirit of peaceful negotiation wherever differences arise, before the point of open refusal to act together has been reached, cannot be too much applauded and encouraged. All war is lamentable and destructive even for the side whose cause is just, and no war, perhaps, is so deplorable as one where the officers and the privates in the same army, making their continuous fight against hunger and cold, nakedness and want of every sort, are lined up in hostile array against each other. In this war the interests of both parties to the struggle are so closely interwoven that they cannot be considered apart, as it is sometimes possible to do in the case of a war between nations; and in this industrial warfare both sides are in the last analysis alike dependent for their supplies upon the same commissary department, the product of that industry, in the service of which they stand enlisted together. It is therefore the part of folly for either side to precipitate a war, except as a last resort against what is regarded as an intolerable injustice.

Strikes Not Now Precipitate.

And in these days no strike is apt to be ordered "lightly or unadvisedly," as it says in the marriage service. The workers who are voting upon the proposition to strike, know by many and painful experiences, either in their own homes or in the homes of their fellows, what a strike means. The arbitrary power of the business agent of the union to call a strike on his own initiative, has been taken away from him, almost universally. And in many unions a certain high percentage of affirmative votes, commonly much more than a majority, is required to precipitate a labor war. And the employers, too, in these days when the great volume of business is being done steadily on close margins and with narrow profits, know the financial cost of a lockout; they understand the reduced efficiency in output, which a haughty refusal of any reasonable demand made upon them, will mean—so they, too, are loth to be compelled to resort to the lockout, or to have the even course of business interrupted by any kind of industrial strife.

There is coming, too, the steady development of a type of labor leader with whom the managers of large interests can satisfactorily deal. The presence in our country of a man like John Mitchell, standing as he has at the head of that important union of mine workers, numbering more than three hundred thousand men, the largest and the strongest single trade union in the world, is of incalculable benefit by way of example to the whole industrial world. It required a high type of generalship to combine in one organization under a single leader, that miscellaneous compound of various races and religions, and of widely removed political points of view, so that they could be brought to act together. And the fact that such an organization was effected, and that it has continued to act under the competent and trustworthy leadership given to it by Mr. Mitchell, is a great testimony to his personal qualities and also a significant testimony to a most encouraging disposition on the part of those working men, so many of whom seemed to offer the most difficult problem to be found in the whole world of labor.

Objects of Mine Workers.

The declared object of that mine workers' union commends its policy to the thoughtful consideration, if not to the instant favor of almost all right-minded people. The purpose of the organization as declared in its constitution is as follows:

1st. To secure an earning fully compatible with the danger of our calling and the labor performed.

2nd. To establish our right to receive pay for labor performed in lawful money (this is directed against the iniquities which have grown out of company stores).

3rd. To secure the introduction of established appliances for the protection of the life, health and limbs of mine employees.

4th. To reduce to the lowest possible minimum, the awful catastrophes which have been sweeping our fellow craftsmen to untimely graves by the thousands by securing legislation looking to the most perfect system of drainage, ventilation, etc.

5th. To demand that eight hours shall constitute a day's work; the very nature of our employment, shut out from sunlight and pure air, working by the power of artificial light, indicating that of all men the coal miner has the most righteous claim to an eight-hour day.

6th. To provide for the education of our children by legally prohibiting their employment until they have attained a reasonably satisfactory education and in every case until they have attained fourteen years of age.

7th. To use all honorable means to maintain peace between ourselves and our employers, adjusting all differences so far as possible by arbitration and conciliation that strikes may become unnecessary.

I have slightly abbreviated the wording here and there, and I have omitted three of the less significant and less important objects named, but these represent the declared purpose and attitude of that largest and strongest union in the world under the wise and competent leadership of John Mitchell. It would be difficult for the most prejudiced mind to find fault with this declaration of purposes; and the extent to which it has been observed, in recent years, is one of the most hopeful indications of the prevalence of better methods in the determination of labor disputes.

The Interests of the Public.

I have not sufficient space left in this article to consider in any detail the interests of that great third party to all labor disputes, which in the excitement of some great strike is so often forgotten, the consuming public. In the memorable coal strike of 1902, the people themselves suffered much more acutely than did the operators, and they suffered in many cases equally with those miners who were fighting for better conditions. There has come throughout the land an insistent and well-founded feeling that the public should not and will not continue to tolerate the wretched inconvenience and the loss which it suffers when two groups of citizens, employers and employees, undertake to carry on, in the midst of a busy community, what amounts to a civil war. And when such a war affects the supply of some article of almost universal need, like coal, or light or transportation, then the popular impatience with these civil wars is greatly increased.

It is a form of social wrong which it is difficult to reach by legislation, for personal service on the part of the working men cannot be enforced by law—if they choose not to work they have that right; and on the other hand business men cannot be compelled by law to conduct their business under conditions which are unacceptable to them. It is only by the power of a more enlightened, more resolute and more effectively expressed public sentiment, that many of the evils which society, standing outside the immediate struggle, has suffered, can be averted in the future.

Union Useful Instrument.

I have spoken approvingly and hopefully of the labor union, but I am well aware of the fact that the labor union does not by any means solve the whole labor problem, partly because it comprises in its membership only a minority of the working people of any country; and partly because it does not know at this time what to do with the mass of unemployed men and women standing outside and creating in large measure the very ills against which the union directs its main strength. But while it stops far short of anything like a general and final solution, it has done enough for the working class to more than warrant its continuance. In influencing public opinion, in securing legislation looking toward the better protection of the laboring man's interests and in working directly for the betterment of his condition, it has done much which must merit the heartiest approval of all observant men. It has established firmly the principle of collective bargaining which, as opposed to the old selfish, suicidal habit of individual bargaining, is in itself worth all the struggle which has been made, and worth all the heroic self-sacrifice on the part of those men who have insisted upon the acceptance of this fundamental principle in all industrial negotiations.

It is not too much to say what Henry Sterling, himself a compositor on the Boston Daily Globe, formerly secretary of Typographical Union No. 13 of Boston, and widely known as a wise and loyal labor leader, said: "I know of no institution of our civilization whose sole aim is to secure justice for the lowly, except the trade union. The church dispenses alms, but not justice; the press seeks mainly its own power and enrichment; the courts and legislatures are so engrossed in the defense of the rights of property that they (sometimes) forget that humanity has rights which ought to be respected, if not by them maintained. Organized labor's sole purpose is to defend and advance the rights and interests of the workers." This is a high estimate to place upon this one force among the many forces which are at work in the world of industry to-day, but when the field has been carefully surveyed and when the full measure of benefits secured to the less fortunate portion of society has been passed in review, it is an estimate upon the service rendered by the modern labor union which I believe will stand.

UP AND DOWN THE STATE.

New students to the number of 1511 registered at Stanford university after the Christmas holidays. Late comers may increase this number somewhat.

During the year 1909 7,159,481 dozen eggs were shipped out of Petaluma, which at the low average of 25 cents a dozen, would add $1,789,870 to the income of the people in that vicinity.

Warren M. John, for the eight years ending January 1, 1909, a member of the California assembly, has received the appointment of postmaster of San Luis Obispo.

W. J. A. Bliss has given the old adobe fort of General Vallejo, together with five acres of ground, to the city of Petaluma.

It is estimated that the orange crop of Southern California has been damaged to the extent of about $1,000,000 by recent frosts.

The Quest and the Conquest.

ALL his life Moses Brayton thought things out, whether good or bad, before he undertook them, and when he made up his mind to go in search of Lemoile he planned his quest as thoroughly as he could. He thought it likely that his part in the incidents of the raid had passed into tradition and felt that a too curious attitude on his own part might provoke unpleasant consequences. He struck a job driving team, and listened and watched. Every band of school girls that passed along the street he scrutinized without seeming to. If anyone spoke of the raid he listened, but asked few questions and said nothing.

He visited the place, as near as he could make it out, where the house in which he had found Lemoile and her father had stood, but a new house had been built in its place and he saw no one in the neighborhood who could by any possibility be taken for Lemoile or her father. He turned burglar and broke into every school house in Lawrence to study the school registers, but he found no Lemoile in any of them.

Then he remembered the sick man raving of the farm on the Waukarusa and how the stock needed his attention. He threw up his job at driving team and went to work on the Waukarusa as a farm hand. He watched the people come and go along the road and contrived to attend every dance or religious service up or down the valley, but to no avail. Then he resorted to his old system of burglarizing the school houses within ten miles either way that he might search the old school records or see if he might find the name, Lemoile, in any old school book, but the records were either gone or silent. At last in an old Pineo's grammar he found on the fly leaf this legend: "Stolen from Lemoile Farish, Sept. 15, 1862." It had been long out of use and thrown into the corner of an old cupboard, but it was a clue, and he felt thankful for that.

From a lad in the family where he worked he carefully drew out what he could about Lemoile. The boy remembered her well, although she was much the older. There could be no mistake as to her identity. She and her father had sold out and gone to California, but where they had settled the boy had not the remotest idea. However, he did know what had been the Farish farm and who lived on it, so the very next time a dance was given Moses attended it and cultivated the acquaintance of some young people who lived on that farm. From these, by cautious inquiry, he learned that Sylvester Farish was a Virginian by birth, but had been reared in Kentucky; that he was among the earliest settlers in the Waukarusa valley and had been proslavery in his sentiments, but had held his peace after the state had become free. Nevertheless, after the Lawrence raid, feeling had turned against him and he had sold out and gone to California overland, expecting to settle in the "San Jowhacken" valley. That was enough for Moses Brayton. He gave up his job and followed after, but it was not until the next spring, 1869, that he arrived and, by the aid of the United States' land office, and the land office of the state, located Sylvester Farish in the county of Tulare where he had become a prosperous stockman.

He did not make himself known to Sylvester Farish, but hired out to him as a vaquero. Lemoile was at school in San Francisco, but would be home in June. The mother had been buried in Kansas two years before this story opened, and so the family, in Lemoile's absence, consisted of the rancher, two or three vaqueros and a Chinese house servant. The health of Mr. Farish had been much broken by the ague before leaving Kansas and he stood in great need of a superintendent able to take the care of the cattle from his shoulders, and Moses Brayton filled every requirement to the full. Every time the rancher took off his hat Moses received a new assurance that this was the right Farish and that his daughter must be the right Lemoile.

When Lemoile returned from San Francisco she paid little attention to the new vaquero, for there had been vaqueros and vaqueros, coming and going, usually a not very prepossessing type of personage. Nor did he force himself upon her attention. He was determined to play this game fairly, taking to himself no advantage from what had transpired. So he gave his time to the stock, was courteous but reticent, and kept his place.

There had been trouble with cattle rustlers, and local butchers had been more than careless as to whose creature they killed when sent out to slaughter some animal to which they had some color of title. All such as these Moses Brayton pursued with an energy that gave them no peace and no profit at the expense of Sylvester Farish's herd. A fellow vaquero was proven to be in complicity with a larcenous butcher, to the cost of the herd he was hired to protect, was exposed, soundly thrashed and his discharge procured. In half a year the new vaquero knew every foot of the range, every brand in the upper valley, every calf that belonged to either brand and, when the fall rodeo came, he was able to defend his employer's rights with neither "ifs" nor "ands" to qualify his asseverations. That was more than Sylvester Farish had ever been able to do. It is not unlikely, therefore, that Lemoile heard not a little of the admirable qualities of the new vaquero.

But all this time there were coming to be more and more persons across whose path to plunder Moses Brayton stood, and some of them were dangerous. He knew it and prepared himself for it, and when he rode the range habitually carried a repeating rifle of the best make across the pommel of his saddle, and it was a nimble coyote or jack-rabbit that came within range that he did not keel over. Once as he rode along, not very far from a slough, a bullet clipped the braid from his hat rim. He put spurs to his horse and dashed off for the slough at right angles to the direction from which the shot came, dismounted, glided from bush to bush and bend to bend, until he got a line on the would-be assassin, put a bullet through his arm, took him prisoner and escorted him to the county seat and turned him over to the sheriff. He had bushwhacked before.

This incident interested Lemoile, but it did not lessen the friction with the rogues of the county. Things came to the knowledge of Sylvester Farish that made him uneasy for the life of his now indispensable vaquero, and her father's evident anxiety prompted some on the part of Lemoile also and helped to increase their acquaintance. This emboldened him to invite her to attend a ball at the county seat and she accepted. It was a lonesome place upon the ranch and gradually the two had become quite chummy.

Moses Brayton had, now that he was in his twenty-fourth year, attained his full stature, but he was not yet stout. He was athletic, inured to hardship, unflinching in nerve, in full possession of his faculties. There were men deep in the horse and cattle-stealing who worked entirely through others, and so maintained a certain respectability. Anyhow, social events were open to all and such as these were often patrons of public balls and other festivities. It was only when legal cognizance of such persons was taken that they lost caste in this new country; and whoever complained to the authorities of one of them, and failed of making the complaint good in the opinion of a jury, became a marked man. Moses Brayton had so offended.

The night for the ball came. Brayton asked Sylvester Farish to have business in town that night and to take double apartments at the hotel so that he could take charge of his daughter in the event that anything disagreeable should take place, which, however, he did not think likely to occur in her presence.

It was just past midnight when one of three men Brayton knew were, so to speak, "camping on his trail," bumped into Lemoile as she and Moses were waltzing.

The affront was flagrant, studied, and the apology more insulting than the aggression. Lemoile looked into the face of Brayton. Instantly there flashed into his eyes that inner pair of beady, black, blazing orbs she had seen six years before. "My God," she gasped, and, leaning heavily upon his arm, asked to be led to a seat. Brayton sent a messenger to bid Sylvester Farish to the ball room.

Having recovered herself in a few moments, and before the waltz had ceased, they took the floor again, her eyes the while searching his inquiringly, almost pleadingly, as if he were a stranger whose identity she would fain make out. They had barely whirled around the hall when a second of the three men whom Brayton knew to be seeking trouble with him deliberately tread upon Lemoile's foot. Again there was a supercilious, contemptuous apology and again, looking into Brayton's eyes, she saw the glitter from the depths, although he was outwardly all tranquility.

By this time Sylvester Farish had arrived and Brayton led Lemoile to him and gave her a seat by his side. He stood in front of them for a moment's commonplace and courteous chat during which the eyes of Lemoile never left his face. Her countenance looked strained and her features drawn and she appeared to be throwing all the intensity of her soul into an effort to read that adamant mask. While this, the work of a few moments only, was taking place the third man under suspicion passed close to them and, when just opposite, remarked to his companion: "It isn't much of a vaquero, even, who will pocket two explicit insults in one evening and resent neither of them."

Brayton turned his head neither to the right nor to the left, but for the third time that evening Lemoile saw the leap, the flash, the disappearance of that inscrutable second pair of eyes behind Brayton's first ones, and then she saw in her own mind's eye the corporal from Quantrill's band fall disemboweled at her feet. Springing to her feet she grabbed the young man by both arms and exclaimed in a hoarse whisper: "In God's name, Moses Brayton, who are you?"

"I am Moses Brayton, Miss Farish, at your service, but I must turn you over to your father for the remainder of the evening," and he turned upon his heel.

"Stop," she cried as she grasped at his arm and almost screamed, under her breath, into his ear, "There is murder in your heart, Moses Brayton. There is, and I know it. If you suffer me to be the cause of your taking a life I shall never forgive you."

"Then my life must be the forfeit, Miss Farish. I leave it for you to say which. It is one of theirs or mine. They will not have it any other way."

"Then God preserve you and keep you safe from harm."

"Good night, Miss Farish."

"Good night."

Moses Brayton strode from the ball room, descended the stairs, crossed the street to the hotel, into which he passed through the rear entrance, moving rapidly to the bar-room which he entered from the side instead of from the front.

As he anticipated, the three men were there waiting for him, but their eyes were upon the front door instead of upon the side. They stood, each talking to a companion, at the three points of a triangle. As soon as they saw him their hands went to their hip pockets, whereas his swung empty at his side, but he had taken them off their guard and so had gained a second in time. This was sufficient for him to reach within striking distance of the first of the three while he was yet half turning toward him. He felled him with a blow on the jaw, caught up his body and with it caught the bullet from the pistol of the farthest man. Dropping the wounded man, he snatched the pistol from the poor fellow's pocket and with it shot the shooter through the pistol arm. The second man had by this time collected himself and Brayton felt the sting of a bullet in his left shoulder, but before his enemy could shoot again Brayton was upon him and felled him with a blow over the head from his revolver. In three or four seconds from Brayton's entrance into the bar-room it was all over. The sheriff had plunged into the room and, with the aid of bystanders whom he commanded to do his bidding, had disarmed all four of the men and placed them under arrest. Brayton had the pleasure of handing the sheriff his own pistol without an empty chamber, a point that counted tremendously for him before the jury when his trial came.

The shots of the duel rang out just as Lemoile and her father were ascending the hotel stairs to their rooms. She flew toward the bar-room door and would have entered had the doors not been held from the inside; but it was only two or three minutes before the wounded men were being prepared for the care of surgeons hastily summoned. Brayton's wound was, perhaps, the worst of the four and Sylvester Farish insisted upon taking him to his room. Lemoile would have gone to him then, but her father forbade her and she remained in her own apartment until the wound was dressed, and the surgeon and his assistants had gone. Then she crept in softly and knelt by the side of his couch. When Brayton opened his eyes she pushed his hair back from his forehead and pressed her lips against it.

"Do you know that you did that once before?" he asked.

"Yes, I do, but I did not know it until to-night."

"Do you know who he is, father?" she asked of Sylvester Farish.

"Nothing more than that he gave the name of Moses Brayton."

"Of course you were too ill to know, but this is the boy that saved your life and mine the morning that Quantrill's band raided Lawrence, the man whom I have prayed every night of my life to be able to see again."

"You don't say!"

"Yes, I do, and I mean it, too, but why did you not tell us who you are? You know that there would have been nothing too good that we could do for you, whereas for a year and a half you have been only just our head vaquero. It was a sin and a shame."

"Because, Lemoile, I wanted to win you fairly. Have I done it?"

"Indeed you have, and now you must be a good boy and get well quick."

"Yes, but what a chase I did have to find you!"

"I am so glad you found us, though, and yet, Moses Brayton, there are conditions under which you can become a terrible, terrible man, and I foresee that it is going to require all that you can do, with God's help and mine, to live a life of peace and good will toward men. But I am willing to take the risk if you'll try, too."

"Well, I'll try, and it does not seem to me that I shall ever hate again bad enough to want to kill, anyhow as long as I can love you—unless some one does bad things to you, then I shall not hold myself answerable, as I did not to-night."

The conquest of Lemoile was complete.

("Institute of Art"—Continued.)

The most munificent, as well as the most notable gift to the new gallery is, however, the bequest of the late Emanuel Walter. This bequest is the collection of paintings, water colors and drawings picked up by Mr. Walter during many years of residence and travel in Europe. Mr. Walter was a brother of Mr. I. N. Walter of the firm of D. N. and E. Walter, of San Francisco.

Paintings in Walter Collection.

The collection includes examples of the work of some of the most celebrated European artists. For example, a signed painting by John Constable, the great English landscape painter, is included in the series. Corot, whose French landscapes are well nigh priceless, is represented by a signed painting. Charles Francois Daubigny, another great Frenchman, is represented by two canvases.

The greatest living German portrait painter is Franz von Lenbach. A portrait of von Lenbach, by himself, is one of the most im-

Lenbach, by himself, is one of the most important—a Dutch artist who lived and died in poverty, but his pastoral pictures are now among the costliest prizes of the collector. One of his paintings, "Peasant With Sheep," recently sold in New York for $40,000. Two characteristic examples of his work are among these pictures. Franz von Stuck and Constant Troyon, both celebrated painters, are represented by paintings. Bouguereau, whose pictures of the Madonna and Child are world-famous, is represented by a characteristic pencil drawing.

Among the water colors is an example of the colorful and sensuous work of Alma-Tadema, whose pictures of Greek life are celebrated. Barye, the French sculptor in bronze, whose casts of wild animals are as famous as Landseer's animal paintings, is represented by two pictures. Landseer himself is seen in a picture of a "Wounded Duck." The "Horse Fair" of Rosa Bonheur is one of the most popular paintings in the world. Two drawings by this Frenchwoman, "Lioness and Cubs" and "Herd of Deer," are in the collection. Gustave Dore, whose illustrations of the Bible and of "Paradise Lost," are familiar to everyone, appears in a small water color, "At the Masked Ball." The delicate and peculiarly Parisienne style of the sisters Lemaire is familiar to most lovers of art. Madeleine Lemaire's "Basket of Roses," in water color, is an example of their work. Rousseau and de Neuville, the French painters, the one noted as a landscapist and the other as a colorful and dashing painter of war scenes, are represented, the one by a landscape, the other by a sketch called "The Halt."

In all, there are 145 oil paintings, water colors and pastels in the collection. In addition to these, there are forty-nine drawings in charcoal, pencil, and ink. Among these latter are examples of the work of Rosa Bonheur, Benjamin Constant, Corot, Decamps, Meissonier, Millet, and Troyon.

This magnificent collection is accompanied by a bequest of $40,000 for its proper housing and maintenance. Work will soon be begun on an addition to the present building to accommodate these art treasures, and the public will be allowed to enjoy the view of them.

The library is also being gradually replaced, largely by gifts from friends. Noteworthy among recent accessions to the shelves are 277 volumes of books on art, a valuable collection presented by J. C. Cebrian, Mrs. Vergil Williams, the wife of the well-known painter, has also given to the association some sixty volumes. Other accessions from time to time have brought the total number of volumes in the library up to about 440 volumes.

Famous Graduates.

What is written above gives a fair idea of the progress made in the rehabilitation of this vital center of esthetic culture in San Francisco. The school has always been a beacon of light to the whole Pacific Coast. Students come hither from many states, and many of them have left it to attain national fame. Among those who have become celebrated may be mentioned Alexander Harrison, who has been decorated in many of the countries of Europe. Ernest C. Peixotto is the best artist of the Scribners in New York. Davenport and Swinerton are among the most successful American cartoonists. Charles Rollo Peters' nocturnes have a wide fame. John Gutzon Borglum is rapidly becoming one of the leading sculptors of America. Christ Jorgensen is a famous painter of landscapes. Maynard Dixon has a national reputation as an illustrator. All these, and many more of lesser fame but solid achievement, studied at the Hopkins Institute.

And this suggests a sentimental loss, though a practical gain, in the change of names of the school. With the destruction of the physical reminders of Mark Hopkins, the feeling prevailed that the appropriateness of the school as a memorial to him was destroyed. The name of the new construction was changed, therefore, to the San Francisco Institute of Art. This designation is more comprehensive and indicates the scope of the Institute more broadly than the personal name and has its value in that fact. It is also appropriate, for the directing force of the original institution was the San Francisco Art Association, which was founded in 1871, long before any connection with the Hopkins mansion.

The greatest present need of the Institute is a permanent building. With its growing classes, its growing gallery and library, a building more appropriate and more lasting should be erected. It is to be hoped that, in the course of time, this need will be supplied. It should be borne in mind that the Institute is entirely self-supporting. The relation of the University of California is merely that of trustee, and the Institute receives no funds from the state nor from private endowment.

It should also be noted that the work of the Institute has been of inestimable value to California and to San Francisco especially. Not only have thousands of pupils graduated from its classes, a few of whom have attained fame, but the centre of art work on a large scale has always been at the Institute. Of the graduates unknown to fame, nearly all are self-supporting because of the instruction they received, and all are contributing to the growth of culture in the state. Some, to mention particular instances, are intimately associated with the direction of public taste through employment at Shreve's, at the Sierra Art Engraving company, and in the architects' and designers' offices.

The present officers of the association are Vanderlynn Stow, president; John Galen Howard, and Lorenzo P. Latimer, vice presidents; John I. Walter, treasurer; Henry Heyman, secretary, and John R. Martin, assistant secretary. All of these, except the last named, are directors, and, besides, the following are directors: James D. Phelan, Horace G. Platt, Warren D. Clark, Thomas M. Pennell, and Jonah R. Howell. The director of the Institute is Robert H. Fletcher.

and tide-land ownership, which involve legal solutions. So, one of the important things to do in the near future is to decide whether Attorney-General Webb is worthy of being elected again, and if not who shall succeed him. Mr. Webb, like Mr. Kingsbury, is accounted an organization Republican, and two or three years ago few anti-organization Republicans would have been inclined to favor his return to the office. But since then Webb, like Kingsbury, has made a record of service in several emergencies, and so it comes about that his claims are being seriously considered. It is not intended in this paragraph to discuss the investigation of railroad rebates, the Stetson rate bill, or the suit for the San Pedro tide-lands, which have already been discussed to some extent in these columns, for to go into the merits of those propositions would require space, and still less is it proposed to attempt to say whether or not Attorney-General Webb should be nominated by the league; but it is desired to point out that this is one of the really big questions to be considered in connection with state nominations to be made. But it may be said that in conducting the rebate investigation with so much vigor as he did, in drafting a railroad regulation bill which the railroad companies refused to accept, in making a strenuous fight to induce the legislature to adopt the bill, and in instituting and prosecuting the suits for the recovery to the state of San Pedro harbor, now pretty well monopolized by two railroads, as well as in other acts, Attorney-General Webb has given no evidence of being under Southern Pacific control. In fact, he has done several really big things which look like the kind of independence which the people of the state like to have their Attorney-General manifest.

People's Money for The Public Welfare The People's Fight Fund is now an accomplished fact in San Francisco. The actual cash has not yet been subscribed—though some of it has been—but the organization has been perfected and is of a character that assures success. The following have consented to act on the committee of fifty: Charles R. Bentley, George E. Crothers, E. R. Taylor, William Kent, R. E. Houghton, Walter Macarthur, Selah Chamberlain, N. J. Brittan, Will J. French, James D. Phelan, Byron Mauzy, R. E. Banning, Samuel W. Backus, John Sweeney, L. C. McAfee, Edgar A. Mathews, Max J. Kuhl, Col. J. O. Giesting, Barclay Henley, Frank W. Marvin, Olin L. Berry, Henry Colombat, Alfred Greenbaum, Edwin E. Grant, E. Stewart, John Henderson, Clarence Henning.

George W. Lunt, Isidor Jacobs, Emil Pohli, Milton T. U'Ren, J. C. Astredo, John J. Pratt, Theodore Bell, J. W. Treadwell, Thomas S. Williams, E. R. Zion, Thos. E. Hayden, W. W. Sanderson, A. M. DeVall, Edgar Apperson, Ralph Hathorn, Edward L. Baldwin, Rev. E. R. Dille, Rev. H. H. Bell, Rev. Wm. Rader, Fred L. Hilmer, Richard Cornelius, M. C. Hassett, Theodore Bacigalupi, C. W. Eastin, Frank L. Richmond, Matt Harris Sr., Rev. Chas. N. Lathrop, J. H. McCallum, E. J. Callan, F. W. Smith, Harris Weinstock and Thomas J. Ford.

The Welfare Fund Trustees The Board of Trustees, which will organize and administer the fund, is now complete, and will consist of the following: Charles H. Bentley, J. G. Giesting, James D. Phelan, Barclay Henley, R. E. Houghton, Samuel W. Backus, Edgar A. Mathews, Walter Macarthur, Selah Chamberlain, Harris Weinstock, J. J. Pratt. All the members of the committee and of the board of trustees are men who have long been in the fight for better things in San Francisco.

How the Fund Will Be Used The following extract from the preamble to the constitution of the organization definitely explains the necessity for such a fund:

In this day, every intelligent person realizes that to maintain the standard contemplated by the founders of the Republic, a struggle is inevitable with those who have entrenched themselves in power through the apathy of the citizens. The expenditure of large sums of money in political affairs brings to the interests handsome return in the shape of privileges not enjoyed by all in common. To prevent such a condition of affairs, active public interests and a reasonable contribution of funds are essential. Political campaigns entail necessary expenses which should be borne by those who are its beneficiaries. The people's fight cannot be won without the people's money.

The Public Welfare Fund of San Francisco has been created for the purpose of collecting and administering a fund for all movements and measures working for the common good of the community, regardless of the attitude maintained by the national political parties. Contributions, in the way of membership dues, are asked of the people in general, that their cause may meet with proper financial support.

Patriotic citizenship is the only test of membership in this fund; a better, higher standard of civic ideals, its only purpose.

The advantages of such a fund are many: It concentrates all collections in one responsible body; that body can prevent waste of energy, by heading off duplications of effort by two independent organizations working for the same end; it ensures the largest possible return in efficiency for the money contributed to public causes. The minimum contribution accepted is $1 a month, or $10 a year, in advance; there is no maximum limit. The fund in Los Angeles has been tremendously useful. The fund in San Francisco promises to be no less useful. The office of the treasurer is at Room 669, Mills Building, San Francisco.

Livestock Breeders After The Railroad Commission The following resolution, adopted last Tuesday evening by the California Livestock Breeders' Association, indicates the beginning of a combination of all kinds of farming societies to force the hand of the Railroad Commission: Whereas, the railroad companies doing business in the State of California have since January 1, 1909, arbitrarily put in force an increase of freight rates amounting to from ten to fifty per cent. upon thousands of articles consumed daily by the people; and Whereas, the livestock industry along with other industries of the state has suffered from this increase; and Whereas, these advanced transportation charges have entered materially into the increased cost of living; and Whereas, complaint has been made to the railroad commission of California against the increased freight rates on livestock, and said commission has failed and neglected to extend any relief in the premises; therefore, be it Resolved: That the California Livestock Breeders Association hereby denounces said increase of freight rates as being unreasonable, unjust and unlawful, and we cannot condemn too severely the non-action of said Railroad Commission; and be it further Resolved: That a committee of three be appointed by the chair for the purpose of co-operating with other organizations to compel action on the part of the Railroad Commission, and in the event that said commission persists in its refusal to grant relief, that said committee be authorized and directed to assist in such proceedings as may be independently undertaken for the purpose of obtaining fair and lawful rates in California.

Co-operation With League By San Francisco Clubs The recent decision of the Municipal League of Republican clubs of San Francisco to co-operate with the Lincoln-Roosevelt League was followed by the appointment of Hiram W. Johnson, Rolla V. Watt, C. H. Bentley and George E. Crothers as members of the executive committee of the Municipal League, with instructions to choose eleven additional members, to make up a total of fifteen. These additional members have now been appointed and are as follows: Max J. Kuhl, W. W. Watson, Ralph Hathorn, John H. McCallum, W. H. Stewart, Daniel A. Ryan, A. E. Graupner, M. S. Kohlberg, W. D. Fennimore, J. E. Gilson and Paul Bancroft.

Frank K. Mott or Chas. M. Belshaw? Judging from the trend of talk in progressive Republican circles the field from which to select a Lincoln-Roosevelt League candidate for governor, to be submitted to the Republicans of California for ratification at the August primary, appears to be narrowing down to a choice between Charles M. Belshaw, for many years state senator from Contra Costa and Marin counties, and Frank K. Mott, the third-term mayor of Oakland. Mr. Belshaw has had much experience as a legislator, with little or none as an executive officer. Mayor Mott has developed a high order of executive capacity as mayor, but has had little experience as a legislator. Both men are willing to stand on the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League platform making the emancipation of the Republican party of California from corporate control the pivotal issue of their campaign, and both have good records for political independence. It is no more than fair, however, to say that neither of these gentlemen would be first choice with many influential progressive Republicans. The order of preference might be something like this: Francis J. Heney, Hiram W. Johnson, William R. Davis, Chester H. Rowell and, afterward, either Mott or Belshaw. It is too much to say that League sentiment would be unitedly in this order, but only preponderantly. Of course the issue cannot be fully determined until the great conference is held by and by. The Watchman is only reporting the state of the insurgent atmosphere, so to speak.

John W. Titcomb of the United States bureau of fisheries, said recently of a fishing excursion: "I once made a fishing excursion to a stream that flowed behind a lunatic asylum. As I sat and smoked on the bank, watching my cork, I noticed a strange object floating down toward me with the current. I saw that it was a man. He had all his clothes on, and he was swimming in the strangest way. I verily believe every part of him was submerged but one nostril. 'Hi!' I shouted, 'what are you doing there?' He lifted his head from beneath the surface, and then, before drawing it under again, he snapped: 'Sh—sh; Don't interfere! I'm a submarine!'"—Washington Star.

The State Controller—Continued.

In former times the Controller was given an attorney to assist him, but for a good many years the Attorney-General has been his only legal adviser.

All officers of counties and other persons doing business with the state have their accounts settled by the Controller, and twice every year, in December and May, following the payment of the two installments of the property tax, the County Auditors and Treasurers have a grand settlement with the Controller and State Treasurer. First, the Auditors send in their reports to the Controller, and these are gone over carefully to determine their correctness; if incorrect, they are returned for correction; if correct, the County Treasurers are notified how much money they must pay over to the State Treasurer; the Treasurers either go to Sacramento in person with the money, or they make their settlement through banks or an express company; the Controller gives each County Treasurer an order to pay a certain amount to the State Treasurer, and when the State Treasurer certifies that he has received that amount, the County Treasurer is given a clearance by the Controller.

The supervision of the enforcement of the inheritance tax law and the collection of that tax, which now brings in something like a million dollars a year, has by force of circumstances become one of the Controller's most important duties, although it is not specifically prescribed by law. The benefit of this tax inures wholly to the state, and there is not likely to be a clean collection unless it is the particular duty of some state officer to look after it. The last legislature gave the Controller an assistant known as the Inheritance Tax Deputy to watch all kinds of evasions of the law, including the under-appraisal of estates subject to tax.

A responsible and onerous duty of the Controller is to act as a member of the State Board of Equalization, along with the four district members of that body. This work keeps the Controller traveling around the state to study property values and observe the work of County Assessors, although, as this review would indicate, the Controller has work enough in his own office to keep him continuously busy. But, on the other hand, the Board of Equalization work brings the Controller in touch with the practical operation of the revenue laws in all of the counties as nothing else would, and that is a distinct advantage.

An efficient Controller can protect the interests of the state in many ways, but in none better than by resisting the payment of illegal or doubtful claims upon the treasury. When he refuses to draw his warrant all that a claimant can do is to sue out a writ of mandate, and usually that involves a trial in the courts of the merits of the claim. If it is known that a Controller is vigilant to detect illegal claims, or to require doubtful ones to be tried out before being honored, and that he has a good article of spinal vertebra, it exercises a wholesome influence far and wide. California has generally been fortunate during the past fifty-nine years in having upright and capable State Controllers.

When we come to take up the work of the State Board of Examiners we shall get a more complete idea of the ways that claims against the state are verified before being paid. The system may be cumbersome but it is fairly efficient and few illegal claims get paid. Where the state loses something is in paying debts that are perfectly legal but not necessary to have been incurred in the first place. Of course the State Controller has no control over such charges.

It is proper that the elective machinery of the state should have one auditing officer and the executive, or appointive, another and that is the way we have it in California. The mechanism of the State Board of Examiners could be improved, but we shall give the reasons why when we reach that topic.

In the office of State Controller, as certainly as that of governor, there is opportunity for the free exercise of those attributes which we call personality. Every hour in the day the judgment is called upon to choose between that which is wise and that which would be unwise, between doing that which good conscience requires to be done and that which might be qualified by political or personal consideration.

Lectures on Direct Legislation.

John Z. White, the noted lecturer on Direct Legislation, will address the citizens of San Francisco to-morrow under the auspices of the Direct Legislation League of California. Mr. White has spoken in this city before and those who heard him at that time will be glad to welcome him again. He is just completing a tour which has taken in the whole Pacific Coast. In all he will spend about six weeks in the State of California.

Typewriter Mightier Than Meataxe.

PRESIDENT TAFT LATELY took the press to task for indiscriminate hammering of men in public life. What he said was to the point, and yet he spoke from observation rather than from experience, for the press of the country has treated him more tenderly than the critics of his predecessor in office treated him. Nevertheless, the writing machine is a better device for dealing with public officials than the meataxe, although The California Weekly has had difficulty in convincing some of its friends of the truth of this statement. There are those who, if they do not have a reputation for breakfast every morning, or at least as often as once a week, fancy that they are going hungry.

Want to Dawdle and Come Home.

TIPS FROM WASHINGTON are to the effect that, away down deep, congress has no serious intention of enacting decisive legislation at this session, and for the reason that such legislation cannot be satisfactory to the people and to the interests too, and the interests and not the people are in the saddle. Therefore it will be better for candidates seeking reelection to face their constituents with great things in prospect for 1911 than with huge legislative disappointments consummated in 1910. If this be true the President will prove himself mellow indeed if he does not swing his big stick, and do it now.

Fetch Out Those Scandals.

MAYOR McCARTHY HAS SPOKEN darkly of the things he could tell, if he would, about some of the good men who have served as commissioners under the Taylor administration, and are now loth to let go of their job, but consideration for them, and for the fair fame of the city, forbids, so he says. Blurt it out, Mr. Mayor. Your insinuations are worse than the truth can be, your bark worse than your bite. If San Francisco needs to be purged of its sins at the cost of passing with naked feet over an investigating gridiron heated seven times hotter than it was wonted to be, why, get your incinerator ready. If you take it out in talk the public will know you for a bluffer.

His First Hard Work.

THE WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE of the house of representatives is to investigate the high cost of living. This is the committee that laid the foundation for the present upwardly revised downward tariff revision and Sereno E. Payne is its chairman. He is about to prepare resolutions determining the nature of the investigations to be made. His first hard work will be to "whereas," that, "inasmuch as the tariff is not the cause of the increased cost of living, therefore that phase of the subject may properly be omitted from investigation." Sereno is not a man to pull a house he has builded down about his own ears. The finance committee of the senate, the committee that erected the superstructure on the foundation laid by the house, is also to investigate high prices. Lodge is to be the head of this committee and Smoot the other end. It can be counted on to concur with the Payne resolution that the tariff didn't do it.

The Dooley Idea to Be Carried Out.

IN VIEW OF THE PROTEST that was made by high financiers, in the names of the widowed and orphaned investors of the country, against all interference with their schemes to rob the general public, it was Mr. Dooley who first advocated the extermination of the widows and orphans of America lest a worse thing come upon the people. Senator Heyburn has afforded a new justification for this extermination. It is that the establishment of postal savings banks will reduce the savings interest rate of $2\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., with the finality that the widows and orphans of America will be exterminated by the slow, sure, but necessarily fatal and distressing malady of starvation. How can the tender-hearted Taft press his postal savings bank scheme after the Heyburn exposure of what it must result in! For of course the thrifty people of America can be counted on to withdraw all their deposits from savings banks paying from 4 to 5 per cent. interest in order to deposit them in Uncle Sam's post-office where they will earn only two and one-quarter!

If Not, Why Not?

BEST ADVICES FROM WASHINGTON are that, judged by surface indications, both regulars and insurgents are standing loyally by the President in his efforts to secure conservation legislation, a postal savings bank law, federal incorporation and regulation of great corporations, a central railroad court and the revision and extension of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and, too, that the Democrats will not oppose these measures. With everybody on his side and nobody against him, it would seem that the President should develop enough capacity for leadership to secure some affirmative, progressive and remedial legislation at this session of congress.

Marry or Die Young.

D R. JACQUES BERTILLON, of Paris, having taken up and carried on with painstaking fidelity investigations which his renowned father inaugurated, declares that, the world over, married men live to be much older than single, matrons older than maids, those mated for life to be correspondingly older than widowers and widows. In short, marriage is a case of life or death in more senses than one, but of all ephemeral human existences that of the single man is the most evanishing. His irregularities of life and conduct are more fatal to him than the great white plague is to other folk. Every social function for bringing youths and maidens together is, therefore, to be looked upon as a life-saving station.

Their Terror of the Law.

THE TERROR WITH WHICH high financiers view the Sherman anti-trust law, and the probability of its enforcement by Attorney General Wickersham, is well exemplified in the fact that America's two biggest express companies are in process of consolidation and the Anaconda group of copper interests are combining as a preliminary to a holding corporation that is to control the production and sale of the copper product of the United States. The President's assurances that he does not intend to run amuck among the big interests, through fear that widows and orphans and wage-earners may get hurt, appears to have been taken at full face value.

They That Go Down Into the Mines!

THE CHAPTERS which the last week or two have added to the history of the Mine Horrors of America have lacked nothing of the tragic. Perhaps the fault is not that of mine owners and operators. Perhaps it is that of the men, but if such slaughters cannot be avoided we had best seal up the mines of black diamonds and develop our "white coal" supplies of the Cascades and the Sierras, the Alleghanies and the Rockies. A life will be lost now and again even then, but not by hecatombs.

TWO GREAT CASES.

There are two great cases before the Supreme Court of the United States. They are the Standard Oil and the National Tobacco, and they involve the validity of the holding company. The Northern Securities case did not exhaust that issue and it is to be hoped that one or other of these two cases, or both together, may make the law so plain that even a high financier may not err therein. Decisions are expected sometime during the year 1910, and their importance can scarcely be overestimated. In fact the future of our civilization may be dependent upon them.

The holding company was, and is, the hope of those who stand for a colossal centralization of commerce and industry. Under it the holders of one share more than a majority of the stock of such a company may also utterly control all the subsidiary corporations of whose capital stock one more than one-half the shares may be acquired. The limit to the power of such a corporation to unify and control is inconceivable. It was the evident limitlessness of this power, and not anything that was specifically in the Sherman anti-trust law itself, that moved the Supreme Court of the United States, in the Northern Securities controversy, to quash that insatiate, all-engulfing corporation through fear that all the railroads in the country might be brought under the domination of a single holding company of holding companies.

With the failure of the Northern Securities scheme the genius of Harriman for combining great railroad properties had to content itself with a personality instead of a corporation, with the result that the death of Harriman practically put an end to that combination. A number of his great railroad properties have already resumed their autonomy. The Santa Fe has done so, and so has the Illinois Central. The President has ordered Attorney General Wickersham to proceed with the suit for prying apart the Union and Central Pacific line of railroad from the Southern Pacific, and it is not unlikely that, five years from the death of Harriman, the railroad system which he created will have resolved itself into a single transcontinental line, with laterals, while all the other constituencies of the system will have encountered a similar fate as parts of similar single lines with laterals.

Why should transportation or manufacturing require centralization in the interests of efficiency and economy when agriculture does not? It is demonstrable, by computation, that the combination of a hundred farms into one, with the elimination of a multiplied superintendency, and the higher efficiency which a well-organized system would afford, should greatly cheapen the cost and augment the product of those farms, yet the country that has the largest number of independent farm proprietors is the largest producer per acre and decidedly the most happy and prosperous of all countries. Why might it not be so with the country that had the largest number of small, independent manufacturers?

But suppose that combination in agriculture were to prove as great in efficiency as claimed in industry and commerce, could any country afford, in the mere interests of an increased or a cheapened product, to have all its small farms swallowed up in great landed estates, its independent agricultural proprietors lost in peasantry and serfdom? Is economy the only good? Is efficiency the only criterion?

The California Weekly holds that efficiency and economy cost more than they are worth to state, nation or humanity when they swallow independent endeavor and reduce great and small to the status of hired servants of an octopus. The laws should forbid one corporation to hold stock in another corporation. The holding company should be denied the right to exist, and there should be no more of centralization of commerce or industry than may be comprised in a single corporation, and no more of unification in management than one man may get together while he lives, to go to pieces when he dies. More than this the world cannot afford to pay for economy and efficiency in commerce or industry. More than this we may outlaw with safety to our individual and national life.

The President, in his message on the trust issue, assumes the indispensable character of great centralization of capital, but even that does not place the issue beyond debate. The formation of trusts and holding companies has not been so much in the interests of economy and efficiency as in the interests of a monopoly that has extended from the Standard Oil to the shoeblack stand, from the great meat packing trust to the corner grocery. William Allen White says that even the Supreme Court of the United States has its ear attuned to public opinion. If this be so, now is the time for public opinion regarding the holding company and the indispensability of centralization to make itself heard at the bar of that court.

Union Labor Legislators.

If the Union Labor party is to be a factor in affairs in this state it is proper to consider what its tendencies are likely to be and The California Weekly knows of no better way of obtaining light in this regard than by studying the legislative records of those who have received the endorsement of Union Labor party conventions and have obtained their election by Union Labor party votes. To this end arrangements were made with Mr. Franklin Hichborn to make a study of the records, in the last legislature, of such Union Labor party representatives as were there. The results of this study constitute our leading article for the week. No one will question Mr. Hichborn's fitness for this service.

The California Weekly believes in unionizing labor in industry if not in politics, and it believes in electing representative labor leaders who are fit for the service to legislature and congress. It would rather see Walter Macarthur in the United States Senate to-day than either senator California has there, and it is sorry that John Mitchell is not in congress instead of being in the shadow of the jail. If Samuel Gompers cares for a seat in congress it would like to see him there, too.

But The California Weekly is opposed to political side shows in the service of the political bureau of the Southern Pacific company, and those who read Mr. Hichborn's analysis of the records of members purporting to be representatives of Union Labor party principles will not be of two opinions as to the subserviency to that interest of those legislators, with such exceptions as Mr. Hichborn takes pains to note.

Moreover, The California Weekly is opposed to class alignments in the politics of a republic. That means death to the republic as a government of the whole people.

Serving God in Serving Man.

The California Weekly holds that the spirit of the Christian religion is true. It holds that a true religion will react upon the political life of a people as certainly as upon individual conduct, and if it does not so react it is because the people have ever so little of that religion in their hearts.

The political situation in California, as well as elsewhere in this nation, is this: A powerful and grasping corporation has, through the forms of free government without its spirit, usurped the functions of government and prostituted them to ignoble ends. A number of citizens have perceived the unwholesome trend of events and joined in an effort to free the commonwealth of California from this danger.

This movement desires a leader. A number of persons eminently qualified for leadership have been appealed to to head the movement by offering themselves for nomination for the office of governor. One has an opportunity to make money just at this time and desires to be excused. Another has means enough to afford the service, but has his heart set on a trip around the world. Another has an invalid wife whom to be away from is a constant anxiety to himself and a hardship to her. And so on down the list of those preeminently qualified to lead.

But it was not so in 1861. In that time of national peril, not greater but only more apparent than now, such excuses as these were not thought of, to say nothing about being offered in seriousness. In those days men said: "Here, Lord, am I. Make such use of me as thou wilt," and they left their business, their chances to make money, even their invalid wives and little children, and offered themselves as a living sacrifice for the idea of a government of, by and for the people, that the idea might not perish from the earth.

Every excuse offered by those preferred as leaders for the hosts of reform is a good excuse, if a man be free to prefer his own good to the common good, his own wealth to the commonwealth, his own family to the human family, his own comfort to the well-being of his state.

How was it in '61? Did men then wait until the national capital was in the hands of the enemy, as it appears to be now, in common with the capitals of more than half the states in the union? Not by a long chalk! They carried the war into the enemy's country and remained there until that enemy capitulated. The conscience of the country was not then looking for compromise candidates. No choice was put up with that was not a first choice. The issue was: "Union or disunion, where do you stand?" The issue now should be just as decisive: "Bond or free, where do you stand?"

Believing in democracy as the hope of the race, and finding its very existence brought in issue, The California Weekly believes it to be God's service and man's service for every able-minded man to throw himself into this contest in the spirit of '61, which was: "Here, Lord, am I, use me as thou wilt." That spirit and that only will guarantee that free government shall not perish from the earth.

The Brighter Side.

The mission of The California Weekly is to fight for Right Things and against wrong, but the natural tendency of the fray is to lose sight of the good in our zeal for combating the bad. We shall strive in future to keep a truer perspective, and to pay more attention to those associations and institutions that make for righteousness that we may give them aid. This week we present the Telegraph Hill Neighborhood as a case in point. It is helping to make things better than they are and whatever is doing this can have the help of The California Weekly by letting us know about it.

Direct Primary Talks.

In view of the insistent demand for further information regarding our new direct primary law we have concluded to suspend, for the present, our consideration of the state offices and commissions and devote our School for Citizenship to a careful, plain, yet comprehensive, exposition of the primary law. Our purpose is to answer every question, for which there is an answer, which an intelligent person can ask about that law. There are questions for which there will be no answer until the supreme court shall have spoken.

Mayor McCarthy's Mistakes.

Mayor McCarthy means well, or thinks that he means well, but he is making two mistakes that bid fair to wreck his administration. One is his willingness to fight all creation, including the ladies of the California Club, and the other is his misconception of the nature of the office he holds. The charter of San Francisco very properly centers a good deal of executive power in the hands of the mayor, but it does not constitute him a dictator, a czar, an autocrat, or even a sultan. Whoever is spoiling for a fight generally gets a stomach full of it sooner or later, and a large share of the San Francisco public is becoming a good deal roiled at Mayor McCarthy.

The Way of the Power Exploiter.

Let us suppose that a hydro-electric power company develops 100,000 horse power at a cost of $10,000,000, and that it will require net earnings of $1,000,000 a year to pay appropriate dividends and, in fifty years, when the franchise runs out, return the original investment. Let us assume that a charge of $20 per year of 3,000 horse-power hours will pay all running expenses and yield this net income and, at the same time, furnish power for every purpose for which power may be profitably used by the people. In such a case the power company would derive no more than a fair income on its investment and the profits arising from the use of the power by the people would go to the people.

Now suppose that instead of marketing its power at a price that will pay the running expenses, yield a fair rate of interest and return the principal sum in fifty years, the power company applies the "what the traffic will bear" principle in fixing its prices. This takes from the consumer so large a percentage of his earnings as to make it only a little more profitable to be a consumer than not to be and so retains him as a consumer. Suppose that "what the traffic will bear" is $50 per horse power per year of 3,000 hours. This will mean an excess of $3,000,000 a year over what the consumers of that power should have paid, or 6 per cent. on a capitalization of $50,000,000. Inasmuch as the corporation will have borrowed the $10,000,000 actually invested the $40,000,000 fictitious value created under the "what the traffic will bear policy," will go to the stockholders who invested nothing but a little sagacity and had the assurance to take to themselves a source of wealth that should be open to the enjoyment of all. And this $40,000,000 bonus to high finance will be parceled out to "widows and orphans" as innocent purchasers for value and so become a second, if not exactly a first, mortgage on industry for half a century.

The figures here given are for purposes of illustration and are confessedly not accurate, and yet they may not prove to be egregiously out of conformity with the fact and, anyhow, they illustrate the principle at stake with sufficient accuracy. They also illustrate some of the methods by which our exasperating inequalities of fortune have been brought about, and they afford an earnest of what the power-grabbers of the country are trying to do to the future consumers of power. It has been estimated as being entirely possible, if their schemes of exploitation can be carried out without restriction, to mulct the American people to the extent of $600,000,000 a year in power charges over and above what would prove a fair interest on the investment, together with the amortization of the original investment at the end of fifty years.

Is it any wonder, then, that men like Gifford Pinchot, men who love their kind more than they love the dollars of their kind, are jealous of the privileges the power-grabbers are seeking, or that such men are suspicious of that sinister looking, cold and calculating Balingier, and have watched his every movement with a jealous interest in the common welfare? That way lies as hard bondage for the children of America as the children of Israel suffered in Egypt.

The Bar Association Moving.

It is cheering to know that the San Francisco Bar Association is bestirring itself with the view of raising bench and bar to a station of respectability. If it had been about this business for half a century there would be less need for strenuous activity at this time.

It is well to school the younger men of the bar to a higher standard of ethics, but the instruction is not likely to be improved on so long as the younger men are not able to profit by example as well as by precept. What is immediately wanted is a weeding out of the bar as it is. There no doubt are a hundred men practicing law in San Francisco who could best benefit their calling by abandoning it, if not by their own volition, then willy-nilly. It is not so much a legal Sunday school as a reform school that is needed.

But the beginning of reform is an acknowledgment of the need for it, and that acknowledgment has been pretty generally made from the President of the United States down through all gradations even to the pettifogger. No man denies it. What may not be as fully appreciated is that the bench needs reforming as certainly as the bar and, if anything, more immediately. Our legislatures are not more certainly under the domination of special interests than are our courts. In fact it is an open secret that political bureaus of great corporations place more stress upon securing the nomination and election of judicial candidates to their liking than of legislative. Their power is greater. The same holds true with regard to the appointive judiciary, whether of state or of nation. Only now and again is there a judge who did not secure his position, in some measure at least, through the influence of powerful, and often untoward, special interests, and the court that is not above suspicion of ulterior influence is as good as no court at all. There may not be many "Lige Bemises" in the federal judiciary, but there are more who got their judicial jobs the way he got his than there should be. For further particulars read "A Certain Rich Man."

Weed out the weaklings as though they were Canada thistles; make the judicial terms long and the compensation ample, with a comfortable pension ever after; give us non-partisan nominations and emancipate government from corporate control. If California does not then enjoy as good a judicial system as England we shall at least have as good an administration of justice as we deserve.

Good fortune attend the efforts of the Bar Association and may good politics be ready to lend a hand in securing legislation fit to act upon the recommendations of the association when it has gotten its remedial measure into shape.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

I took them to be grandfather and granddaughter. He was in his sixties and she in her teens. Evidently they had been going about together during the day and were now homeward bound. "What a splendid day this has been," the old gentleman said. "Yes, responded the slip of a girl, "neither too hot nor too cold, just breeze enough. I had not thought of it before, but it has been just fine." "I have been thinking of it all day," the old gentleman said, "and have enjoyed it every minute."

The writer had not thought of the weather once all day. It was press day, with much to do, and many people had been coming and going all day. But for this incident he could not have told the day following what the previous day had been like, whether it had rained or shone. (It ought to be "shined," but the dictionary says "obsolete or vulgar." Good usage has advanced backward.)

As we grow older, if we grow normally, our happiness is less and less dependent upon the state of the weather, and for the reason that our minds become absorbed in weightier matters. We go right on through fog and rain, sunshine and wind, unheeding, except for the most commonplace "how do you do?" greetings with our acquaintances, but as for being concerned for the weather we are so very little.

And yet there are those who almost make their lives bitter over the weather, and the lives of others about them, too. A threatened sprinkle will keep them from the house of worship if not from the theatre. They are always in a quandary between umbrella and parasol, overshoes and Oxford ties, between carrying an overcoat or not carrying one. The first thing they look at in the morning paper is the weather forecast, and, if it does not come true, they carry a grouse against the signal service all day. Isn't this enough of a troublesome world without that?

But, per contra, how many of us can put in a whole day consciously enjoying fine weather? It is as much the part of unwisdom to be oblivious of an opportunity to enjoy a good thing all day as it is not to be oblivious of an opportunity to make oneself, and those about him, unnecessarily miserable. Obliviousness to discomfort, insensibility to pain, these are not happiness. They are small fractions of death, just as sleep is a partial and death a total unconsciousness. The oblivious person is half-brother to the dead log, or old, rotting stump in the fence corner.

There are not too many sources of happiness in this world if we lay hold of all of them and convert them to our use, doing it consciously and forming the habit of doing it, so that, if the occasion warrants, we may enjoy a fine day all day, and not miss a note of the meadowlark's song or so much as a cloud shadow skimming over field or stream.

After hearing the chance remark of the grandfather to the slip of a girl by his side the writer undertook to read the character and life history writ in his face, as best he might, looking at him narrowly out of the corners of his eyes. His circumstances must always have been moderate, yet prudent and not unthrifty in a small way, but there was benevolence treasured there and great kindness. One would have said of him that he lacked, not industry, but push, the power to drive. He had conquered difficulties by slow siege, not by storming the heights and carrying everything before him by an energized process. The great tragedies, the loss of wife and child, had cut deep, but he had learned to be indifferent to the little ills without being indifferent to the smaller sources of joy. The consummation of it all was a serene, intelligent old face as good to look upon as the surface of a quiet pool along the lower reaches of some stream. In his three-score years and more he had weathered his share of sorrows and drunk abundantly of the un-intoxicating cup of joy, but of gall and worm-wood, for which so many form an appetite, he had sipped sparingly.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

To Minimize Railroad Accidents.

It is reported that the Pennsylvania Railroad company will practically test an invention of Leon A. Mullen which, it is claimed, will, to a considerable extent, do away with railroad accidents. Mullen's device may be said practically to consist of a moving block system which is applicable wherever a train may chance to be. By a system of relays, magnets and batteries, it connects the forward wheels of an engine with every rail within a distance of two miles before and behind. Should a rail be broken, or should another engine come on the track within that distance, the whistles of one or both engines at once are blown, red and green lights are flashed in the engine cabs, and the brakes are automatically set. Telephone connections also are provided, so that when the engines have come to a stop the engineers (in case of threatened collision) may converse concerning the best method for remedying the situation. The device can be as readily applied to electric as to steam roads. If the result of its test is favorable, it is understood that it will be adopted first on the Pennsylvania lines and, presumably, later on those of other companies.

How Some of the Other Half Live.

Again is the aphorism that one-half of the world does not know how the other half lives illustrated by facts ascertained by the Consumers' League of New York city. The facts apply to the making of those articles of dress which put the finishing touches on the costumes of milord and milady, and here, in all their bare hideousness, they are: For the construction of artificial roses which madam wears on her hat or elsewhere the maker is paid one cent for twelve bunches, and if she is rapid she can make sixty cents a day, or $3.60 a week. The rose-maker, however, is well paid as compared with others. For instance, less is paid for the making of artificial violets, and it was shown that a mother and her four children, ranging from five to twelve years of age, could make but sixty cents a day by the work of all five of them. For men's neckties which are sold from fifty cents to a dollar each the makers are paid fifty-five cents a dozen, and the makers of women's black stock collars receive but eighteen cents a dozen. These are but a few illustrations of this variety of "man's inhumanity to man," (women and little children) but they should suffice to make the heart weary.

"With fingers weary and worn,

With eyelids heavy and red,

A woman sat in unwomanly rags,

Plying the needle and thread."

Times have not changed greatly since the days of Thomas Hood, not so greatly as one with more than an apology for a soul must wish.

Consumption on the Decrease.

Professor Fraenkel, a German specialist who is a recognized authority, publishes a hopeful prophecy concerning consumption in the current number of the Umschau. He says, in effect, that within forty years "the great white plague" will have become a disease of comparatively trivial importance, as it is rapidly yielding to professional knowledge concerning how to treat it effectively. He bases his forecast on Prussian statistics, but, as the causes which operate to decrease the disease in Prussia apply in all civilized countries, the statistics may be considered fairly representative of the universal tendency. Prior to 1886 thirty-two persons of every 10,000 living in Prussia died of consumption. Then came knowledge of how the disease should be treated, and by 1900 the number of such deaths was but twenty-one in 10,000, while in 1908 the number had been further reduced to 16.4 in 10,000. Whether or not these figures justify Professor Fraenkel's hopeful view of forty years hence some may question, but, however that may be, there can be no doubt that they are decidedly encouraging.

What Four Boys Did With Corn.

Four boys, living respectively in Arkansas, Mississippi, South Carolina and Virginia, soon will take a trip to Washington, D. C., under peculiarly pleasant circumstances. Under the direction of the national Department of Agriculture, more than 12,000 Southern boys last year cultivated an acre of corn each, the idea being to demonstrate what right farming would do. Citizens of the states in which the boys lived took an interest in the experiment, and offered to pay the expenses of a trip to Washington to the boy in each state who should raise the most corn on his acre. The South Carolina winner raised 152½ bushels, the Mississippi winner 147 bushels, the Arkansas winner 135, and the boy winner of Virginia 122 bushels. The average amount raised by each of the 12,000 boys was sixty bushels. Now bear in mind that the average yield of corn to the acre throughout the country is hardly more than twenty-five bushels to the acre, and it will be realized what right farming means. The instructions given these boys by the Department of Agriculture are open to every farmer in the land, and the department claims that if farmers would avail themselves of them the acreage yield might be doubled, a claim which the result of the boys' experiment appears to justify.

Labor a Cheap Commodity in China.

There are no horses in the southern part of China—men are cheaper. Exactly how cheap men are there may be judged from the following list of wages paid to laborers of various vocations, the sum named being in each instance for a month's work: Machinists, $13.50; blacksmiths, $12.50; cigarmakers, $12; bakers, $12; carpenters, $10; bricklayers, $9.50; stonecutters, $9.50; shoemakers, $7; tanners, $5.50; sewing-machine operators, $4.75. In the light of these figures it will not be difficult to realize how large a dollar a day must have looked to the "heathen Chinese" when first he struck these shores, and, in the light of these figures again, it should be fairly easy to understand why Pacific Coast Caucasians have not held the yellow addition to their population to be desirable. Ten-dollar-a-month residents are not valuable, whether they come from Europe, Asia, Africa, or the isles of the wide seas.

How Italy Helped Messina.

On January 12, 1909, the Italian parliament set aside $6,000,000 for the relief of the sufferers from the great earthquake which destroyed Messina and neighboring cities. This sum was placed in official hands, and, with the exception of $100,000, it has been wholly distributed. Now note how the sufferers have been "relieved." For repairing or reconstructing government buildings $3,000,000 was expended; for rebuilding barracks used by the army, navy and police, $600,000; for traveling expenses, remuneration of officials for extra work, etc., $600,000; for reorganizing the police service, $500,000; for reorganizing the postal telegraph and customs service, $200,000; for replacing army and navy equipments and stores, $1,000,000. Some fraction of this latter sum was expended for provisions distributed, but with this exception not one cent of these millions was spent for the direct relief of the stricken people; there was nothing for clothing and nothing for shelter. So much for charity of the official type. There has been much complaint in Italy concerning the distribution of this fund, and such a presentation of facts as the foregoing sufficiently accounts for it.

Another Gramme of Radium Produced.

For the second time since the discovery of radium in 1898 it is announced that a gramme (about one twenty-eighth of an ounce) of the wonderful metal has been produced at Joachimsthal, Bohemia, and is now for sale. The value of this tiny mite is assessed by the Austrian government, for taxation purposes, at about $83,000.

Versatile Bankers.

Ernst von Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, who died recently, retired from the management of the world famous banking business two years ago and since then the conduct of its affairs has been in the hands of four partners, Franz and Robert von Mendelssohn. Paul von Mendelssohn-Bartholdy and Arthur Fischel. The financial interest of the deceased falls to his eldest son, Paul von Mendelssohn-Bartholdy. An interesting feature of the bank's ownership is that the Mendelssohns have always been and are to the present day noted for their personal devotion to and encouragement of the fine arts. Joseph, the son of the founder, Moses Mendelssohn, is still known for his translation of Dante, while Felix, the son of the same Joseph, won immortality as a composer.

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES.

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHELF.

Old English Ballads.

These ballads are most distinctively "the songs of the people." They began as bits of verse rudely composed by forgotten authors to commemorate some piece of local history or some tragic story that had fired the imaginations of the neighborhood. In time, these stories become traditions; the characters and incidents were idealized; later verses were added and the old verses refined; the words were sung to familiar, indigenous tunes. The words were simply handed down from generation to generation by word of mouth. Only occasionally some clerkly hand set them down upon paper. Percy collected many of the best of them, and gave them a literary vogue. Scott collected others, and based many of his poems upon them. They are now an important and imperishable part of our literature.

They also performed a notable service. They are the origin of a national popular metre and style for certain types of poetic subjects. They are truly representative of a national poetic spirit, far more truly than the works of any individual poet. And they have been the inspiration of such masterpieces as "The Ancient Mariner," in which Coleridge not only caught the spirit of the verse, but used it upon a subject peculiarly in tune with the native type of ballad poetry.

But of the ballads themselves. The merry adventures of Robin Hood, the haunting story of Margaret, the tale of the Nut Brown Maid, the miniature epics of dragons and St. Georges, of witches and lovers and heroes and faithful maidens and disconsolate queens—these and a dozen other true reflections of the red blooded life of early England are contrasted with the sombre background of hardship, danger, and gloomy characters of the old country. The ballads are stirring poetry and historical documents as well.

A LETTER FROM JENNER.

The following extract is from an original letter of Dr. Edward Jenner, the discoverer of vaccine. The letter is owned in San Francisco. It is dated November 22, 1806, and was addressed to the Rev. M. Dibden, Kensington:

"I have just received from Madrid the most interesting document that has ever reached me on the vaccine subject. It comes in the form of 'Supplemento a La Gazette De Madrid' and gives a detailed account of an expedition fitted out by order of his Catholic Majesty for the sole purpose of propagating the vaccine in all his foreign possessions, and many other parts of the world. The expedition sailed in 1802 and returned in 1806. I will send you a copy of the Gazette and a translation. I don't imagine the annals of history furnish an example of philanthropy so noble, so extensive as this."

SONGS FOR CHILDREN.

Two books of charming songs for children have just come to hand. They are "Merry Time Songs for Children" and "Songs of Sunland." The music for both is written by Charles H. McCurrie, of Alameda; the words of the former by various authors, and of the latter by Charles Keeler, the well-known writer of Berkeley. Of the music we are not competent to speak, but Madame Emma Eames has vouched for it as "quite charming." The words are in the best strain of childhood verse, spirited, whimsical and joyous. (Alameda Musical Co., 50 cents apiece, postpaid.)

A BLIND LITTERATEUR.

Miss Theodora J. Franksen of Chicago, who has been totally blind since she was eight years old, has been elected to the Phi Beta Kappa society in the University of Chicago. This is an honor conferred for high scholarship. The title of associate in literature was awarded Miss Franksen at the same time. Since entering the university, three years ago, Miss Franksen has won a scholarship each year. So far as is known she is the first blind girl to be elected to Phi Beta Kappa.

ABOUT PEOPLE.

The German music world is interested in the announcement that Karl Jorn, the celebrated tenor at the Royal Opera in Berlin, has decided to emulate the example of Mme. Schumann-Heink and become an American citizen.

Lord Rosebery is writing his autobiography. There is small reason to doubt that he will live to finish the book, and that it will fortunately forestall any "authoritative" biography which might otherwise be compiled after his death from documents and letters, in which his actions and policies might be misinterpreted for political, social, or family reasons.

J. C. Nicoll, one of the elder artists, whose sea paintings especially have won him repute, was honored by a dinner at the Century Club in New York recently, in recognition of the recent exhibition of his work in Mexico and California. He deserves honor for his faithful adherence to well-proved methods, justified by truth of color and expression of Nature.

Mrs. Josephine L. Newcomb of New Orleans is said to have given a larger amount to educational charity during the last twelve months than any other woman in this country. She bequeathed $1,500,000 to the Sophie Memorial School of New Orleans. She had previously given $1,000,000 to the school, which is a memorial to her daughter, who died at the age of fifteen.

Miss Helen Gould last year gave $150,000 to the Girls College in Constantinople. Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt gave $1,000,000 for sanitary tenements, and is supposed to have given half a million to a home for cripples at Chappaqua, N. Y. Mrs. Russell Sage gave $2,500,000 to schools and colleges, $300,000 for the relief of aged women and $180,000 for an industrial home at Lawrence, L. I.

A cataract is rapidly forming on the remaining eye of General Booth, the head of the Salvation Army. An operation is inevitable. In the meanwhile he is busy addressing meetings, controlling the Army and dictating correspondence. General Booth is eighty years old. His eyes have been of wonderful service to him as well as his other senses. He is already enrolled in the catalogue of remarkable men of the Christian era.

Governor Sloan of Arizona, after an exciting contest, has appointed Miss Sharlot M. Hall territorial historian. The office is of great importance to the future because now the records of a state in making as well as the data of a passing race—the Indian—will be kept by her. Miss Hall was born in Lincoln county, Kansas, in 1870, when the old Santa Fe trail was a reality and the aborigines still ranged the prairies of her own state. She moved with her family to Arizona when very young and the method of travel was a prairie schooner.

Californian Poets' Corner

A RHYME OF LOVE.

By Charles Warren Stoddard.

If life be as a flame that death doth kill;
Burn little candle lit for me,
With a pure spark that I may rightly see
To word my song and utterly
God's plan fulfill

If life be as a flower that blooms and dies;
Forbid the cunning frost that slays
With Judas-kiss and trusting love betrays:
Forever may my song of praise
Untainted rise.

If life be as a voyage, or foul, or fair;
O! bid me not my banners furl
For adverse gale, or wave in angry whirl,
Till I have found the gates of pearl
And anchored there.

OF "DIFFICULT" BOOKS.

No man has an idea clearly in his own mind who cannot express it clearly in simple language. Vague writing and "difficult" reading are positive signs of a preliminary obscurity of thought. This is the reason why so many books that have excited devotees amongst small cliques during the author's lifetime gradually lose their appeal and sink surely to oblivion.

The old plea that the author is "profound" and hence unintelligible to the ordinary intellect is nonsense. This defense of some of Browning's more difficult poems was formerly made by fanatical admirers, but the wind was all taken out of it by Browning's admission in later life that he himself had forgotten what he meant by certain passages and, further, that he could not decipher them when he re-read them. The trouble with these passages is that Browning, when he wrote them, was not possessed at the moment by an idea but by an emotion, and he attempted the dangerous feat of translating a mood into words, instead of into its proper medium of expression, which is music. A corroboration of this view is the permanence and the growing popularity of those poems which Browning wrote under the compulsion of clear ideas, and in which he obeyed Milton's famous warning that poetry should be "simple, sensuous and passionate."

Of course there are two kinds of writing, though I believe the dictum pronounced in the first sentence of this essay holds true for both. The one kind of writing is that which attempts merely to convey ideas, as historical treatises, essays, and the like. Obviously, where the sole purpose is to transmit ideas, the idea itself must be clear and positive. Perhaps the best examples of this style are Bacon's Essays and Macaulay's works. Their clarity of ideas induced clarity and vigor of expression.

But the other kind of writing is that which seeks to produce an emotional effect. This includes all imaginative literature—fiction, drama, and poetry—and is by far the more difficult. To evoke laughter or tears, fear or horror, by printed words, is a task calling for a supreme skill. The example of genius proves that such emotional effects are not produced by mere arrangements of emotional words, but by artful associations of ideas and word pictures whose relative arrangements react subtly upon the human mind and heart to produce the effect desired by the author. To know just how long the spectator at the theatre can endure the heart-rending sleep-walk of Lady Macbeth, before the saving numbness of all emotion is evoked by Nature, is as certainly a function of a clear head as it is a function of a sensitive heart.

Furthermore, the great geniuses have realized that even in emotions mankind demands that a reason shall exist for the emotion, and the consciousness of a reason for a thing implies the prior existence of an intelligent idea. And the more profound the idea the more lasting the effect, and the longer the time through which the public will desire to return to the idea and submit to the emotional reaction. And, most important discovery of all, the more profound the idea the more surprisingly simple it is. It is the intrinsic worth of the idea that counts; not the complicated and difficult expression of it. Shakespeare is the profoundest thinker of all literature; he is also the simplest and most lucid in expression.

So we believe that it is a genuine fault of a book that it is hard to understand; that this fact alone is proof that the author himself does not understand his subject, and that the public is wise to ignore those who write vaguely, however, as they may claim, "profoundly." Which is, perhaps, superfluous to say, for this is exactly what the public does, anyway.

Miss Ethel Wood has been appointed instructor in the art of story telling by the Massachusetts State Board of Education. Miss Wood is a teacher in Brookline.

TELEGRAPH HILL NEIGHBORHOOD

INTERESTING SETTLEMENT WORK OF MISS GRIFFITHS AND MISS ASHE.

The Telegraph Hill Neighborhood Association is one of the oldest and one of the most interesting "settlements" in San Francisco. It is located on Stockton street, just north of Filbert, and at the western base of Telegraph Hill, in the heart of the Italian quarter. It is managed by two women, Miss Alice Griffiths and Miss Elizabeth Ashe, who first began to work in the quarter twenty years ago with a Saturday morning kindergarten class for the smaller children. The work has grown until now it requires a large building, and its usefulness and influence have extended until it touches constantly the lives of three hundred children and their parents, and requires all the time of both the managers.

But before going farther, the meaning of the word "settlement" should be made clear, and to do this, several common misapprehensions of it should be cleared away. A settlement is emphatically not a center for the distribution of charity. Neither is a settlement primarily a nucleus for the formation of "clubs" of various kinds. Nor is it a substitute for the public playground.

According to Miss Ashe, a settlement is, essentially, a means for arriving at a better understanding between two classes of people who, for all sorts of reasons, rarely get to know each other well enough to understand each other's ideas and modes of life, and then, through this improved relation and new sympathy, to be of service to both classes. The settlement is thus a sort of interpreter of one class to the other.

The Italians of San Francisco need such an interpreter to the Americans. In the first place, Americans have many wrong ideas about the Italians, gathered from books written by Americans traveling in Italy and from newspaper reports of the doings of the class of Italians most hated by Italians themselves. These ideas are the harder to eradicate because the Italians like to live in a quarter of town where their own language is spoken and where they feel at home. The younger generation of Italians soon gets a sympathetic point of view toward Americans and American ways at the public schools, but the older folks frequently have no means of acquiring this understanding, and often they resent the Americanization of their children. Thus a settlement has a large field of usefulness in getting acquainted with the Italians and with their point of view, and in then using this knowledge and influence to help both Italians and Americans toward a friendly mutual understanding.

A curious fallacy in the mind of Americans regarding Italians is frequently encountered by the settlement workers. This fallacy is the notion that Italians are lazy. The answer is that perhaps in Naples, under an enervating climate and under industrial conditions that offer small rewards for effort, the Neapolitan is lazy, but that this is evidently not his fault, because the moment he is transplanted to Telegraph Hill, where the settlement workers know him, he becomes one of the most industrious and thrifty and intelligent of workers. A striking proof of this statement is the fact that the Italian quarter of San Francisco was the first part of the burnt district to be rebuilt after the fire of 1906, and it was rebuilt with the savings of thrifty Italians.

To dispel such illusions as these on the part of the Americans, and to overcome Italian prejudice against American customs, is one of the most important functions of the settlement. To have the power to do this means that the workers must know exactly how both peoples live. Miss Griffiths and Miss Ashe, being natives of San Francisco, of course knew the American side of the question. To learn the Italian side they proceeded to acquire the knowledge in the same way they had acquired the first, by living amongst the Italians as they had lived amongst Americans. So the home of the Telegraph Hill Neighborhood Association is their home, literally, by day and by night.

To become better acquainted, they found it necessary to be of service—necessary as well as their intention and desire—to their neighbors. The most intimate service is that in sickness. Miss Ashe went to New York and graduated there as a trained nurse in the Presbyterian Hospital. Returning here, she began to give her professional services to her neighbors. This was appreciated and was repaid by friendship and those confidences that reveal the inner life and state of mind of people. She and Miss Griffiths became genuine citizens of their neighborhood, taken into its social life, appealed to for advice and looked to for influence with Americans where that was needed.

And, in their daily comings and goings, the life of their neighbors was revealed to them. They learned, for instance, what a casual visitor to the neighborhood would never discover, that of two boys, one of whom sells chewing gum at the ferry building and the other of whom sells matches on Montgomery street, one is the son of a rich Italian speculator in real estate, while the other is the sole support of a widowed and invalid mother. Such knowledge as this makes a vast difference when one is trying to be of use, and of use especially to those who need friendly offices.

Furthermore, they learned that a great deal of the unhappiness in the quarter is due to the fact that hundreds of the children are allowed to crowd the cheap nickelodeons at all hours of the night—a fact they would never have discovered had they been merely day visitors to the quarter as they were when they first began.

These are merely examples of the facts about their neighbors that they know now and that are of value in their life of service. This service itself is the important thing.

First in this service is the nursing. They have gone into hundreds of homes, where they have brought the healing efficiency of modern methods of nursing. More valuable still, they have brought the touch of human sympathy that is the greatest need of a sick room; and, no less important, they have brought the service of strong arms and skilled hands to the mere physical drudgery of household work, and, by taking upon themselves this burden during the period of helplessness, have relieved the patients of the most urgent practical problem of illness. They have cared for the children, cleaned house, and done the cooking, when these things meant the continuance of the household functions.

This offered a further opportunity for service. A woman who has experienced the alleviating power of skilful nursing is a ready pupil when told by the same nurse of the value of simple rules of hygiene. She is more ready to take the nurse's word for it that too much wine of the new vintage is what causes the sores on the children's heads every autumn, and to believe that she should promptly report contagious diseases and submit gladly to quarantine. In these and other things the nurse leaves behind a new sense of the sanitary science that is doing so much to improve city conditions.

Incidentally, and largely as an afterthought, have come those activities which the public hastily conceives to be the main purpose of the settlement, the clubs and classes. The boys who wanted to start a band quite naturally applied to the settlement for advice. This led as naturally to an invitation to use the settlement as a meeting place. And out of suggestions given by the workers the boys have organized a really excellent band, have become so proficient that they are frequently employed, and have earned the money to buy natty uniforms and to hire an instructor to help them perfect their musical ability.

In a similar way, the friendly interest of the workers in the boys' amusements led them to provide opportunities for team play, and this grew until a gymnasium seemed necessary and was provided. Here the boys practice handball and gymnastic exercises and from this pass on to baseball and other sports. The whole thing is a natural growth out of the mutual liking of the boys and the workers.

The girls, also, have found the settlement a pleasant place of rendezvous, and similar friendly interest has been taken in them. When there seemed to be a demand for it, the workers opened a sewing room and started classes, under competent instruction, in housework. The room for this purpose is also open to them for the quieter games they prefer. Some of the children, who have showed signs of manual skill and a desire to develop it, are instructed in wood-carving and the making of brushes.

All of these are things that are done, on a smaller scale and without organization, by friends of children in any neighborhood. To have the time and the financial backing to do them on a large scale is the privilege of the workers in the settlement, and to do them amongst a foreign people is simply to add an additional useful function, that of interpreter of one type of mind and customs to another type.

The medical services performed by the workers have two additional phases. The settlement maintains a free dispensary and clinic, where medicines are distributed and where any child or adult of the quarter may come for medical examination and advice. The best specialists of the city are at the disposal of the settlement, and they have added to the growing sympathy of the people the gratitude of the quarter for their expert services. The settlement also maintains a farm in Marin county, to which the workers send women who have been ill or run down, to recuperate and rest. Here, also, in the summer, go boys and girls from the quarter, to enjoy a country outing, many of them to see the country for the first time. The boys pay for their fun by working on the farm three hours a day, which they enjoy nearly as much as their soldier camp and other amusements.

But the best result of the work of the settlement is the acquaintance of the Italians with Americans of the better type, in whom they learn to recognize friends and neighbors who live much as they do and think much as they do, whom they respect and understand. From this the ascent is easy to a conception of all Americans as such neighbors and friends. This view-point once attained, they feel at home here as parts of the whole life of their adopted country.

SHEAR WIT.

T. P. O'Connor, the witty Irish parliamentarian, discussed at a dinner in New York the bull, says the Washington Star. "The bull," said he, "isn't confined to Ireland. It was an Englishman, you know—an English judge—who, being told by a tramp that he was unmarried, replied: 'Well, that's a good thing for your wife.' And it was a French soldier who, sleeping in his tent with a stone jar for a pillow, replied on being asked if the jar wasn't hard: 'Oh, no, I've stuffed it, you see, with hay.' And it was an American politician in New York, who cried the other night from the tailboard of a dray: 'If we remain silent the people will not hear our heartrending cries!'"

"One of the funniest patients I ever had," declared a dentist, "was a man who came into my Broad street office some weeks ago. He was just from the farm. His boots were muddy and his hair unkempt. 'I want this blam-ed tooth pulled,' he said, pointing to his swollen jaw. He sat in the chair. I got my forceps and he opened his mouth. I was trying to locate the tooth, when his jaws closed so suddenly I thought he would bite my finger. 'Say, doc,' he said, 'pull it a little bit, then twist it. It's been worrying me for the last week, and I want to get even.'"—Newark Star.

A bigamist married and one of the witnesses afterward admitted to the officiating clergyman that he had known of the bridegroom's legal inability to wed. "But if you knew," said the clergyman indignantly, "why didn't you tell me?" "Well, parson, it was like this," the witness said. "One of the parties was 83 and the other was 87. I says to myself, 'Oh, gosh, it can't last long. Let 'm marry and durn the law!'"—Washington Star.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

McCarthy Has His Ax.

What means this low moan from the officers' deck?

McCarthy has his ax.

The heads lying round that are minus a neck?

McCarthy has his ax.

For a voice has gone out from the councils of state,

"Bring me an assortment of heads on a plate."

Wirrool! but I tell you our mayor is great!

McCarthy has his ax.

The Golden Gate opens on spaces profound—

McCarthy has his ax—

But it's clogged with the occiputs floating around.

McCarthy has his ax.

And the voices of wailing are heard o'er each head

As he swishes it off with a "Now you are dead!"

But the ghosts may come back just to haunt, it is said,

McCarthy and his ax.

The Illumination of Cahill's Phiz.

It is with peculiar regret that I note that some of our state exchanges are inclined to cast contumely upon the likeness of our "Candid Friend," Mr. Edward F. Cahill, which illuminates a page of the Sunday Call even as the sun casts its glorifying rays upon a world which otherwise had been lost in gloom. The injustice, and even cruelty, of such an attitude pains me; not that Mr. Cahill ever has been selected as a winner in a beauty contest—and I even fear that he never will be—but "handsome is that handsome does," and my estimable friend does remarkably handsomely. Why, to preach the gospel of truth in his department while Mr. Van Smith preaches the—the—well, preaches in another department of the same paper, is in itself such an act of heroism as to be something more and better than handsome.

Moreover, there is no law compelling a man to be both beautiful and candid. As I understand it, Mr. Cahill was given his choice, and he decided to be candid—very candid. Withal, I desire respectfully to call attention to the fact that the Call's press apparently still is in good working order; not that this is an important circumstance, but it probably is worthy of some thoughtful consideration.

As Mr. Cahill doubtless would feel that I had shirked my duty as a rhymist if I omitted a metrical conclusion, I merely add:

E'en as the orb of light illumines the day,

The sons of men to serve,

So Cahill's face—the rest I cannot say;

I find I lack the nerve.

Vale, Gillett.

Governor Gillett has announced that he will not be a candidate for reelection, and at the same time he says, in effect, that he is grateful to everybody.

You need not be, Gillett. Keep all your thanks

For Herrin, Ruef and their law-breaking crews

Who doped the crowd with od'rous schemes and pranks,

And made the welkin smell at Santa Cruz. Some eighty thousand men, both stanch and true

Republicans, unfearing Herrin's fang. Gagged at the dose and would not swallow you—

Give all your gratitude unto "the gang."

No thanks for loyal men. They wish them not

From any creature of the foul "machine;" They hold that Santa Cruz convention blot

On all that lies our mountain walls between.

Give thanks to those who placed you it befel. Schmitz, Herrin, Parker, Ruef, that tricky lot.

But not to those who love their country well. For they, as patriots, desire them not.

I understand that Rockefeller an' Morgan are considerin' writin' a book together that 'll be called, The Scripchers Revised, or, How to Serve Both God an' Mammon with Glitterin' Success.

Uncle Eli Starkweather used to say in experyence meetin' that he wanted to go an' rest on Abraham's bosom, but when he was took reel sick he give a sigh an' said that, on the hull, he b'lieved he'd prefer to have Abraham's bosom brought to him.

Like es not E. H. Harriman still is standin' jest outside the pearly gate an' tryin' to explain to Peter 'bout the workin' of his political "machine" in Californy an' other states.

This is the greatest of all ages, but if you want to find out what your reel size is jest ask yourself what you had to do with makin' it so.

Paulhan's Flight.

All the winds were wild in their fretful spite,

And the clouds shed tears of pain,

And an old man said, as he shook his head,

"He never will fly again

If he rides to-day, for the mad gods play

With elements massed on high."

(Oh, a bird looked out from its hiding place,

Nor once it essayed to fly.)

Now the bird man makes is a fragile thing.

For slight is the builder's skill

Compared with the might of the great white

God,

Who buildeth as He may will;

'Tis a fragile thing—but look, ay, look!

Add wonder to awed surprise,

For man, long bound to the sodden ground,

Outreaches his wings, and flies!

A miracle this that has found its birth

In the mind of the pigmy, man.

(How it tosses and swirls as the Storm King

hurls

Against it his hostile clan!)

Oh, man has been monarch of land and sea,

And long is his record there,

But we onward swing, and, lo, he is king

Of the limitless realm of the air!

And this from the cave-man who gnawed his bone

In fear of the lurking beast!

This from the savage whose days were sown

With perils the night increased!

He has crept, he has leapt, till he makes his own

Both earth and the dome of skies,

And the gods look down from their far-off

town,

And mutter, "At last he flies!"

Had Enough of It at Home.

The Mind-Reader—Did you sell that man a ticket to my entertainment?

"Nope."

"Why not?"

"He said he was married."

The Contempt of the Retailer.

"'Twould be comparatively easy to endure the high prices of everything," said the Two-Ply Philosopher, "if it were not for the contempt some retailers lavish upon their necessarily economical customers. That is the thing that rankles.

"The children insist upon getting hungry, and, heeding this fact and also the condition of your exchequer, you stroll into the meat-market.

"What's the price of your porterhouse?" you inquire of the artist behind the counter.

"Twenty-five cents a pound," says he.

"Of your sirloin?"

"Twenty cents."

"Well," says you, "give me ten cents' worth of lower round and see that it's cut thin."

"He cuts it as he pleases, and as you depart you feel yourself diminishing beneath the scornful eye of him.

"How much are eggs?" says you to the grocer.

"Forty-five cents a dozen."

"Well," says you, "I—I'll take one."

"One dozen?"

"No, one egg."

"You go out the door because you cannot find a knothole nearer."

"How much is that suit of clothes?" you say to the merchant.

"Twenty-five dollars."

"No, I meant the one next to it."

"Thirty-two dollars."

"Well, the one I meant is—is—I don't know where it is, but it is fifteen dollars."

"Neither do I know," says the merchant. "They're out of style," says he, "and have been ever since the Trust took charge. What you're hunting for," he continues, "is a second-hand clothing emporium run by your Uncle Ike."

"As you fade through the open doorway you imagine you hear a rude guffaw, but you don't linger to hunt for the joke although the flame on your cheeks would serve for a light.

"That's the way 'tis with some of the men dealers. As for tackling a woman clerk, you don't do it, for you realize that her haughty disdain would blight you forever. And so the tragedy is continued from day to day. Everything except your salary has gone up, but you could endure the rigid economy in your home, could steel your heart to the appealing looks of your children when they pass a candy store, were it not for the vials and hogsheads of contempt that some of the retailers, or their eight-dollar clerks, carry as a part of the stock in trade. That rankles and rankles. Isn't it so?"

"Don't ask me," said I, and each of us tried to conceal the tear that we brushed away.

A Fable With a Suppressed Moral.

A certain Donkey, in the course of its travels, came upon an unoccupied Lion's cage, and, entering it, was highly pleased and elated.

"Now," said he, as he strutted proudly within the cage, "I need but roar loudly and frequently, and people will take me for the King of Beasts, and they will come from far and near to admire me and to give me their plaudits."

So he roared, after the manner of donkeys, frequently, and his heehaw was heard both by day and by night.

"I am deceiving the people," he said to himself, "and there is no doubt that the people will flock to see and admire me."

But the more the Donkey roared (i. e. brayed) the more did the people question one another: "How under the sun did that jack-ass get in the lion's cage?"

Moral:—(Because of regard for the office of Mayor of San Francisco, I have deemed it advisable to suppress the moral.)

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Editors, The California Weekly,

San Francisco, Cal.

Gentlemen:—As a subscriber to your paper and an American citizen, I wish to protest against the following language, appearing in your issue of January 21st, first column, at top of column, page 131, and a part of an editorial under the caption "Let the People Guess Again": "Our government is founded, not upon the rights of men or of cities or of states, but upon the security of property and the inviolability of vested pecuniary interests." If your periodical stands for that sort of stuff which is really the rankest kind of "Cannonism" many Californians have been wholly mistaken as to your position in current journalism.

Very truly yours,

WM. M. BELL.

Los Angeles, Cal., Jan. 28, 1910.

In the editorial in question we stated the fact bluntly just as it exists and, perhaps carelessly, left it to the context, and what has been said a hundred times in the paper during the last year, to make it clear to the reader that we do not believe in putting property first and humanity afterward. If Bishop Bell did not so interpret what was said other readers may also have gotten a wrong impression from the clause under condemnation.

The Declaration of Independence abounds in elevating statements concerning the Rights of Man, but the constitution of the United States does not. The constitution made the inviolability of property the foundation of the nation. The superstructure erected thereon since then strengthened property in the seat of power in every way possible. The senate is, and was intended to be, the citadel of property interests and the supreme court has become a stronghold to the same effect. Property rules. It was formerly individual property that ruled. Now it is property centralized in the vastest aggregations the world has ever known. We warned San Francisco that when it went to Washington to plead for the right of the people around this bay to have access to the life-giving flood of the Tuolumne it would be confronted with this question: "What do you propose to do with the invested millions of Spring Valley?" On the answer to that question will depend the fate of the Tuolumne water proposition, because "Our government is founded, not upon the rights of men, or of cities or of states, but upon the security of property and the inviolability of vested pecuniary interests." They will find that it is so.

But unless we mistake the temper of the movement now working in the national mind and conscience that movement will not rest until it has placed the Rights of Man, the well-being of humanity, above and beyond mere property interests. "Cannonism" is still in power, but the public mind is less pleased with it than it has been wont to be, and the consciousness that there are higher interests than those of wealth, even vested wealth, is gaining ground and, in attaining the universality of that consciousness, The California Weekly hopes to do its part.

Do we make ourselves perfectly clear, Bishop Bell?

Editor of The California Weekly.

Dear Sir:—I have just read your pamphlet on the Causes of Municipal Corruption in San Francisco. It is a remarkable document. It discloses a diseased condition of an American municipality that may well set a serious citizen of our republic to thinking. If the disease were merely a local malady I would not be justified, possibly, in taking such an interest in the case, but I fear the investigations in San Francisco have revealed the same hideous social disorder which has been dragged into public view in a score of other cities within recent years.

I read a borrowed copy of the report. I want one of my own and a number for my class in Municipal Government. Kindly send me ten copies with a bill for the same.

Respectfully,

WILLIAM A. SCHAPES.

The University of Minnesota,
Minneapolis, Jan. 24, 1910.

The report of Mayor Taylor's committee on "The Causes of Municipal Corruption in San Francisco," deserves to be a textbook in every class in civil government in this country. It goes to the very marrow of the malady that affects the municipal life of democracy and overflows into rural life. We cannot maintain low civic standards in our cities and keep those standards high everywhere else. The California Weekly has this report in pamphlet form in good supply and will mail copies to any address on receipt of ten cents each. Some one with a few dimes to spare would be doing a good deed if he were to send a copy of that report to every instructor in civil government he knows of in this country. It might set the youth to thinking and except every son comes to be a better citizen than his father there is no progress in citizenship. Who wants to lend a hand along that line?

I look upon The California Weekly as a conservative defender of progressive principles, and I trust that 1910 will be a year of prosperity for "Our Best Weekly."

JAMES H. N. WILLIAMS.

Pacific Grove, California.

We think that the foregoing expresses the policy of The California Weekly rather better than we have ever been able to express it: "A conservative defender of progressive principles." And yet there are those who look upon us as being rabid. We are not. We are only in earnest.

The California Weekly is all right. Stay with 'em. That editorial "A Line On the President" was a center shot.

P. T. BOONE.

Lakeport, California.

We notice that an increasing number of conservative journals throughout the country now concede that President Taft has gone to the oligarchy for the legislation that he wants, in the belief that the oligarchy alone has power to legislate and that he can either persuade or maneuver that close corporation into giving him what he needs in order to redeem party pledges and save him from alienating from the party the Roosevelt following. We believe him mistaken in the temper of the oligarchy. It is adamant. It will yield nothing to its own hurt and nothing that does not hurt it will be worth having. The issue is "Bond or Free." There is no other. We are asking for no concessions. We want what we want by the grace of God, not that of Nelson A. Aldrich or Joseph G. Cannon.

I am in hearty sympathy with the trend of ideas you express in your paper. Keep a strong heart. You have right principles that will win out some day. This isn't such a "cussed" old world just as it is, but it can be made still better.

M. W. KAPP, M. D.

San Jose, California.

No, it isn't such a bad world, especially our part of it, for our part of the world is new. The time when broad acres were free to us all is in the memory of us all, and no country with free land for all can be resolved into a purse-proud plutocracy and a cringing, fawning, sycophantic proletariat. Without that recourse to free land such a resolving of human society as above outlined is inevitable, except manhood fight against it as it would fight for its hearthstone. The direction of least resistance heads toward hard bondage, ever has and ever will. The contrary direction is up stream all the time and hard pulling. That is the verdict of human history. The world will not stay as it is. It will be either getting better or getting worse every minute, dependent upon whether or not there are enough who fight for "right principles" and "keep a strong heart."

The California Weekly.

In your editorial entitled "The Real Work of the League" you hit the nail squarely on the head when you say "The Southern Pacific Political Bureau bases its political power wholly upon the spoils of office." Your diagnosis is unquestionably correct. Where you fail is in your remedy. There is a specific remedy for this patronage disease, which has been demonstrated to be effective but which you fail to mention. Moreover it is the only remedy which is effective.

Your prescription is an administration based upon higher grounds to be established by the Lincoln-Roosevelt League. I am an enthusiastic member of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League but unless I read history and human nature to no purpose, it will not remain indefinitely immune itself to the patronage disease when once the reins of government are in its hands. To strive for higher ideals and better men is all right, but to ignore the fact that success is the magnet that draws to a party the spoils seeking army is all wrong. To attempt to combat this disease by higher ideals and without the one specific remedy is like treating diphtheria with hygiene and neglecting antitoxin.

The antitoxin for the spoils system is the merit system, as exemplified in the civil service of the United

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Madam Gillett's Mind All Made Up At Last

The most important political event of the week, so far as surface indications go, was the announcement by Governor Gillett that he will not be a candidate for reelection. He gave it out some months ago that the whole matter was in the hands of Mrs. Gillett for determination and in effect that the public must await her leisurely processes of ratiocination. If the matter has in fact been left to this lady, and not to Mr. Herrin, for determination, the deliberateness with which she makes up her mind marks her as the Portia of her time. She reasons like a chief justice and hands down her decisions with an unhurried poise of mind that would do credit to a court of last resort. But the Governor likes his joke, even at the expense of his wife, and the public is not likely to attach too much importance to the part that Madam Gillett had in reaching a final conclusion. If, in fact, she put her foot down on the second term proposition it is probable that, woman like, she did it months ago and that the Fabian policy employed was not hers, but the Governor's or Mr. Herrin's.

The Program Will Be Passed Out Soon

It would also be an injustice to Governor Gillett not to suppose that he had long since made up his mind whether or not to make the race for governor a second time. The delay was strategic and not the result of mental incapacity, for, if the Governor is noted for any one thing above another, it is for not being a procrastinator. He makes his decisions "hot from the bat," so to speak. In what did that strategy consist? Two guesses should be enough for that. It was either to hold the fort until Charles F. Curry got his fences all up, or to hold the fort until William F. Herrin had perfected his plans for snatching the plum from under the Curry nose at the psychological moment. It may have been the one or it may have been the other reason, but one or other it is certain to have been. Mr. Curry is an organization man. Mr. Herrin is too sagacious not to know that the revolt against Southern Pacific domination of the Republican party in this state has cut too deep to make it easy to elect an organization Republican against a free Democrat, badly crippled though the Democratic party is. Mr. Herrin will not go before either the Republican voters or the Men of California as a whole on that issue if he can avoid it. His play naturally will be to find a Lincoln-Roosevelt candidate who does not half mean it, and who will not be unfriendly to Southern Pacific interests in the event of his election, in order that he may bind up the party's wounds and oppose an unbroken front to the cohorts of Democracy. Has Mr. Herrin found such a man? Or will he stand for Curry and fight it out on the line of the submerged vote in primary and general election? The Watchman does not yet know, but the program will probably be passed out soon.

Magnificent Magnanimity

Mayor McCarthy is nothing if not belligerent. Anyone can get a fight out of him at any time by treading on the tail of his coat, but, like many another warrior, he can, if the exigencies of politics require it, be magnanimous to an enemy and smother him all over with verbal treacle. Witness the following extract from the McCarthy address when the brotherhood of saloonkeepers of California tendered the Mayor of San Francisco a banquet, which occasion the Governor of California graced with his presence, when, by all that was of good report, he should have had urgent business either at Siskiyou or Tia Juana on that particular night, January 25, 1910. But here is what McCarthy said: "Labor would be untrue to itself if it did not indorse the administration of James N. Gillett as governor of this state. I would be unworthy of my position with labor if I did not lend my voice announcing labor's advocacy of Governor Gillett. Never has California had a governor that was freer from prejudice and passion than this man of whom I speak." Now the editor of the Fresno Republican has a retentive memory and keeps the files of his paper on tap. Consequently he was able to dig up the following pregnant utterances of candidate James N. Gillett, delivered at the Opera House, Fresno, October 26, 1906: "Bell, who accuses me of being controlled by bosses, was the very first man to fall down and grovel at the feet of the bosses of San Francisco. He has behind him the influence of San Francisco's bosses—an influence that I don't want. If Bell is elected governor of this state he will have to reward Parry, Tveitmoe and McCarthy for their services. God forbid that the time shall ever come when the state shall fall into the hands of men other than those who have the honor of their state at heart, and who will stand for honor. And I am sure that the people of this state will not vote to turn over their ship of state to these highbinders." What joy must have been in celestial regions, and what a sticky time of it here on earth, when McCarthy and the other "highbinders" forgave the Governor for that caustic utterance! Did politics ever make stranger bedfellows than these two "snoozers" at the banquet of the "boozers"?

JUDGE NATHANIEL P. CONREY.
Of Los Angeles.

The Penalty of Subserviency

There is no question that, prior to his attendance upon the saloonkeepers' banquet, Governor Gillett enjoyed a high degree of popularity among Republicans of the better sort in Southern California, but, according to The Watchman's advices from south of Tehachapi, that event about finished the governor down there. As one prominent Republican expressed it, "It was worse than the banquet at Santa Cruz." The governor knew that he was not to be a candidate for reelection and that he had no personal advantage to be gained that could compensate him for the personal humiliation endured, for James N. Gillett is, personally, a clean and high-minded gentleman. But he is an "organization" man and is beholden to the "organization" for having been made governor of California, and the McCarthy "push," and the saloon vote, are essential to "organization" success, in fact, they are its stock in trade, and so he had to do what was needful to be done in order to help hold the submerged fourth of California's voting constituency in line against the time when the head of the political bureau of the Southern Pacific company, the same bureau that made Gillett governor, shall pass the word down that line whom to stand for to be the next governor. It was the penalty of subserviency that caused the governor of California to grace that occasion with his presence, as well as to disgrace his presence with that occasion.

He May Now Throw Caution to the Winds

According to press reports John McNab, the thrilling young spellbinder from Mendocino, may now permit his name to be used in connection with the "organization" nomination for governor. So long as Governor Gillett was a possibility Johnny would not "allow" his name to be used in that connection. Time was when it was proper for John McNab to be careful how and when his name was permitted to be used, but since he came out squarely for the Herrin machine he may throw caution to the winds with a serene impunity. Nothing worse can happen to any young man of parts, and John McNab is such a man, than to be found yoked up with such a combination in restraint of free government as the political bureau of the Southern Pacific company. As well might one think of Tom Dozier in connection with the Republican nomination for governor.

Judge James Also Helped To Fine Harrison G. Otis

A fortnight ago The Watchman made allusion to the fact that Judge Wilbur, of Los Angeles, is the only judge who has had the nerve to inflict a fine upon Harrison G. Otis of the reprehensible Times. We are advised that Judge W. P. James also had a hand in that incident. He was then deputy district attorney and the grand jury was investigating the depositing of public moneys with certain banks without authority of law. The Times, in an editorial, advised the grand jury to let that matter alone inasmuch as the banks and officials were acting in good faith whether or not they were acting in accordance with the law. This looked to the then deputy district attorney like an attempt to influence the grand jury in contempt of court and he prepared two affidavits to that effect which jurors signed and swore to. General Otis was haled before Judge Wilbur and fined. Whoever does things to the Tyrant of the Times is not without favor in the eyes of the people of Southern California.

Another Man Talked of For Supreme Justice

Southern California has more than two Republican sticks of judicial timber fit for a place on the supreme bench of the state and one of these is Superior Judge Nathaniel P. Conrey, of the superior court of Los Angeles county. The photographer's and engraver's art enables our northern readers to get a glimpse of him in our Political Table Talk this week. On the 28th of December last Judge Conrey had served the people of Los Angeles county on the bench for nine years and he has five more years to serve unless promoted meantime either to the appellate or to the supreme bench. Judge Conrey was born in Franklin county, Indiana, June 30, 1860, was graduated from what is now DePaw university and took a law course in the University of Michigan. He came to California in 1884 and entered upon the practice of law, which he followed until elected to the superior bench in November, 1900, for a short term. He has been twice elected since. He spent one term in the state assembly, was city attorney of Pasadena for two years and served on the Board of Education in Los Angeles for two years. He has made good wherever tried and if things should so shape themselves as to make his candidacy for a place on the supreme bench expedient he will not be lacking in home support. He is thought extremely well of as judge, lawyer and man.

A State Controller Who Ought to Stay

One of the truest and bluest of true blue men in California is State Controller Alfred Bourne Nye, who has announced his desire to retain, by mandate of the people, the office he now holds by virtue of appointment by former Governor George C. Pardee. The predominating characteristics of Mr. Nye's character are sanity of judgment, clarity of vision and conscientiousness. He bristles with integrity. He can't say anything insincere even just for fun, and yet his sense of humor is acute and he remembers more really good, clean jokes (not off-color ones) than most men. To him a public office is an opportunity for public service and he has been known to refuse the better paying office for the poorer because the poorer gave him the better opportunity to render a real public service. The Watchman is not at liberty to tell how he knows this to be so, but he does know it. Mr. Nye was born in Stockton fifty-six years ago last October, of sterling New England stock, so he comes by the New England conscience by inheritance as well as by education, for he was reared in Massachusetts. He knows California by having lived here all of his adult life and being ever on the alert, as a newspaper man, to find out what is what. He made the Oakland Enquirer the most reliable newspaper in the state. He served as private secretary to Governor Pardee during his administration and has been State Controller ever since. He is an Emersonian ideal of a man, "Wise to know and bold to perform," and he ought to be governor. No man is better fitted for the job if he were once there, but, as State Controller, he can render a service equally valuable if less conspicuous. His nomination and election should be by acclamation.

How We Were Taken In On Treasurer Williams

The Watchman is free to confess that, four years ago, he was mightily taken in on State Treasurer W. R. Williams. It was this way. Fresno county had been anti-organization. All at once it went back on the Rowell tutelage and, for no visible advantage except the securing of the nomination of W. R. Williams for state treasurer, and the employment by Governor Gillett of little Mitchell as executive secretary, went into the "organization" camp at Santa Cruz. Inasmuch as it stood to lose a part of its county to Kings, as a part of the transaction, not known to it at the time, it was hard to see where Fresno had gained by its escapade. What, then, was The Watchman's astonishment to learn some months after the new administration had come in that State Treasurer Williams was not happy, that he did not like the bunch he was with and was kicking over the traces. The fact was that there was too much manhood in the man to permit him to stand for subserviency to any interest, gang or clique, and, before the Lincoln-Roosevelt movement started, State Treasurer Williams openly declared that he would fight that sort of politics in this state even if he knew that fighting it would cost him his office. It was simply another one of those cases where the "organization" slipped up on its man, and got a better one than it had any use for or than could be used by it, but if the Men of California do not want that kind of a public official what kind do they want? The Watchman has faith to believe that the Men of California do want just that kind of a man in charge of their strong box. He is honest, he is capable and he is a free man. What more can they ask?

HELP THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY.

If you want to do so, whenever you have a dollar to spend, remember its advertisers, and when you spend that dollar with one of its advertisers see to it that that advertiser is made to remember The California Weekly. That will help.

States as well as in numerous state and city governments. Wherever it has been instituted and faithfully applied, the spoils system has crumbled before it and the public funds have been used to remunerate effective service where before their principle function had been to provide a corruption fund for public officials. That is what they are used for to-day in California. The people are taxed to raise money to perpetuate a railroad machine whose chief aim is to defeat their will. We are robbed with one hand and knocked down with the other.

If the Lincoln-Roosevelt League is earnestly and honestly striving to bring about the emancipation of the state from the Southern Pacific machine, as I believe it is, it will first and foremost strive to break this patronage chain by bending its efforts toward securing the enactment of a state and county civil service law. With the same effort devoted to this end that secured the passage of the direct primary law this can be accomplished.

FRANCIS B. KELLOGG.

Los Angeles, Cal.

There is no question that a state civil service for filling clerical positions would be an advance upon our spoils of office system. It is a thing to be worked for, and yet the development of a bureaucracy is not to be contemplated with satisfaction. Peter the Great established such a bureaucracy for efficiently carrying out his plans for the reconstruction of the Russian empire, and from his day to the present there has been no czar, and no movement among the people, that has been able to withstand the implacable inertia of that autocratic will to have things as they are. The dearest thing above ground is a classified, life tenured, civil service. The government buildings at Washington are choked with animated corpses. A life tenure in the public service, with a pension in old age, attracts those who lack the grit to face the world and tends to the creation of a mandarin class, not desirable in a republic. The principle of rotation in office seems to be essential to free government, yet it is not inconsistent with the merit system of getting into office. The problem is not an easy one, not as easy as our correspondent seems to think. The government of the United States has a far reaching civil service system, and yet what a leverage is there still in political patronage in that government. Nevertheless, The California Weekly favors a civil service system for California, not as a panacea, but as the best palliative we know of for an unbearable ill known as the "spoils of office system."

I can surely state that The California Weekly is one of the most valued papers that reach our desk. The frequency with which it is quoted in other papers throughout the state is evidence of the correctness of its stand on most public questions.

Yours very truly,

JOHN A. HENSHALL.

Woodland, Cal.

The interior press of California has been very kind to The California Weekly in passing along to a wider reading public much that appears in its columns. It is probably within bounds to say that it is more liberally quoted from than all the other weeklies in San Francisco taken together, perhaps leaving out The San Francisco Star. This lengthens its arm and increases its power in its fight for Right Things, and we take this occasion to say that the favor is heartily appreciated.

The California Weekly,
San Francisco, Cal.

Gentlemen:—Permit me to urge support of Mr. Heney's name for governor. My traveling has taken me through the entire state in the past six months, and I believe in him as the biggest vote getter that could be named. His nomination means no compromise with that which is not right, and I believe no other name has this significance in equal degree, with the people at large; and this is not meant in any way as disparagement of the two or three other splendid men whose names have been mentioned.

Very truly yours,

W. H. CAMERON.

Napa, Cal., January 31, 1910.

Through the interior, where the associated villainies are not so strong and the heads of the people have not been turned by personal and corporate influence, the foregoing is undoubtedly true, but in candor it must be admitted that the forces that would be against Mr. Heney in and around the bay district would be powerful for a while yet. After four years, when Mr. Heney shall have carried his message on the lecture platform to the uttermost parts of America, and he comes back to us with recovered health and fortune and a national reputation, he may stand a better chance of being made governor than now. This is the way many of his staunchest and best friends feel about it, and they may be right, although the predilections of The California Weekly are for Heney. But if we can't have Heney we should have Hiram Johnson.

The Hon. P. S. Morrison, late of Powell, Wyo., a hustling young man of 96, with the fine fervor and frenzy of youth in him, not long ago made a little journey to the state of Washington, and was so charmed with the scenery, social customs, and local legislation of Seattle that he decided to settle there and grow up with the country. By the time he is 100 he hopes to be comfortably established in business, and after that, he says, he will take an active part in civic improvements.

THE VOTE OF UNION LABOR PARTY SENATORS AND ASSEMBLYMEN ON LABOR ISSUES.

By FRANKLIN HICHBORN.

Hot upon the heels of the Union Labor party's success at the polls in San Francisco last November, came the State Building Trades Convention at Monterey. Resolutions were adopted setting forth "that the State Building Trades Council, in its ninth annual convention assembled, declares its intention now to organize a working class political party in the State of California, with a view to getting control of the law making houses of this state and the several municipalities and making the laws in the interest of the producing class, and securing for the common people legislation that will give them the right and opportunity to enjoy life, liberty and prosperity, instead of protecting wealth, profit and greed."

In view of this declaration, it becomes of moment to know where the Union Labor party, under its present leaders would stand on questions affecting the state's best interests, were it actually to secure control of the state legislature.

A suggestion, at least, of an answer is found in the records made in the legislature of 1909, by senators and assemblymen who received nominations from the Union Labor party, the scope of whose activities, the State Building Trades Council declares, should be made state-wide.

In the legislature of 1909 sat no less than twenty-two members, seven senators and fifteen assemblymen, who were on the official rolls as nominees of the Union Labor party (a). The senators were Anthony, Finn, Hartman, Hare, Reily, Welch and Wolfe, all of San Francisco. Hare had, in addition to his Union Labor nomination, been nominated by the Democratic party; the remaining six had been nominated as Republicans. But to a man they owed much of their success at the polls to the Union Labor party nomination. This nomination stamped them as the choice for legislative office of at least the directing leaders of the Union Labor party, however the citizen member of a labor union may have regarded their selection.

The fifteen Union Labor party assemblymen were: Beatty, Beban, Black, Coghlan, Cullen, Gerdes, Hopkins, Macauley, Nelson, O'Neil, Perine and Pugh, all of San Francisco; Feeley and Silver of Alameda, and Johnston of Contra Costa.

As in the case of the seven senators, these assemblymen had received Republican or Democratic nomination as well as that of the Union Labor party. But as in the case of the seven senators, the Union Labor party endorsement meant with most of them the difference at the polls between election and defeat. They were, at least, the choice for legislative office of those who dictate the policies of the Union Labor party. The attitude of the Union Labor party representatives in the legislature on the various questions before the state, may be taken as fairly representative of the attitude of the Union Labor party leaders. It has been claimed that these Union Labor party leaders do not stand for the policies and principles of the great body of those who hold membership in labor unions. Perhaps the surest measure by which to judge the Union Labor party leaders is furnished by the legislative records of the senators and assemblymen whom they assisted to secure office. The citizen who is concerned for the political well-being of his state is naturally asking himself, Do the records of the Union Labor members of the legislature indicate that the influence of this new movement in politics is to be thrown for the machine, or on the side of good government? The member of a labor organization, with even more concern, is demanding, Did the Union Labor members in the legislature vote for or against the measures in which labor is vitally interested? Fortunately this information is easily secured. The journals of senate and assembly are public records which are open for the inspection of all who may inquire for them.

The first sharply-drawn issue to come before the legislature of 1909 involved the passage of the Anti-Race Track Gambling measure, known as the Walker-Otis bill.

This measure was the outgrowth of the corruption of the race course by the gambling element. Emeryville had become one of the most notorious gambling establishments in the country. It is estimated that $36,000,000 had been placed there in a single season of 180 days. (b) Literally thousands of young men and women took their first step toward ruin there. A secretary of the Board of Regents of the State University became an embezzler and ended his career in state prison because of his losses at the track. So great had the evil become that the whole reputable element of the state became aroused against the institution. Surely the mechanic member of a labor union, with a son or daughter to get a start downward at Emeryville, could have no interest in the issue other than on the side of those who would abate the evil.

The Walker-Otis bill had the active opposition of the gambling element, which, because of common interests and generous campaign contributions, constitutes a not unimportant element of the state machine. The machine forces lined up against the Walker-Otis bill; the anti-machine forces fought for its passage.

By the time the legislature convened so strong was public opinion on the subject that the proponents of the measure were able to force it through both houses, in the teeth of the most determined machine opposition. Indeed, when the measure came to final vote in the assembly, only ten assemblymen voted against. Of these ten, no less than eight had received Union Labor party nominations. They were: Beban, Black, Coghlan, Cullen, Hopkins, Macauley, O'Neil and Pugh. (c)

When the bill came up in the senate, Senator Wolfe, Union Labor party and Republican member, led the fight against it. The vote stood thirty-three for the passage of the bill to seven against. Of the seven senators who stood out against the bill until the last, five, Finn, Hartman, Hare, Reily and Wolfe, had received Union Labor party nominations. (d)

Thus, of the seventeen assemblymen and senators who voted against the bill, no less than thirteen had been nominated by the Union Labor party, while only four were without that party's endorsement.

The influence of the machine over the Union Labor party nominees in senate and assembly, was more pronouncedly shown when the Direct Primary bill was under consideration. The issue involved was: Shall the people have a state-wide, practical vote at the primaries to express their choice within party lines for United States senators? The anti-machine element, regardless of party, insisted that they should; the machine element declared that they should not. Here, indeed, was an issue "in the interest," if we may quote from the resolution adopted at Monterey, "of the producing class and securing for the common people legislation that will (would) give them the right and opportunity" to have a voice in the naming of their United States senators, a right for which the men who labor, who belong to labor unions, have long contended, and with justice.

But the attitude of the Union Labor members of the legislature on this issue was curiously at variance with the interests and wishes of those holding membership in the labor unions of the state.

When the Direct Primary bill first came up in the senate, a motion to amend the provision which gave the people a practical state-wide vote for senator out of it, was defeated by a vote of twenty-seven against the machine's amendment to thirteen for. Of the thirteen who voted for the amendment five were from among the seven senators who had received Union Labor party nominations.

They were Senators Finn, Hartman, Hare, Reily and Wolfe. Senators Anthony and Welch (e) were the only Union Labor senators who were found voting against the machine, and, on this issue, surely in the interest of the "common people" for whom Union Labor politicians declared so valiantly at Monterey.

Failing to amend the bill to its liking in the senate, the machine transferred the fight to the assembly. In the assembly the amendment denying the people a practical vote for United States senator was actually read into the bill. The vote was, however, a narrow one, being thirty-eight for the amendment to thirty-six against. Of the fifteen Union Labor party assemblymen, twelve voted for the machine's amendment. They were Beatty, Beban, Black, Coghlan, Cullen, Feeley, Johnston, Macauley, Nelson, O'Neil, Perine, and Pugh. (f) Two Union Labor assemblymen, Gerdes and Silver, voted against the machine. The fifteenth, Hopkins, did not vote at all on this issue.

When the question of concurrence in the assembly amendment came up in the senate, seven senators who had voted against the amendment when it was originally before the senate, joined the machine senators in voting for it. Senator Welch was one of the seven. (g) This left only one Union Labor senator of the Union Labor delegation standing for a practical state-wide vote for United States senators, which, within party lines, would have given the "common people" the right and opportunity of saying who should represent them in the United States senate.

And then a strange thing happened. Mr. P. H. McCarthy, at present Mayor of San Francisco, the recognized Union Labor party leader of the state, who dominated the Monterey convention, and was there loudest in his insistence that the rights of the "common people" shall be maintained, appeared at Sacramento, and, instead of lending his influence to defeat the machine in an issue in which the machine interests were clearly not the interests of the working people of this state, did all that lay within his power to get Senator Anthony, the one Union Labor senator who was standing out against the machine and insisting on a practical state-wide vote for United States senators, to change his position and vote with the machine senators for the assembly amendment. But Senator Anthony refused to be "pulled down," and on this issue continued to cast his vote not only in the interests of the working people but in the interests of the people of the whole state, the efforts of the machine and Union Labor Party Leader McCarthy to the contrary notwithstanding.

Another issue where the interests of the "common people" on the one side and of the machine protected interests on the other were sharply involved, came in the consideration of railroad regulation measures. A few days before the legislature convened, freight rates to the Pacific Coast had been so advanced as to produce an increase for the railroads, according to experts who testified before a senate investigation committee, of $10,000,000 a year. The bulk of this enormous increase, other experts testified, is borne by the consumers, the "common people." It will be seen that the "common people" were and are largely interested in effective railroad regulation.

The principal issue on this score came in the conflict between the anti-machine element to pass the comparatively effective Stetson railroad regulation bill, and the machine element which labored—successfully—to substitute for it the Wright railroad regulation measure. When it came to a vote on this issue, every one of the seven Union Labor party senators voted against the effective Stetson bill and for the ineffective Wright bill. (h) Not one of them was found voting for the effective railroad regulation measure.

Failing to secure the passage of a reasonably effective railroad regulation measure, the anti-machine element endeavored to have a hold-over committee appointed to investigate the cause of the increase in freight rates. Here again were involved the interests of the people on the one side, and the great railroad interests on the other. The machine opposed the investigation. When it came to a vote, four of the seven Union Labor party senators voted against holding the investigation. They were Anthony, Finn, Hartman, and Wolfe. Hare and Welch(i), did not vote on this issue at all. Not one of the seven voted for the investigation in which the consumers, the "common people", the members of labor unions, are so vitally interested. But five of them did vote against holding the investigation to which the transportation companies were so strongly opposed.

The railroad issue came up in the Assembly in the contest over Senate Joint Resolution No. 3. This resolution endorsed the plan to establish a line of government steamships on the Pacific to connect with the government railroad across the Isthmus of Panama, which connects with a line of government-owned steamships on the Atlantic.

The proposed Pacific line would have given a complete Government-owned line from San Francisco to New York, and have proved of inestimable value to the Pacific coast. Such a line would, of course, furnish genuine competition with the trans-continental railroads, bring down freight rates to a competitive basis, which would in the end mean a considerable saving to every consumer on the Pacific Coast, and every member of a labor union is a consumer.

The resolution passed the senate, but was delayed in the assembly. A motion to bring it to an immediate vote by recalling it from the Committee on Federal Relations, was lost. Of the fifteen Union Labor party assemblymen, only two, Gerdes and Silver, voted for prompt consideration of this important measure. Feeley, Johnston, Macauley, Nelson, O'Neil and Pugh voted against such consideration. Beatty, Beban, Black, Coghlan, Cullen, Hopkins and Perine, on this issue of such vital interest to members of labor unions, didn't vote at all.(j)

When the Assembly did get an opportunity to act on this measure, Grove L. Johnson of Sacramento introduced a number of resolutions which took much of the ginger out of it.

Of the fifteen Union Labor party assemblymen, thirteen voted for the Johnson amendments. They were: Beatty, Beban, Coghlan, Cullen, Feeley, Hopkins, Johnston, Macauley, Nelson, O'Neil, Perine, Pugh and Silver.(k) Gerdes and Black are not recorded as voting. It will be seen that in the assembly as well as in the senate, the Union Labor party members voted with the machine element and in the interest of the great transportation corporations, and against the anti-machine element and against the interests of the "common people," from whose ranks come the membership of the labor unions.

Another issue which touches the labor union man closely is that of an even break with the rich man in a court of justice. That which makes the administration of the law difficult, complex and costly is, of course, to the advantage of the rich man who can pay and to the disadvantage of the poor man who cannot.

One of the principal fights on this issue last winter came up in the senate over the so-called Change of Venue bill. Without going into the details of this measure, it is enough to say, that in the long run had it become a law, the criminal with a large defense fund would have been given further advantage over the poor man charged with crime. Here again was labor interested, interested in the defeat of this bill. Nevertheless, every one of the seven Union Labor party members of the senate, Anthony, Finn, Hartman, Hare, Reily, Welch and Wolfe (l) voted for the passage of this measure. Again were Union Labor party senators found voting with the machine.

The so-called "Judicial Column" bill was defeated in the assembly, having passed the senate. Here again was an issue in which labor was vitally interested, for labor is certainly concerned in the election of an impartial judiciary.

The measure provided for the taking of the judiciary out of politics by establishing on the election ballot a special column, in which were to be printed without party designation, the names of the candidates for the bench. This would have taken the selection of judges entirely out of the hands of the corporation-dominated machine, and forced their individual selection at the hands of the people.

The machine opposed the passage of this measure, and, although the bill passed the senate, the machine succeeded in defeating it in the assembly.

On this issue, five of the Union Labor party Assemblymen, Hopkins, Johnston, O'Neil, Perine and Pugh, are not recorded as voting. Two, Beatty and Gerdes, voted for the bill. Eight, Beban, Black, Coghlan, Cullen, Feeley, Macauley, Nelson and Silver(m) voted against it.

Every member of a labor union was justly interested in the passage of this measure. The machine fought it with characteristic cunning. And as on other issues between the people on the one side, and the corporation-dominated machine on the other, the majority of the Union Labor party in the assembly voted against the interests of The People, against RICHARD REDFERN was the town beau. Every town has one of the species—the amiable and gallant young man who has made love to half the girls he has met, who has “brought out” so many annual crops of debutantes that he prefers not to be reminded of the first, who is the “utility man” of his social circle and is freely called in by his girl and women friends to fill up gaps at a card party or to give advice about the color scheme and the flowers at a luncheon.

His Christian name had long since been abbreviated, and he was known to matrons of forty and to maids of seventeen simply as Our Dick. He was not, however, an idle bird of plumage: he worked energetically at his meagre law practice and read much between clients. Only his evenings and Saturday afternoons were at the disposal of his friends. The clients were few: he had grown up in the town from early boyhood, and other men, who had called him Dicky from infancy, and who looked upon his social activities as trifling, carried their cases to stupid but more solemn lawyers whose owlish gravity betokened wisdom.

Dick laid down “Daniels on Negotiable Instruments” and looked about his office. It was neat, with the precise neatness that a bachelor exercises in the arrangement of his clothes and which he fails to exercise in the arrangement of his living rooms. He turned from the tidy desk to the window and looked out on the street, with a little wistfulness in his eyes at the thought that few of the busy men below him entrusted their affairs to him. He passed his hand over his forehead, and realized anew that he was getting a trifle bald.

“Thirty-five, and a ladies’ man,” sneered in his ears, the recollection of the muttered taunt of his one real enemy in the world.

The telephone bell startled him. Julia Leavenworth was on the wire.

“Oh, Dick, I’m going to have my class of youngsters here this afternoon for a romp and something to eat afterwards, and I do wish you’d come out and help me amuse them. I’m afraid they see so much of me during the rest of the week that they won’t enjoy my society very much on their Saturday holiday. No, there’ll be no one else here. Oh, they are just little things, boys and girls eight or nine years old; my pupils at school. Oh, yes, and there’s one little girl I want you to meet; she’s a newcomer, has only been in town a month, and she’s going to be the belle of the place. She has nearly ruined the discipline of my class room already; all the boys are trying to show off for her benefit. All right? Thank you very much. Yes, at three. Good bye!”

Dick left his bachelor quarters at half past two and swung down the street toward Miss Leavenworth’s. It was the end of spring, when the afternoon shadows begin to shorten and the warm air and the mellow light betoken the full approach of summer. He was early for the short walk he had to take, but he was stopped often on his route, once to decline an invitation to join a tennis set, again to regret an opportunity to complete a rubber of whist, and another time to advise a matronly friend, who was overseeing some gardening, as to how she should have a trellis run for a climbing rose-bush.

At length he turned in at the Leavenworth residence. The house was older than its neighbors and of an old-fashioned architecture, but it was proudly kept in repair and the yard about it was in perfect order. The place reminded Dick of his hostess, a girl just a trifle—but by that trifle, irretrievably—past the first bloom of young womanhood; a little less easy, financially, than her neighbors; but carrying herself with well-bred independence and with pride in her ability to keep her own house in order.

Miss Leavenworth greeted him cordially at the door, and he soon made himself characteristically at home, helping to set the table in the dining room and later finishing the few uncompleted paper caps for the children.

“Tell me more about the little belle,” he said, as he laid the last cap on its plate at the table.

“Oh, you mean little Marjie Baker. You will have to see her to appreciate her.

THE QUIN- TESSENTIAL BEAU

BY

E. FRENCH STROTHER

There’s the door bell, now.”

Miss Leavenworth left Dick to turn out the lights in the darkened dining room while she hastened to welcome her small guests at the front door. They came in groups of four or six, most of the girls gallantly escorted by their young cavaliers. The last comers, however, were five boys who came together without partners, and one other boy, Tommy Jones, who came by himself.

“Which one is the heroine of the piece?” asked Dick of Miss Leavenworth, after the games of the children were well under way and he and she were left a moment in a corner of the back parlor, passive onlookers at the revels.

“She hasn’t come yet. She doesn’t have to—she’s the queen of her set, you see, and she knows it already. There may be another reason, though. Her mother may have kept her home. You see, every boy in the class asked her to come with him, and they all asked her about the same time—five minutes after I announced the invitation, in fact—and they quarreled so over who asked her first that I had to interfere and Marjie finally said she would come alone, if those horrid boys were going to be so rude as to fight about it. I’m afraid they did go to fighting, too, after school last night, for every one of those five that came together seemed to be scarred up, and Tommy Jones—he’s the one who came alone—has a finger bandaged. Oh, there’s the bell; maybe that is Marjie.”

It was. As she came into the room with Miss Leavenworth, who had relieved her of her hat in the hall, the clamor of the games suddenly stilled and a strange uneasiness seemed to attack every boy and girl in the room, though in different ways: the boys seemed unnecessarily indifferent to the amusing powers of blind-man’s buff, while some of the girls showed plainly a jealous resentment they could not conceal.

Dick enjoyed this sudden display of human nature as much as he did the vision of the little girl who stood shyly in the doorway, abashed before the united gaze of the whole room. And she made a very pleasant vision, too. She was as trim as a little fairy, with a wealth of chestnut brown hair falling straight to her shoulders, a pair of clear blue eyes that dropped demurely below dark lashes, and a mouth that Dick vainly afterwards attempted to describe. But these were the least of her attractions; they were forgotten when one saw the singular grace of her carriage and her manner, and heard the low, sweet, modest voice, and saw the bashful color in her cheeks mount as her eyes fell, and fade as she lifted them.

No wonder, thought Dick, she raised this fury of devotion in these young savages: she was the realization, in childhood guise, of that type of complete femininity which it is the day-dream of every man unmarried some day to possess—the modest flower, the clinging vine, the sweet, the pure, the good. For such women men become heroes and brave a thousand terrors to earn one wistful smile, one soft embrace, one whispered word of innocent love.

The interruption was becoming uncomfortable when Miss Leavenworth took Marjie’s hand and led her across the room toward Dick, who advanced to meet them.

“Mr. Redfern,” she said, “I want you to have the pleasure of Miss Baker’s acquaintance, Miss Marjie Baker.”

“I am a thousand times glad to have the pleasure, I’m sure,” said Dick, heartily, as he took Marjie’s hand. She raised her eyes and blushed painfully.

“Thank you,” she said, simply, and dropped her eyes again.

“It’s time for the Virginia reel, isn’t it, Miss Leavenworth? I claim the first set with Miss Marjie—if I may have the honor,” and Dick bowed low to the little queen.

“Yes, sir, thank you,” she replied.

Miss Leavenworth took the cue.

“Yes, indeed, let’s have a reel. I’ll play the piano, and all you boys get your partners. If you’ll please, Dick, drag that rug out into the hall, so the floor will be clear.”

Dick did so while Miss Leavenworth seated herself at the piano and the boys, now that Marjie was not available, chose partners and formed the set. Dick returned from the hall and took Marjie’s hand and the dance was on. Under the influence of the music and the stimulus of physical action the spirit of fun quickly reigned again and the cloud of the belle’s entrance was dissipated.

After the figures of the dance had been exhausted Miss Leavenworth announced refreshments, and Dick again claimed Marjie as his partner and led her out at the head of the procession to the big table. He had felt, without seeing or hearing any tangible evidence of it, a murmur of protest from the boys as he did this, but he had figured that it would prevent an embarrassing repetition of the scene in the school room that Miss Leavenworth had described. Anyway, he felt keenly interested in Marjie, a combination of admiration, amusement, and a sort of reverential deference toward this little girl whose mingled confusion and trembling hesitation and simple dignity seemed to presage qualities in womanhood that would remind him of the dearest attributes of his own mother. So he paid no attention to the thought of the disappointed boys who awkwardly led in their partners after him.

At the table Marjie regained her composure and grew to be on better terms with Dick, though he still felt an impalpable barrier of reserve in her manner that permitted no familiarity. Still, she graciously accepted his attentions, and Dick outdid himself in gallantry to please her. He presented her the flower he had brought in his buttonhole, and begged her to wear it. She pinned it complacently on her breast, but seemed, he thought, a trifle more interested in her ice cream than in his flower. He was not rebuffed, however, and talked his best, and was repaid with smiles for his efforts.

When the party was breaking up, Dick said to Miss Leavenworth,

“I shall be back in half an hour and help you clear up, but you must excuse me while I take Miss Marjie home,” again bowing to Marjie and again adding, “if I may have the honor.”

Then an astonishing thing happened. Little Tommy Jones, his face purple with rage and his fists clenched, strode between Marjie and Dick and squared himself off wrathfully before that dumbfounded gentleman.

“No, sir, she’s not goin’ to go home with you. She’s goin’ to have me go home with her. I’ve licked every kid in school that said he was goin’ to ast ‘er, and I ain’t afraid of you, neither.”

He paused for breath, and to glare defiance at the other boys, whose looks showed plainly that he had spoken the truth. Then his words dashed on in a torrent:

“N’ what’s more, you ain’t no business buttin’ in ‘t our party ‘n keepin’ us away from our girls. What’s a great big sissy like you doin’, anyhow, playin’ with kids you’re old ‘nough to be the father of. You’d oughta be ashamed of yourself. You’d oughta be married to some girl your own size, ‘stead of buttin’ in where you ain’t wanted and makin’ trouble.”

This furious outburst finished, he glared at Dick for a moment, and then turned to Marjie.

“Give him back his flower!” he commanded, “and take mine ‘nstead!”

Marjie looked at him with a half-frightened look for a moment; then a look of profound admiration and of submission came into her eyes. This lordly gallant of mine was her cavalier, and meekly she obeyed him. She plucked the rose from her breast, and with downcast eyes, handed it back to Dick in silence. Dick, also silent, bowed and took it. Miss Leavenworth laughed hysterically, and quickly choked her laughter behind her handkerchief.

"Now we will go," Tommy announced, taking Marjie's passive hand in his, and surveying the other boys again with the eye of a conqueror. They made no sign, and Tommy started for the door, leading Marjie, whose eyes were still downcast. At the door, however, she tugged gently at his hand, and Tommy instantly turned to her with an amazing new expression in his face, of tenderness, concern, devotion. Marjie whispered something to him and his face fell. Then he lifted his head again and led her back to Miss Leavenworth.

"I've had a great time, thank you, ma'am," he said awkwardly.

"So have I," added Marjie, smiling up at Miss Leavenworth. "Good bye."

"Good bye, dears," said Miss Leavenworth, her eyes glistening.

Tommy turned to Dick.

"Good bye, sir," he said, and held out his hand. Dick took it, gravely, and said good bye.

"And good bye to you, too, Miss Marjie," he added.

Marjie's face flushed crimson, and her lip quivered, but she raised her head at length and looked at Dick proudly, at the same time taking Tommy's hand again.

"Good bye, sir," she said, "and thank you."

The other children quickly followed, and Dick turned with Miss Leavenworth to the deserted dining room. Together they cleared the table, talking lightly of various things. At last Dick stood at the door, hat in hand, ready to leave.

"And I want to thank you for introducing me to the little queen," he was saying. "That little fire eater of a Tommy Jones knows when he sees a prize. She is a pattern of womanhood, isn't she, though?"

"Yes," exclaimed Miss Leavenworth. "Yes, but isn't he a model of a man, though!"

The words struck Dick like a blow. He made a perfunctory farewell and started homeward, the phrase humming in his ears. "The model of a man!" He saw nothing of the houses nor trees nor people on that walk. A half hour later, alone in his room, he lighted the gas and looked about him. On the walls, on the mantelpiece, on his cheffonier, pictures of old flames, girl comrades, all of about the same age when the photographs were struck, many now mothers of children older than Marjie. One by one he took them down. One by one he looked into the eyes that laughed back into his. One by one he wrenched the cardboards to pieces and cast them into the fireplace.

The last photograph was one of a face more grave than the rest, a little wistful. He looked at it a long time, and then carefully replaced it above his favorite books. He dressed and went out for dinner; came back, and sat for an hour with the picture before him, looking into the grave, wistful eyes. At eight o'clock he arose, with a new light of determination in his own eyes, put on his hat, and stood for a moment by the electrolier, with the picture in his hand, speaking half aloud to himself:

"I know I don't deserve—model of a man!—by thunder, she shall, or I'll know the reason why!"

He planted his hat firmly on his head, turned out the light, and walked resolutely out the front door. As he passed out into the twilight, he read again the name signed beneath the portrait, before buttoning the photograph into his coat pocket. The name was written in a fine, even hand, barely decipherable in the dim light—"Julia Leavenworth."

the interests of members of labor unions, and for the purposes of the machine.

At the banquet given by the Royal Arch to Mayor P. H. McCarthy of San Francisco, Mr. McCarthy took occasion to criticize certain union men who oppose him and his policies.

"We learn," Mr. McCarthy is reported as saying, "that some union men are howling because McCarthy has made this or that move. Let me assure them that labor when it speaks authoritatively—let me assure those labor men and newspapers that labor will stand for no Benedict Arnold politics. That portion of labor engaged in the building interests that met in convention at Monterey has spoken with authority."

Perhaps the Monterey convention did speak with authority, but it is interesting to note that Union Labor members of the assembly failed to vote as the Monterey convention spoke.

For example: The Monterey convention adopted a resolution indorsing the full enfranchisement of women.

The woman's suffrage issue did not come up in the senate at the last session of the Legislature, but it did come up in the assembly. Nine of the fifteen Union Labor members voted against it. They were: Beatty, Beban, Cullen, Feeley, Gerdes, Johnston, Macauley, Nelson and Pugh.

Black and Perine did not vote on this issue. Only four of the Union Labor members voted for woman's suffrage. They were: Coghlan, Hopkins, O'Neil and Silver.(n)

The question naturally arises, did the Monterey Building Trades' convention or the majority of the Union Labor party in the assembly "speak with authority" on this issue? The question seems to be up to Mayor McCarthy.

The limits of an article of this character make impossible consideration of all the issues in which Union Labor party members of senate and assembly participated in a way curiously at variance with the interests of Labor, organized or unorganized. I cannot close, however, without touching upon the Union Labor Assembly delegation's attitude on the so-called Japanese bills. Here at least, was an issue upon which the Union Labor party members might be deemed to be unanimous. But this was by no means the case, as the records on Assembly bills 78, 32 and 14 will show. Assembly bill 14 will illustrate the point.

This measure was known as the "anti-Japanese School bill." When the bill first came up in the assembly, counting Leeds' vote, who voted for it that he might move to reconsider, it was passed by a vote of 46 to 28, or with Leeds voting in the negative 45 to 29. Forty-one votes were required to pass the bill. To defeat it five who had voted for it had to be switched to vote against it. And they were switched, all right.

On the second vote, on reconsideration, the bill was defeated by a vote of 37 to 41. Had four who voted against the bill voted for it, it would have been passed. On this roll call, five Union Labor party assemblymen, enough to pass the bill and to spare, voted against it. They were: Beban, Coghlan, Feeley, Perine and Silver.(o)

Beban, Perine and Silver(p) had voted for the bill when it was originally before the assembly, and switched. Coghlan was absent when the first vote was taken. Feeley voted against the "Japanese bills" from the start.

In closing, it should be said, that of the fifteen Union Labor party assemblymen, Mr. Gerdes was found voting against the machine and in the interest of the people on practically all important issues. This is partially true of Silver. And here the record of the Union Labor assemblymen for individual excellence ends. But this is not saying that the other fourteen members are corrupt or even unworthy men, taken as individuals. All who know Assemblyman Charles A. Nelson, for example, know him to be a good citizen, and on the square to the last inch of time—a true friend, a faithful son, a good brother.

But the legislative record of the fourteen does show them to have been poorly advised. On eleven test roll calls, involving issues with the machine on one side, and those who stand for the interests of the people on the other, the fifteen Union Labor party assemblymen had an aggregate of 165 votes. Of the possible 165 votes, ninety-nine were cast against reform, forty for reform, twenty-six were not cast at all.

Of the forty good votes, Gerdes cast nine, Silver seven, Nelson four, Perine four, a total of twenty-four. This leaves sixteen good votes to be divided among eleven Union Labor party assemblymen.

The seven Union Labor party senators made even a less worthy showing. On sixteen test roll calls in the senate, involving issues between the machine on the one side and the people on the other, the seven Union Labor members had a possible 112 votes. Of these, eighty-three were cast for the machine, nineteen against the machine, ten were not cast at all. Of the nineteen anti-machine votes, seven were cast by Senator Anthony. This leaves twelve anti-machine votes, out of a possible ninety-six, to be divided among six Union Labor party senators.

The record of the Union Labor party delegations in senate and assembly indicates that a sharp distinction is to be drawn between Union Labor political leaders responsible for their nomination and election, and union labor leaders.

In his speech before the Royal Arch the other evening, Mr. P. H. McCarthy stated that "Labor will stand for no Benedict Arnold politics."

The writer quite agrees with Mr. McCarthy, and on this faith in the integrity and common sense of labor, bases the belief that labor will not long stand for the so-called Union Labor party leaders, as distinguished from the leaders of organizations of laboring men.

JUST FOR FUN.

"Father," said little Rollo, "what is a prospectus?" "The kind I am mostly acquainted with, my son, is a sort of fairy tale adapted to the tastes of adults instead of children."—Washington Star.

Caller—"Snip & Co. have employed me to collect the bill you owe them." Owens—"You are to be congratulated, sir, on securing a permanent position."—Boston Courier.

"The insurgents in congress have got to make a fine, large noise, and if they do they will get the whole country to turn out and help them," says Representative Victor Murdock of Kansas. "The country is with them, but it needs in some sections—not mine—to be aroused. I guess it will be. The importance of an alarm makes me think of the story about the two traveling men who went into a booming Kansas town and couldn't get into the hotel. 'But we've got to sleep here,' they explained. 'Can't we get the billiard table?' 'Two chaps from Kansas City sleeping on it,' replied the clerk. 'Nor the bar,' protested the wanderers. 'It doesn't close till one and four men have hired it after that. But say, you act like sports and I believe I can fix you. Come along.' The clerk got down a huge key, led them across the street, unlocked a big door and pushed them in. 'This is the Methodist church,' he said. 'Spread out on these fine, wide pews and you'll get a good night's rest.' And with that he locked the door and went away. At 1 a. m. there were three uncertain taps on the big bell of the Methodist church, then a terrific uproar. The bell turned a somersault and the clanging woke the town. People hurried down the main street to find the fire or the bank robbery. The bell was still doing gymnastics, but nobody knew why. The mayor came along and pounded on the door. No answer. Then he broke in. It was as dark as Egypt. He pushed his way carefully in and shouted: 'What's this row all about? In the name of the law I order you to come out.' Then he stepped back and waited nervously for a reply. It came out of the cavernous, impenetrable darkness: 'Two dry Martinis for pew thirteen, and bring 'em up quick.'"—New York Telegram.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The State Treasurer.

The State Treasurer is required to receive all money that is ordered into the treasury by the State Controller, care for the money while it is in the state treasury and pay the same out as it is ordered by warrants drawn by the State Controller. This necessitates the keeping of careful records of all receipts and disbursements and, in order to insure accuracy, a careful and daily count of all money on hand. All bonds issued by the state are prepared by the State Treasurer and he must make all sales of such bonds as are required. He must also invest the accumulations in the Sinking Funds for the retirements of all bonds issued.

He is the custodian of all securities deposited by the Insurance Commissioner and by the Superintendent of Banks and must keep all necessary records in connection therewith and must make transfers of the securities from time to time as directed. He must detach from the bonds all coupons, as they become due, and deliver them to the parties entitled to receive them.

Until the year 1907 the State Treasurer was required to keep all the moneys under his control in the vaults of the state treasury, but in that year the legislature adopted a law permitting the depositing in banks of "all moneys in the state treasury belonging to the state not immediately required to meet current expenditures." Under this law the State Treasurer is not compelled to make such deposits, but if he did not do so he would be open to very severe censure to say the least. The work of the Treasurer has increased many times over by depositing of money in the banks, for he must ascertain the standing of all banks desiring deposits of state funds and he must also know the value of the bonds offered as security in order to have the necessary information to lay before the Governor and Controller, who are required to act with the Treasurer in making deposits. He must at all times have information concerning the market value of bonds and he must watch the maturities of all bonds deposited with him in order to know that the deposits are properly secured. He is responsible for the safe keeping of all bonds deposited with him as security for deposits of state funds and must detach and care for all coupons as they become due.

The depositing of state funds provides a new source of revenue of considerable proportions for the state as the interest collected on deposits up to this time is over $200,000, and there is every reason to believe that the yearly income will be nearly, if not fully, $100,000, as there is now on deposit in 143 banks throughout the state over $5,000,000. The depositing of money in banks practically converts the Treasurer's office into a large bank, but without the facilities for transacting business that all banks have, for, instead of being able to do all business through the medium of other banks by the adoption of business methods, the Treasurer is required to actually receive gold for all settlements with the state and to make all disbursements in gold. This method has long since been abandoned in practically every other state, but the old, cumbersome method is still clung to here.

All bonds purchased by the Board of Examiners for the benefit of the State School Fund are delivered to the Treasurer and must be cared for by him and as the bonds mature or as interest coupons become due he must present them for collection.

The State Treasurer is a member of the Capitol Commission and when any member of the Board of Examiners is disqualified the State Treasurer must act as a member of the Board of Examiners when passing upon claims.

"General" Jacob S. Coxey, who led "Coxey's army" to Washington in 1894 is now prosperous enough to put up at the Waldorf. He is also become a rank monopolist, promoting a patent in street car motive machinery.

Up and Down the State.

By a vote of 120 for and 93 against the people of Lindsay decided not to issue bonds in the sum of $20,000 for the construction of a new school building. A two-thirds vote was required.

It is expected that a boulevard, to be known as the Rincon road, will be constructed along the beach from Carpenteria to Ventura.

The Evening Free Lance has made its appearance in Hollister, and if the people of that place will sufficiently support it, it will do that community excellent service.

Mr. and Mrs. Willard Thomas, of Santa Rosa, are charged with murdering the woman's new-born babe.

It is reported that a plant for icing fruit-cars on the Southern Pacific lines will be established at Red Bluff.

The Southern Pacific proposes to lay heavier rails on its line between Marysville and Oroville.

The Northern Electric company soon will begin the construction of its line from Yuba City to Colusa.

A colony of Mennonites is to be located on 20,000 acres of land in Butte valley, Siskiyou county.

A factory which has been constructed in Lodi will manufacture cream of tartar from the grape-pomace of the wineries in that vicinity.

Mrs. Dinah E. Sprague, who celebrated her 100th birthday last May, is the oldest of the Women's Relief Corps. Though born in New York Mrs. Sprague was among the early settlers of Cleveland. During the civil war a large number of the soldiers camped on the heights above Cleveland and Mrs. Sprague was untiring in her efforts to better the condition of the sick and wounded in this camp. At the age of 90 Mrs. Sprague claimed her right to the ballot by voting for university trustee.

His Face Increasingly Dear.

NEXT TO THE LIKENESS of the Savior of Man keep that of Abraham Lincoln ever before the faces of your children. He is the type of American to which all known agencies from conception to ascension should strive to conform. Strong in body and mind, he was at once brave, patient and humble. He employed tact without sacrifice of principle, was self-reliant without wavering in his dependence upon God. He fought the enemies of his country without faltering, yet without bitterness, indeed with compassion for their distresses and an earnest desire to bind up their wounds in love and make the nation whole. This nation will never produce a greater, manlier man than Abraham Lincoln. His face grows increasingly dear as the years go by. Keep it ever before the faces of your children that it may inspire them to be the type of American that he was.

Stand By Geary.

THE PRESENT CITY ADMINISTRATION cannot alone be trusted to see the Geary Street railroad enterprise through to completion. From start to finish it will need both the support and the pressure of an energized and focused public sentiment. There is no knowing in what the successful carrying out of that enterprise may eventuate. It may demonstrate the capacity of a people to transport themselves without subjection to aggression or corruption. Stand by Geary.

That Mellow Old Party.

IT IS EVIDENT that Wall street has not taken the President seriously. It regards him as a mellow old party whom a sop now and again will suffice if accompanied with a nice conversation in dulcet tones. In other circles there is, however, a renewed spirit of hopefulness that the President will find out who his real friends are, and are not, in season to do some execution with the big stick before congress adjourns. The awful slump to the Democracy in the sixth Missouri district, where a successor to de Armond was lately elected, may nerve his arm. Of course the interests want no legislation at all, unless it be to modify the anti-trust law, and a Democratic house deadlocked with a Republican senate would, to them, be an ideal condition, but to the President it would mean political disaster and probably death. If there be an iron hand under the kid glove the President wears congress should be made acquainted with the feel of it.

Going to Meet Roosevelt.

THAT THEODORE ROOSEVELT is to have the greatest home-coming ever accorded an American citizen is a foregone conclusion, but the striking feature of it is likely to be that the President will vacate his ample chair and go out to meet him. The first thing Theodore will see after coming in sight of the Statue of Liberty will be that smile. It will be the broadest and blandest ever, and if it does not put the quietus on that "back from Elba" business nothing will. Meantime, congress will have done its work or left it undone. That may make all the difference in the world.

A Patriot On a Pedestal.

STEVE ELKINS, king of West Virginia, has pulled Cabot Lodge from the pedestal of patriotism and climbed on himself. Lodge and Smoot had it all fixed up to investigate the rise in prices of such commodities as would stand investigating, leaving the others out, when Elkins saw his opportunity and made for it. The New England oligarchy, including Aldrich, went down before him, and now the investigation will be broad enough to cover all human needs and shallow enough to produce an immediate harvest of results. Of course the railroads of West Virginia do not enter into general consumption outside of West Virginia and Elkins is safe.

Theodore for the Senate.

THERE HAS BEEN TALK of Roosevelt to succeed Taft when the latter's four-year term is over. If Bourbonism rules in Washington meantime that dream may come true. There has also been talk of sending him to congress and making him speaker of the house, but he is not so much needed there as elsewhere. Cannonism has suffered a plexus blow already and the time is at hand when the house committees will be made up by a committee on committees. Where there is need of him is in the United States senate. Wouldn't he make those dry bones rattle though? Wouldn't he shake the filling out of that New England oligarchy? That senate has got to be reconstructed, either internally or externally, if it is to be saved from obliteration, and Theodore Roosevelt is the man to lead the work of reconstruction.

Were They Green Goods Claims?

REPRESENTATIVE McLACHLAN has been careful to explain that the Alaska coal lands in which he and his associates, including Governor Gillett, have invested are not the Cunningham claims, but the Green, and that, as for McLachlan himself, he would be glad to get out of the deal with what he put in it. Representative McKinlay has spoken to the same effect. McLachlan declares that he bought from the original entryman, but does not now know who he is. All he does know for certain is that he wishes he had not bought. The attitude of all the gentlemen connected with this deal toward this deal raises the suspicion that they may have purchased "green goods" rather than coal lands. Have they? And does congress furnish a good market for gold bricks and like commodities? Does an original entryman look like a nature fakir?

Where the Interests Are Concerned.

WHILE THE WALL STREET INTERESTS are not worrying over the President and his policies, resting secure in the belief that nothing will come of them, and that the courts will nullify the incorporation tax, they are much concerned as to what the supreme court may do with the Standard Oil and National Tobacco cases. If that court should go so far as to disqualify holding corporations conspiracies to monopolize might come to naught and many an industrial be forced to the bottom of the stock list. The street appears to have had a premonition of what is coming and a first-class flurry, ending in a slump, for the second week in February was postponed rather than averted by the adjournment of the court for a three weeks' vacation. With the nullification of the holding company competition will be restored and, with the restoration of competition, The Cinch will lose a good deal of its grip on the earnings of the people.

It Told Us So.

WHEN THE PEOPLE of San Francisco were debating the new charter the Argonaut told us not to adopt that document. It said we'd be sorry. It declared that some dictator would sometime occupy the dictatorial chair and dictate dictatively. It is so. The Argonaut is vindicated. The people are humiliated before its face. Behold a Daniel!

THE WHITE COAL OF THE SIERRA.

When any new thing is to be undertaken in Great Britain the first step is for Parliament to appoint a committee to investigate and report. In this country some person interested in the common good champions the cause, interests others and so forms an association for the advancement of the cause. There is need for such an association to take in hand the issue of a state policy in relation to the development, control and utilization of the "white coal" supply of the Sierra Nevada mountains.

That supply is greater in magnitude than the coal measures of Pennsylvania ever were and they are truly inexhaustible, whereas coal measures are not. Corporate enterprise will do the developing, but it will do it in such a way as to give the butter fat to the investors and the skimmilk to the people and their assigns forever. Instead of taking to themselves a reasonable income on a reasonable investment, and leaving to the ultimate consumer the net usufruct of a great, God-given source of energy, these corporations will take to themselves the net usufruct of this great, God-given source of energy and will leave to the consuming public only so much of advantage from that source of power as will induce them to be users of it. The "what the traffic will bear" principle will be applied to the sale of transmitted electrical energy with greater rigor than in railroading for the reason that the traffic will bear more in proportion to investment and expense of operation, vastly more.

Competition can not be relied on to regulate to the consumer the cost of electrical energy derived from the snows on the Sierras. Whether the development of such energy is or is not a natural monopoly the sale of it is so as certainly as the supplying of gas, street car service or lighting, and the power companies of California have thus far sought to monopolize at both the producing and the consuming ends of electrical development. The power corporations are nearly all either affiliated or combined and their use of streets for distribution makes competition within each of the cities supplied practically out of the question.

The issue, then, resolves itself into an alternative of control of power development and distribution or the making over in perpetuity to a few corporations the net income to be derived from the use of electrical energy in this state. "The waters of California are, and by right ought to be the property of the People of California," has been resolved by many a convention, but not yet has the law been made to conform to that self evident truth. If the waters belong to the people so do the snows from which the waters are derived, likewise the electric energy derived from the down-pouring of those waters from the higher mountains.

Here is a problem that may engross the best thought of our best men. It is time for these best men to associate themselves for the performance of this service. The legislature can not be trusted to handle the issue with discretion without outside guidance and pressure. Where is the man of the hour to lead this cause?

THE STATE'S RESPONSIBILITY.

It is to be feared that the recent accident on the Rock Island railroad, in which all the occupants of a tourist car were crushed to death or burned, will be followed by an unusual number of similar disasters during the coming twelve months. The reason for the apprehension is the perfectly well-known fact that since the panic of 1907 the railroads of the country have reduced operating expenses to the lowest notch, succeeding so well in doing it that although there has been a large loss in gross earnings, the net earnings have been good almost beyond precedent. This policy has saved dividends, but it has also resulted in such impairment of equipment and track, but more especially the latter, that, on the simple doctrine of chances, there must be more accidents than there were before the expense of maintenance of way was skimmed.

The railroad managers know the danger, and they have commenced to improve their roadbeds again, but it will take time to recover the lost ground, and meantime it is reasonable to expect an increased number of accidents. An additional reason for anticipating a run of disasters is that the hardest strain upon the debilitated railroad systems is going to come during the period of reviving business, because there is a direct relation between the liability to accidents and the amount of work to be done. In the last year or two there has been a relatively small number of them, as the late report of the Interstate Commission showed, due in large part to the slackness of business, which led to some reduction in the number of trains and the employment of none but the best workmen; with greater pressure of traffic, such as may be anticipated this year, the test of the deteriorated roadbeds will be severe. These conditions are general throughout the West, though the Southern Pacific and the Santa Fe lines are probably in better shape than some others, because, although they, too, have skimmed, they were in better shape when the trouble began.

All of this is preliminary to saying that the policy of the states in dealing with the vastly important subject of railroad accidents leaves much to be desired. There could hardly be a higher duty of government in these times than to make the lives of travelers as safe as they can be rendered within the limits of profitable railroading, and yet few states make a serious pretense of investigating accidents, and up to this time the whole subject has been left pretty much to the railroads themselves on the theory that since they are called on to face the financial responsibility for accidents they will do everything which can be done to prevent them. Yet most of the great roads refused to adopt certain safety appliances until compelled by the federal government to do so, and in times of business depression all companies let their maintenance of way run down, as we have already noted. The least that the state can in justice do is to investigate the causes of serious accidents, fix the responsibility, and compel the speedy adoption of improved methods of construction, equipment and operation when their value has been demonstrated.

This recalls to memory the fact that the Wright railroad bill passed by the California legislature at its last session imposed on the state commission the duty of investigating accidents, but the public has not yet heard of much official activity along that line.

THE VERY FRANK MR. FICKERT.

The coming into court of District Attorney Charles M. Fickert, asking that the Calhoun and other United Railroads indictments be dismissed, was startling. It was anticipated that the liberation of the grafters would be sought more circuitously, but Fickert appears to be nothing if not frank. He gave it as his opinion that he cannot convict the accused on the testimony in his possession. Probably he cannot. Where Francis J. Heney failed there is small encouragement for Fickert to try. Besides, he was neither nominated nor elected with the expectation that he would try. This is not saying that there was any agreement not to, but only that there was a consensus of expectation to that effect. The majority voted the effort to convict malefactors of great wealth futile and anticipated that the election of Fickert would bring the graft prosecutions to an end. In moving to dismiss Mr. Fickert was meeting the expectations of his friends in the frankest, bluntest, speediest way possible.

To be sure there is evidence enough to convict, as there is evidence enough to convince, if only a jury could be empanelled that would be truly representative of public opinion, for the public is convinced—every man of it—that Patrick Calhoun caused to be paid to Abraham Ruef, through Tiley L. Ford, the said $200,000. Fickert himself admits, what no sane man would deny, that the supervisors were bribed. If they were bribed somebody bribed them. Who was it? Was it Ruef? If so, then who furnished Ruef the money? Even Ruef, in the affidavit which Fickert cites as showing that he cannot prove, through Ruef, that he obtained the bribe money from Calhoun, is careful not to say that he did not receive money from the United Railroads, Calhoun or Ford, but only that he did not receive it for the purpose of bribing the supervisors. Of course he did not. Bribers do not do things that way. They do not specify who is to be bribed or how much each is to receive. All they ask for their money is that the goods be delivered. They are careful to leave the details to the negotiator. Probably Ruef would swear that he received the $200,000 as an attorney fee, a retainer, but however he received it God Almighty, and the California public, knows that it was bribe money and nothing else and it ought not to require more to convince any jury of the guilt of Calhoun, Ford, et als, than to show that such a sum of money was paid to Ruef and that it came from the United Railroads. That has been shown at each of the trials so convincingly that no man, no friend of the defendants even, has the face to deny its truth.

Judge Lawlor was probably wise in refusing to dismiss and ordering the Calhoun case to trial. No case ought to be dismissed where the evidence is such that a conviction ought to be had, and yet the going on with the case, with a reluctant prosecutor, can have only one result—the whitewashing of the defendants one and all. Thank God the whitewash will be so thin and so transparent as to deceive no one as to the guilt of the parties charged. They will carry the deep damnation of their crimes to their graves with them, and then on to a higher court where no accumulations of moth-eaten and mouldy traditions and precedents can stand between them and their deserts.

On with the trials. We shall see of what material this our new District Attorney is made.

Who Shall Hold It for a Rise?

Is or is it not a good thing to have one man own a million acres of California timber lands? Mr. T. B. Walker, the man who does this, thinks it is a good thing, and he argues that in large holdings the forests are safer than in small holdings, because great capital ists will protect their property more systematically from dangers of destruction by fire than will small capitalists and because the lands will not be lumbered so soon if kept in large holdings on speculation.

That is, Mr. Walker believes this provided the burden of taxation be made easier for the wholesale speculators than it has grown to be in late years, but he entertains gloomy forebodings of what will become of the California forests if taxes are kept up. It has been figured that the average acre of timber land in California is assessed at $8, and that the state and county taxes thereon amount to twenty cents per year. Putting it that way, does it appear that the taxes constitute so terrible a burden? Would not almost any of us, owning an acre of thrifty timber, muster the twenty cents per year and carry the property a few years in the hope that it would appreciate in value? But it is different—at least it looks different—if one owns a million acres, as Mr. Walker does, because then one's taxes amount to $200,000 per year, and that is quite a sum of money even to a timber-land king.

How many of us will weep for the impoverished owner of a million acres of California forest? Not many, probably, and yet the preservation for prudent use of our forests is a consideration not second in importance to any other, but it may be doubted if the common good be consistent with the private holding of forest property on speculation. How would it do for the state of California to take over Mr. Walker's holdings at a fair valuation, conserve and utilize as the market requires for the mutual benefit of the ultimate consumer and the public treasury? This may be paternalism, but is it a good thing for California to permit Mr. T. B. Walker, or his heirs, to say when and how a million acres of its choicest timber lands may be cut over? Look the proposition frankly in the face. Is it best for the common good?

The Democrats to Be Sorely Tempted.

No political party is to be more sorely tempted in this year of grace than the Democratic, and right here in California. Men high in Republican "organization" councils are known to have expressed the opinion that this is to be a Democratic year. The palpable division in the ranks of the Republicans at Washington and in California tend to encourage this view. In short, notice has been served upon some of the leaders of the Democratic party in California that if that party will be conservative in its nominations (not necessarily in its resolutions and platforms) the corporation influence can be thrown their way this time in the event that the Lincoln-Roosevelters win out in the Republican primaries. The logic of the situation, if nothing more, is notice to that effect.

Will our Democratic brethren be able to withstand the temptation to sacrifice the essential principles of free government to party success? The Satan of corporate domination will beguile them if he can. There is not a politician for revenue only among them all who will not jump at the chance to make such a traffic arrangement with the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau.

It will not be by their platforms and resolutions that we shall know them, but by the men who are brought before the people for nomination for office. Theodore Bell has no mortgage on the nomination for governor. E. O. Miller or "Constitutional John" Curtin may easily be substituted for him, as may any one of half a dozen others, not omitting former Mayor Snyder of Los Angeles. The zeal of some of these men for popular government as distinguished from corporate is so new as to suggest hothouse propagation. The Democratic party in California is to be tried as by fire. Will it stand the test? Watch it.

A Square Deal For Webb.

The California Weekly holds no brief for the defense of Attorney General U. S. Webb. The promptings of its instincts are to oppose him. All the political preferment he has enjoyed in this state came to him through "organization" influence and he has always been an "organization" man. We have not heard that he has made overtures to any of the leaders of the Lincoln-Roosevelt league for support at the primaries for renomination and election to the office of attorney general. We do not even know that he is or intends to be a candidate, but we do know that some of the statements made about him by Geo. A. Van Smith in the Call of February 4th, were not warranted by the fact.

It is not true that there was no essential difference between the "Webb" and the "Wright" railroad regulation bills. They differ at many points, as a section by section comparison of the two will disclose and, where they differ, the "Webb" bill is good and the "Wright" bill is bad. General Webb stood by his bill to the end, while Governor Gillett, who is supposed to have had some share in preparing the Webb bill, quietly laid down on it and privately supported the Wright substitute for it. And every one knows that it was the "Wright" and not the "Webb" bill that the "organization" fought for.

But the railroad rate bill was only one count in the case which the Southern Pacific's political bureau has against Webb. He made a splendid fight for the recovery for the people of the San Pedro water front, and the water front at Sacramento. His part in the investigation of discriminatory rates seems to have been upright and courageous. In short, General Webb has, within the last two years at least, done some good big things, to which this paper has already called attention, that are unquestionably Right Things, and The California Weekly is of the opinion that it is because of these Right Things that Webb has done that the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau has thrown him over.

This is not saying that the support of Frank McGowan for attorney general by the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau may not have been, as Van Smith says it was, the result of a bargain between that bureau and the McCarthy push here in San Francisco. Very likely it was, but the throwing over of Webb did not enter into that transaction. That had been prearranged.

Wipe Out That Deficiency.

Congress and the press is much exercised over the deficiency in the postoffice department of the United States government. That deficiency ought not to exist. The postoffice department is no longer an infant industry. It ought to be self sustaining without protection. The only new feature that may need subsidizing until it can be made self sustaining is rural free delivery and if a parcels post were established on a liberal basis even this valuable department of the public service would soon pay its own way.

President Taft and the Postmaster General are of the opinion that the periodicals of the country do not pay their own way. They are probably mistaken, but if they do not they ought to. The great source of profit to the department is in the first class mail matter—the letters. The rate is 2 cents per ounce, but on an average letters weigh less than half an ounce each, so the rate received is actually 64 cents per pound, an enormously profitable rate. The "what the traffic will bear," principle is not a bad one for the government to apply. To be sure it involves the power to tax, but that power is inherent in government as it is not in transportation companies. Letters will stand a 2 cents per ounce rate while periodicals may not stand 2 cents per pound.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

"Is there any greater contempt than that of the brave man for cowardice and that of the straightforward man for insincerity? Yes; two—the contempt of the ignorant man for knowledge and of the soulless man for ideals."

The foregoing, from the Fresno Republican, contains about as much of human wisdom as may be packed into thirty-eight words. The bravery of the brave man may be a matter of physical constitution, of iron nerves, as the cowardice of the timid man may be the result of a delicate inheritance, of a lack of nurture prior to birth. Lincoln's "legs cases," constantly appealed to him. He, himself, was a brave man, there were none more brave, but he could appreciate the plight of the relatively few whose legs ran away with them whenever the minies began to go screaming by and the shells to whimper overhead.

The straightforward man loves sincerity, but he can put up with insincerity as a form of moral cowardice, a species of legs case that runs away from truth through fear of consequences. Insincerity is the native weapon of the weak and whoever resorts to insincerity proclaims his own weakness. Strong characters pity weakness rather than cherish contempt for it.

The ignorant man's contempt for knowledge is the result of his ignorance, a badge of stupidity for the possession of which he may or may not be to blame. By reason of his attitude toward learning the ignorant man ever stands in his own light, and he, himself, and those immediately dependent upon him, are the chief sufferers because of his stupidity. It is generally a family matter and seldom becomes of serious public consequence unless the family of the ignoramus becomes a public charge.

But the case of the soulless man is different. His malady is contagious. No brave person can be induced to become cowardly through the example of a coward, and few sincere men can be enticed into becoming insincere through the unwholesome example of any Janus-faced double-dealer. The spectacle is too disgusting. And when was there ever an ignorant man whose figure in society led others to wish to be ignorant also?

With the soulless man it is indeed different. He it is who thinks only of self. He is ever reaching out for some personal advantage and, unless he be stupid and ignorant, he is not unlikely to get what he reaches after, and so become an example of thrift and worldly success in a world that is all too much inclined to overrate mere acquisition. Such a man may blot out many a soul beside his own. He may share his contempt for men of ideals with a hundred others in a year. If he be a good grabber his trail through life may be tracked by the wreckage of the shattered ideals of all those who came within his sphere of influence. He is as contagious as scabies.

Old Isaac Watts was not quite right in rounding off his verse by declaring that, "The mind is the standard of the man." He was nearer the truth when he said that, "I must be measured by my soul." We judge men with righteous judgment only when we judge them by their ideals. If one have the ideals of a hog he will be a hog, if of a man he will be a man. The soulless man has nothing but contempt for the man with lofty ideals, and the man with lofty ideals nothing but sorrow for the man without ideals, which also is the equivalent of being without a soul.

Books appear to some men as odors: Burns, they say, smells like a rose; Swift stinks. To others, they are colors: Keats is golden; Shelley, crystalline; Carlyle, pitch tinged with the flames of red. To others, they are mere things, repositories of ideas: they well, they are no poets, surely.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Adding to Colorado's Tillable Domain.

The total of lands now under irrigation in Colorado, and these comprise a large part of the lands that are valuable for agricultural and horticultural purposes, is estimated by reliable authority at 2,317,255 acres. To this amount it is estimated that fully 1,000,000 acres will be added during 1910 by irrigation enterprises now under way, and it is further estimated that during the year 1911 at least as much more will be added. That is, the irrigated part of the state will be about doubled during the next two years. Come now and let us reason together concerning what this means to the state of Colorado and its people. Every ten acres of this rich land which is to be taken from the horned toad and given to man ultimately will be sufficient to support a family in American comfort. That is to say, 200,000 families will be given a chance to live where none now could live. Say that there are five persons in an average family. Mental arithmetic will suffice; you need not get out your pencil and paper to demonstrate that a million will be added to Colorado's population capacity. There should be good times ahead for the Centennial State, and all because of that intelligent use of water which makes the wilderness to blossom as the rose.

Fourth American City in Size.

Just by way of a rough guess what city would you say was the fourth in America in size? New York easily is the first, Chicago as easily is the second, Philadelphia is third—but the fourth? The answer is not so easy, and it is not so easy for the reason that we are trying to find this fourth city within the confines of the United States, and it is not here. It is Buenos Aires, which, as everybody knows, is in Argentine Republic, South America. The census of that city which was completed on October 22, 1909, showed that the population numbered 1,189,662. Moreover, this was an increase in five years of 238,771, or somewhat more than 5 per cent. per annum. It is reported, too, that Buenos Aires now is growing more rapidly than it has at any time in the past, though it need but equal its record of the past five years to have a population of more than 1,700,000 in 1920. It is evident that the hour of progress has struck for some parts of long-slothful South America, and other parts still are but waiting to catch the first echo of its chime.

The Food Supply Not Diminishing.

In a recent address in congress Representative Douglas of Ohio contended that "our food supply, raised upon our farms, has not kept pace relatively with our increase in population," and quoted various statistics, the source of which is not given in the despatches, to demonstrate that his assertion accords with the fact. It is regrettable that Mr. Douglas apparently did not mention where he found his statistics, for, as they are in controversion of those given by the Department of Agriculture, it would be interesting to know how much, if any, credence should be given to them. In its latest report, published but a few weeks ago, the department reported the amount of various food stuffs, per capita of population, raised in the period from 1866 to 1875 inclusive, and again in the period from 1905 to 1908 inclusive. In the earlier period the wheat per capita raised was 6.2 bushels, in the later period, 7.9; corn, earlier period 24.6, later 31.8; oats, 6.9, and 9.8; barley .7, and 1.9; rye .5, and .4; potatoes 3, and 3.4. These are the principal grains, etc., and it will be noted that, notwithstanding representative Douglas' assertion, they have more than "kept pace relatively with our increase in population," if the Department of Agriculture is to be believed. With respect to the meat supply the report is not so encouraging, although it might be worse. Per capita of population there has been a decrease in sheep from 80 to 64 in swine from 69 to 64, and in milch cows from .25 to .24, but there is an increase in other cattle from .37 to .58. So it will be seen that there should be no shortage in beef, whatever there may be in mutton and pork. Either prevailing high prices are not generally due to short supply or the Department of Agriculture has made a serious error.

Palestine for the Jews.

Slowly, peaceably, but surely, the Jews are recovering their ancient home, Palestine, and during the last few years they have taken great strides in this direction. This has been especially the case since Turkey's new constitution opened the country to them. It is said that four-fifths of the population of Jerusalem now is composed of Hebrews. The lands around Lake Tiberias and the plains of Sharon and Esdraelon now are farmed by Jews, while capitalists of that race are rapidly purchasing the valley of the Jordan. From Dan to Beersheba their colonies extend, and, in fact, the entire Holy Land, not long ago overrun and dominated by Mohammedans, now is largely occupied and developed by Jews. Synagogues are being erected everywhere, and Jerusalem alone has more than one hundred Jewish schools. A long time have they wandered, but the dream of their wise men of old seems to be "coming true."

Alcoholization and Deterioration.

"No nation shows so much deterioration as the English, and there is no nation that is so alcoholized." Notwithstanding that the foregoing assertion was made by an Englishman of some repute, it is not necessary to believe its first clause, at any rate, nor is it likely that many will do so. The remark was made by Dr. Albert Wilson in an address before the Society for the Study of Inebriety, of London, and some of the alleged facts to which he called attention are worthy of consideration. For example, he asserts that about one million persons are arrested annually in the United Kingdom, and 60 to 70 per cent. of these arrests are due to over-indulgence in alcoholic drinks. On what the authority for this statement is based Doctor Wilson does not say, and it might puzzle him to do so, but the records of criminal courts in general will indorse him to some extent. Doctor Wilson said, further, that the United Kingdom's executioner, who had executed more than 600 criminals, informed him that in four cases out of five the crimes of his victims were due to drink, and there is not much reason to believe that the executioner lied. So runs the tale as the doctor tells it, and it is an old, old story, with chapters that are applicable in other countries than Great Britain.

Fire That Burned Fifty-one Years.

About two years before the beginning of the Civil War, or, to be exact, on February 15, 1859, fire was discovered in an anthracite coal mine near Summit Hill in northeastern Pennsylvania. Some two or three weeks ago it was extinguished, but, from the time it was discovered until then, it had burned constantly, consuming, it is estimated, $25,000,000 worth of coal. Numerous attempts had been made to extinguish it, but none were successful, and it doubtless still would have been burning had it not become apparent that it was about to spread into Lansford valley, where $2,000,000,000 worth of coal would have been endangered. This situation called for strenuous and even heroic measures, and they were adopted, with success.

Women Marrying Later in Life.

The contention that women now marry later in life than they formerly did appears to be borne out, at least so far as Great Britain is concerned, by statistics compiled by the Royal Statistical Society. According to these statistics, the average age of the women who married in 1896 was twenty-five years and one month. About twelve years thereafter this average age had increased to twenty-five years six and one-half months.

Large Beneficences.

During the year 1909 Elizabeth F. Noble left $500,000 to humane and antivivisection societies; Mrs. Sarah Morris, widow of the Chicago beef packer, left $400,000 to a hospital for children; Mrs. Sarah Todd of Carlisle, Pa., left $750,000 to a home for aged women; Lady Cook, formerly Tennessee Claflin of New York, gave $1,000,000 to the cause of women suffrage; Miss Helen Frick gave a playground to Pittsburg; Miss Edith Rockefeller McCormick gave $200,000 to beautify Lake Forest, Ill., and Miss Caroline Phelps-Stokes gave $300,000 for negro schools and tenement houses.

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHELF.
The Poems of Robert Burns.

The poet of the people, the poet of democracy, is Robert Burns. More than either of these, he is the poet of manhood, the sort of manhood Brutus had, the manhood eulogized by Burns in "the honest man's the noblest work of God," and "a man's a man for a' that."

Burns had grievous faults, but he had a heart and a conscience, and nobly he repented his misdeeds and manfully he made public confession of them. His faults were the faults of too much vitality, too ardent spirits, too much eagerness to enjoy all the sensations of abounding youth. But with them went a passionate love of goodness, a genuine and deep reverence for sincere piety, a consuming hunger for the happiness of all men and an equally intense sympathy with all human hopes and sorrows. Another attribute was the complement of these: a fierce hatred of hypocrisy, of cant, of injustice, of oppression, of pride of place, of all those things that throw up artificial and injurious barriers between man and man. Burns's exhortations of these things are as terrible as his lyrics and love songs are tender. "Holy Willie's Prayer" is a type of the one, and the "Lines on a Field Mouse" are typical of the other state of feeling, both states rooted in the same passion for justice and in the same overflowing love for all good and innocent things.

Poor Bobbie, "ye asked for bread and they hae gien ye a stane," as his old mother said. But, on the other hand, he said of himself that he longed with unbelievable ardor for fame. Fortunate Burns, he has his wish, and, more and better, the abiding affection of humanity.

A THEATRE FOR THE MASSES.

Charles Frohman is to build a new theatre on the east side, in Rivington street, where the working classes will be able to see all the latest Broadway plays at low prices, the highest-priced seat to be fifty cents, says the New York Times. The theatre is expected to be on the east side what The New Theatre is to the west side. It is expected to be in operation by next September, and it will be conducted in every sense as a "people's, or poor man's," theatre. Mr. Frohman has an ambitious plan of having well-known playwrights like J. M. Barrie, Bernard Shaw, and Henri Bernstein contribute plays without royalty.

The name of the playhouse is to be The East Side Theatre, and it will be unique in many ways. According to Mr. Frohman it is to be a place where the working classes can see the best that is to be had in the modern drama, acted by a capable company, headed by a succession of prominent stars. Mr. Frohman frankly states that his plan is designed to increase the number of people who want to see good plays.

In many instances it is expected that prominent players will volunteer their services in order to keep the venture self-supporting. The theatre will be located on or near Rivington street, where Mr. Frohman now has under consideration a structure which can easily be converted into a good-sized theatre.

"A great many new theatres have lately gone up," said Mr. Frohman last night, "and a great many old ones also. For the most part, I am interested in building new plays, not new theatres. There is, however, one more that I intend to build, namely, the one on Rivington street, in which the best stars and plays will be given on the east side. The west side is well taken care of by The New Theatre. Its splendid productions and its fine actors have proved that some plays need not have long runs. Now I want to give the east side the best stars with plays that have had long runs. It will add one more theatre to the list, but I think it will make thousands of new theatregoers."

In books are all men, all times, all arts, all wars, all industries, all knowledge, all wisdom, all records of things past, all prophecies of things to be.

OF LONG BOOKS.

I have just come to the last chapter of a very long book, as books are considered these days—Taine's History of English Literature. It is in two volumes, of wide leaves and type smaller than this, about eleven hundred pages in all. I can hear you groan. And, thinking of our writers of the day, you may well groan; conceive, if you can, which one of them could interest you to the thousandth page, and instruct you on every page.

This monstrous thing Taine does. He has taken the significant figures of all English literature, from before Chaucer to Tennyson, and has revealed the national origins of their genius, the continuity of their national spirit, and the philosophical principles that underlie their creation. In a sense, this is an encyclopedia of facts; if it were no more, it would be murderously dull. In another sense, it is a romance of genius, with English poets for its heroes; if it were no more, it would be interminably futile. But, as it is both history and romance, it is at once informing, and illuminating, and suggestive, and interesting.

My purpose in so describing Taine's work as both interesting and long is to call attention for a moment to the vicious mutilation of ideas involved in the modern craze for brevity in books. To accommodate our reading to the perennial interruptions of modern life, we have made endless books of "half hours with great authors," "little masterpieces of fiction, poetry, or what not," "great moments of great orators," and a thousand other devices for the quick consumption of the most highly spiced portion of every great man's work, utterly disregarding the attendant danger of dyspepsia from such a diet and equally disregarding the certainty of vitiating the appetite so that we shall never be able to relish an intellectual square meal again. It is stimulating to have a great truth thrust forever upon the mind by reading Hamlet's soliloquy in a collection of "gems from the masters," but the reader who does so does not know Hamlet, nor Shakespeare.

There is no space here in which to amplify the idea, but is it not worth while to consider whether it is not really more entertaining as well as more profitable to follow one rounded, orderly, sequent, and completed work of the mind, even though it be long and though the spare moments of many weeks be required, than it is to catch ten thousand unconnected though pretty glimpses into the doors and windows of great souls through the medium of extracts and synopses and abbreviations and "made-easies" of current manufacture?

Californian Poets' Corner

HOME.

By Edward Rowland Sill.

It is said that when he wrote this beautiful little poem Edward Rowland Sill had in mind the Mountain View Cemetery in Oakland, the "little city in the hills," in which lie so many of the former inhabitants of the bay cities.

There lies a little city in the hills;
White are its roofs, dim is each dwelling's
door,
And peace with perfect rest its bosom fills.

There the pure mist, the pity of the sea,
Comes as a white, soft hand, and reaches o'er
And touches its still face most tenderly.

Unstirred and calm, amid our shifting years,
Lo! where it lies, far from the clash and roar,
With quiet distance blurred, as if thro' tears

O heart, that prayest so for God to send
Some loving messenger to go before
And lead the way to where thy longings end,

Be sure, be very sure, that soon will come
His kindest angel, and through that still door
Into the Infinite love will lead thee home.

A NEW STORY BY TOLSTOY.

The latest story of Leo Tolstoy deals with a legend entitled "The Work of God" he is accustomed to tell the companions of his walks in the neighborhood of Jasnaja-Poljana, says the New York Sun. The legend as Tolstoy relates it is as follows:

In a far land there lived a king whose soul was filled with care as old age approached. "I have," he said, "during my life enjoyed everything and seen everything possible for the human eye to see; but there is one thing which in my life I have never seen, and that is God. Him I will see!" And turning to his counsellors and dignitaries and priests he commanded them on pain of being thrown into jail and heavily punished to show him God before three days had passed.

The courtiers sadly waited the expiration of the period and at the end of it were summoned before the king. They continued to keep silence, and the king was about to order them to prison when a poor shepherd at that moment approached and addressed the king.

"Sire," he prayed, "grant me a wish."
"It is well," replied the king, "but, remember, your life is at stake."

And the shepherd led the king to a place, pointed to the blazing sun, and said, "Look up!" The king raised his head and tried to look at the shining mass, but the sun's rays dazzled him and he lowered his head and closed his eyes.

"What mean you?" he asked. "Would you have me blinded?"

Thereupon said the shepherd: "Sire, that is only one of the creations of God, a single ray of His glory, a small corner of His brightly burning throne. How then can you expect to see God with your weak and weeping eyes? You must endeavor to see God with other eyes."

The king was pleased and said: "I honor your intelligence and the understanding of your soul. Answer me therefore the following question: What was before God?"

The shepherd thought for a while, then spoke: "I pray you sire, not to be angry, but—count."

The king began: "One, two, three—"
"No, no," interrupted the shepherd: "You don't count right; you don't begin to count before one."

"How is that possible?" objected the king. "There is nothing before one."

"A wise word, sire," said the shepherd: "neither was there anything before God."

The king, still more pleased with the shepherd's wisdom, continued: "I will richly reward you, but answer me one more question—what does God do?"

"Good," replied the shepherd boy, "I will reply. But first change garments with me."

And the king took off his royal robes and put them on the shepherd, clothing himself as a shepherd. And the shepherd ascended the throne, took the sceptre in his hand, and pointing to the king standing at the foot of the throne said: "That is what God does. One He raises to the throne, another He drives away from it." And he resumed his shepherd's clothing.

The king stood for a while deep in thought. At last he raised his head and exclaimed in tones of joy, "Yes, now I see God!"

A new novel by James Lane Allen, for spring publication, is "A Brood of the Eagle." As in the others of Mr. Allen's stories, the scene is rural Kentucky. The direct personal theme of the novel is the noble but unfortunate love of a country doctor.

The former Empress of France, Eugenie, has once more given a categorical denial to the statement that she has written her memoirs. About six months ago her secretary printed a denial in the Paris Figaro and recently he sent a letter to the Times declaring that "she has not written and is not writing any memoirs, and that any publication of that kind would be apocryphal." This letter bears the date January 9th.

FIGHTING THE DEVIL WITH FIRE

"WORK TEST," "FREE FLOPS," AND RELIGION ON THE BARBARY COAST.

Down in the toughest part of the toughest district in San Francisco—namely, on lower Pacific street, the "Barbary Coast"—you may happen on a short, stocky man with a square jaw and clear eyes and a stubby mustache, whose gait and manner give you the impression of great physical strength, of vitality of spirits, and of a positive, aggressive personality. You will always find him busy. He works from early morning until midnight, every day in the year. He handles large sums of money, directs large enterprises, bosses many men. He has been at work in this district for five years, with a growing burden of labor and responsibility upon him, yet with a growing optimism and cheerfulness. And he has yet to receive one cent of salary for his work. The clothes he wears are neat, but they are second-hand clothes, the gift of charity.

This man's name is J. C. Westenberg. He is busy fighting the devil. He does not think of this devil as the polite Christian of an uptown congregation does: he thinks of the devil as a genuine citizen of the district, who sends drunken, broken men to him, ruined girls, hopeless and wrecked boys, from the saloons and dance halls and brothels next door and up and down both sides of his street. This devil is eternally busy, and only an energetic and aggressive man can hope to keep up the fight against him.

Mr. Westenberg is no kid-gloved acquaintance of this devil. He got acquainted with him through whiskey, gambling, and the jail. He used to be on intimate terms with him when he was a "booster" for a joint south-of-Market in "the old days," as he calls them, when he used to bum free drinks and turn a little money on the side with the cards. As a result, he knows the tricks this devil uses and, better for his present purpose, he knows the soul of the men and women upon whom this devil works, as he knows their slang and their life and their haunts.

So, when he "got religion" he got a call to fight this devil—got the call direct from a Power as personal and real and immanent in his eyes as this devil is. And, being a forthright man and a born fighter, he promptly "went to him" with his fighting blood up, and he has stayed with the fight where it was sure to be the hottest.

First, however, he married a woman of his own convictions and with the same fighting strain, and they have been as one in the trouble ever since. So, in this article, wherever "he" is spoken of, it must be understood that she is at his side, inspiring his fighting arm.

He started the "Whosoever-Will" Rescue Mission in a basement under a saloon on Pacific street, in the heart of the tenderloin, May 1, 1904. The first night about thirty people from an uptown church came down to help, and about half as many "sinners" from the street dropped in. The second night, about sixteen "Christians" came down, and a few more "sinners." Pretty soon, the audience was all sinners and no Christians. It afterwards developed that some of the Christians had caught some of the sinners' vermin and had stayed away thereafter in disgust. This phase of "going into the highways and hedges" might have been all right in the days of the Good Samaritan, but modern sensibilities are "different"—with some people.

Not so with the Westenbergs. They calmly boiled their clothes every night and stayed in the basement. From the basement they went into the street, where they encountered worse troubles. The saloon keepers threw rotten eggs at them, poured buckets of stale beer on them from the roofs, "sicked" the police and the fire department on them. The Westenberg's only regret was that they could not get as big a crowd as they wanted.

Finally somebody told Mr. Westenberg that a similar mission somewhere gave free coffee to the men. He painted a big sign and hung it out: "Free Coffee—Now!" The sinners came for the coffee. They got it, and some straight-arm religion in the lingo they understood. Some of them got religion, all of them got coffee, the Westenbergs got a hearing for their appeal. That was all they asked.

Some of the more worthy sinners were out of a job and had no place to sleep. Mr. Westenberg got a few beds and let eight men in every night. Others, just as worthy, had no place to sleep, and asked to be allowed to use the floor. Mattresses were thrown down and more men let in. Floor space gave out and an attic was opened up and floored with pieces of old boxes, and more men accommodated. Finally, the mattresses gave out, and Mr. Westenberg regretfully told applicants that he could not do anything for them. A typical bum appealed from the edict.

"Well, you c'n give a fellow a free flop somewhere on the floor, can't you?"

He could, and did. From this idea has now grown a system of "free flops" that are nightly accepted with gratitude by hundreds of men. The present free flop consists in the applicant giving his underwear to the attendant for deposit overnight in a fumigator, the applicant accepting in exchange a free shower bath under hot water and a coarse blanket in which to lie on a bare plank bunk during the night. This sounds like rough treatment, but it is a godsend to a man who is down on his luck, to whom this rude substitute for a Turkish bath means refreshment, cleansing, and a night's lodging. The eagerness with which it is accepted is proof of its attractions.

Later came the idea of providing cheap meals. The experiment was tried, and proved a success. But in many cases the unfortunates have not the price of even the cheapest meal. The answer to this need was "the work test." "If you want a meal, we'll let you earn it." Men were set to work picking up cast-off goods—cases and other refuse wood. A wood-yard was established, and so many hours a day at the wood-pile was the price of three meals and a bed. If a man showed by his work that he was anxious for work, he could get a day off when he wanted it, to look for a job. This system continues, and has tided thousands of men over a period of destitution.

But to get back to the devil. The fire of 1906 put the "Barbary Coast" and the mission out of business together. The Westenbergs moved to Oakland and started a mission and a woodyard there. But in July, 1907, they came back to "the coast." They hadn't a cent in the world, but they leased an abandoned saloon for $100 a month and went to work. When the rent was due they were $20 short, but the collector failed to come around on time, and before he got there two strangers came in, on separate days, and slipped money into Mr. Westenberg's hand and ran out without leaving their names. These timely contributions made a few cents over $20. The incident sounds like a fairy tale or a lie. It is neither. The Westenbergs say "the Lord did it." The writer doesn't pretend to know, but it happened, just the same.

The work prospered, and finally began to spread. Mr. Westenberg got hold of another ramshackle building and put up more beds. These were soon filled nightly. He found a loft on Pacific street, directly opposite the mouth of Bartlett alley. The loft had been used as a herding place for Japanese prostitutes. Mr. Westenberg transformed it into a men's lodging house, where a hundred and more men find nightly shelter. Bartlett alley, opposite, is a solid block of houses of prostitution. To-day, across the street from its mouth, when men crane their heads fearfully up and down to be sure they are not detected leaving the alley, their eyes fall upon a sign, with letters two feet high, "Be sure your sin will find you out."

Up in the next block on Pacific street is the ramshackle remains of the house of ill fame which was run by Schmitz and Ruef up to the time of the indictments by the Oliver grand jury. To-day, this place is occupied by bunks for a hundred-odd homeless men. Just beyond it is "the wine dump," a famous dispensary of cheap wine in bulk. Mr. Westenberg put up a sign in flaming red letters that are contrasted with the bare wall of "the wine dump," warning the public that "wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging." The dump's owners and patrons do not like to be reminded of the fact, and they shy bricks through the sign at every opportunity. But it stays up.

All this sounds crude, and it is. But Mr. Westenberg's personal devil uses some pretty raw devices, himself, and Mr. Westenberg is fighting the devil with fire, and naturally he uses brimstone to do it. Incidentally, it is effective. Mr. Westenberg has reclaimed hundreds of men from a life of brutal degeneracy to a life of usefulness and self-respect. We may cavil at the methods: the results are the important things.

A still later expansion of the work is the Men's Industrial Home, at 619 Sansome street. Here a printing shop, a carpenter shop, and a barber shop provide temporary employment for the man out of a job. A hundred or more beds are also fitted up, besides the usual shower-bath and fumigator. A reading-room is another accessory, and a free employment bureau completes the equipment.

Here are some figures that show what the Westenbergs have done: To-day they run a cheap restaurant, a woodyard, a free bath-house and fumigator (the "free flop" place), shops to employ men, and five "shelters" where 500 to 1,000 men find nightly lodgings in the winter, and from 300 to 500 in the summer. They also manage a rescue home for girls, where the women are cared for and given a new start in the world. All of these are in San Francisco. In Oakland are a shelter and a woodyard.

In the five years of their work they have given out 910,580 cups of coffee, free; they have given baths to, and fumigated the clothes of, 25,000 men; they have supplied "free flops" to 227,645 men; they have applied the "work test" and given in exchange for it, beds to 71,445 men, and meals to 214,175 men; they have given Thanksgiving and Christmas dinners to 10,350 people. They have handled about $45,000 in money, of which they have kept a double-entry record of every cent. And, by their application of the "work test" to their beneficiaries, 60 per cent. of all this charity is self-sustaining. The remainder is made up by gifts of all sorts. The mission has been investigated and is endorsed by the church federation of San Francisco.

One method of raising funds is of unique value. The mission sells to charitable people a book of ten tickets for a dollar. The mission will redeem these tickets by a meal or by a bed and bath. The purchaser gives them to men who beg on the streets, instead of giving money. This guarantees that the charity will not be used to buy beer, and that, if the applicant is worthy, he will get what he needs most. Ninety-five per cent. of these tickets are used by the men who receive them. Some of these men, of course, are mere "bums," but hundreds of them really need the assistance these tickets bring.

I walked up Pacific street with Mr. Westenberg, when two drunken fellows flourished their fists and bawled senseless nothings at him. When they had passed I asked him how he handled the roughs who tried to break up his meetings. He stopped short and doubled the muscles of his right arm.

"Feel that," he said.

I was answered. There was a bunch of muscles as big as a Sallow's, and hard as oak. Mr. Westenberg's square jaw shut down and he added, grimly: "There are some mighty hard customers sometimes, but no man has ever yet come down the Barbary Coast that I couldn't put down and out."

I was reminded of Kipling's sailor who got religion and preached it on the cattle ships, who

"Always turned the other cheek, even as Scripture says,
But afterwards I knocked him down and led him up to grace."

Here, then, is a fighting Christian, who can put the fear of the Lord into the hearts of tough characters in a way they can under-

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Let Us Pretend.

Now let us pretend, my bonny Blue Eyes:
Now let us pretend together
That sweet are the blossoms, and blue are the skies,
And fair is our Summerland weather,
And let us pretend that the loyal and kind
Are many, the faithless are few.
Ah, sweet is pretending like this, for you'll find
It is true, little one, it is true.

Now we will pretend, my wee Golden Head,
Pretend as the bliss of all blisses,
One tucks you away in your own little bed
With prayers and the tenderest kisses,
And the kisses are blessings to lighten your load,
And the prayers all your strength shall renew
As you struggle along on the wearisome road—
And it's true, little one, it is true.

And, oh, we'll pretend, my bonnie, my own,
That never so far can we wander
Our faltering journey is wholly unknown
To One who is heeding Up Yonder;
We'll pretend, we'll pretend that He knows and He cares,
That His pity falls sweet as His dew,
And ever He stoops and our burden He shares—
And it's true, little one, it is true.

The Thoughtful Man on McCarthy.

"Well, we have him," said the Thoughtful Man.

"Have whom?" I inquired.
"Have McCarthy," was the reply. "That is,
I guess we have him, unless he has us. Sometimes I don't know whether he has us, or we have him, or either has neither, or neither has either, or both. 'Tis like the question about the small boy and the measles: Did Tommy have the measles, or did the measles have Tommy? Either answer is distressing.

"McCarthy had the labor vote, and we saw to it that he had the vote of capitalists and of those free-born American citizens whom we mention only after taking gas. So he was elected, and 'twas a noble victory for the Higher-ups. We were happily celebrating the joyous event, when we were made conscious of a low, sibilant, distressing sound like the last wheeze of a compressed windpipe. 'Twas McCarthy shutting off the wind from the scheme to sell Spring Valley at a price that would remunerate the widows and orphans, and 'twas a blow.

"This throttled our jubilations somewhat,
but we were endeavoring to resume them,
when there came a noise like an Apache war-dance. 'Twas McCarthy calling on labor to stand on its hind legs and resume control of the city. 'Rouse ye, Labor,' he says; 'git up,' says he, 'and take what belongs to ye. I have the key of the city for ye.'

"We were attempting to jubilate again, though it was sickly, when we heard a strange, clucking sound. 'Twas McCarthy talking Chinese. 'Allee timee fan-tan allee likee,' says he, and the yellow boys responded.

"I don't want to spring a prize conundrum on you," the Thoughtful Man concluded, "but I wish somebody would tell me whether we have McCarthy or he has us. Which do you suppose it is?"

"Ask the Higher-ups," says I.
"They're puzzled, too," said he.

Cruel and Inhuman Sentence.

"I dreamed that Calhoun had been convicted and sentenced."

"Yes?"
"Yes, but the higher court granted a new trial on the ground that the sentence was excessive, cruel and inhuman."

"What was the sentence?"
"That he be compelled to ride on his own street-cars daily between 5 and 7 o'clock in the afternoon."

The Laws Need Amendment, but—

"The laws need amendment," the President said.

"So that ne'er for a technical flaw
The rogues may escape the sentence they dread

And the feel of the halter's draw."
And the lawyers who honor their calling indeed

Responded, "Amen! May it be!
We tire of applying the technical creed
Which serveth the rascals to free."

But the lawyers who were of a certain kind
One eye, as in merriment shut,
And muttered, "There's cash in the game, we

"The laws need amendment," the Justice said,
"For ours is distortion of law.

But the rich find a technical flaw."

And the people responded, "Amen and amen!
We weary of technical fudge,

Of rich malefactors escaping the 'pen'
Because of the aid of a Judge."

Said the lawyer (he was of a certain style):
"There's coin in the technical rut,
So pardon, I prithee, my wink and my smile;

When She Holds Man Second.

In the pride of your untutored young manhood, Alonzo, you feel that man has vast influence with the gentler sex. In fact, you feel that you know this is so, for it was last evening—was it not?—that Mabel, her golden head resting upon your shoulder, assured you in sweet and tremulous accents that there was no sacrifice which her overwhelming love would not make for you. She believed herself, too, even as you believed her; but wait until you are married, and then see. Possessing some rudiments of good taste, or of taste that has not gone violently insane, you will some day entreat her about as follows:

"Mabel, in the name of all that is good and beautiful, I implore you never to wear one of these overwhelming hats which look like a decayed hope and cause the wearer to look like a horse-fly seeking refuge under a toadstool."

Mabel will look sympathetic, but she will endeavor to divert your mind by inquiring whether you think it will rain to-morrow. In vain; you will continue:

"And, my darling, if you love me and respect my agonized feelings, you will not disfigure that beauteous head by a wildly-tossing mop of hair clipped from the head of some misguided barbarian who needed it in her own business. Mabel, as you are mine and I am yours, promise me that I always shall be able to measure your captive hair with less than a ten-foot tapeline."

That ought to fetch her, ought it not,
Alonzo? But it will not. The dear girl really would like to please you, but now enters the influence compared with which that of man is a cheap article. The voice of Fashion has been heard, and let mere man stand out of the way.
The next time you meet Mabel on the street you won't know her unless you burrow beneath her hat, and then you won't because of her hair. It is tough for a man to have to be introduced to his only own wife, but lots of men have to come to it in these days.

I write it, Alonzo, not reproachfully, not chidingly, but as somber recognition of a dread fact. The blessed girls really would like to please us, they yearn to do so, but Fashion orders them to crucify their native beauty, and —well, what in thunder would you do, if you were a woman?

Bohemia, the Moon and Bispham.

(Submitted in sympathy, now that David Bispham has been engaged—for pay!—and Bohemia's jinks cannot be held in the full of the moon.)

Now ill betide that errant moon—
Oho!—
For it gets full too late or soon—
Ah, woe!—
To suit Bohemia's sylvan play,
And Bispham's coming, and for pay!
Can nymphs and sprites hide their dismay?
Oh, no!

Mc curses on pale Luna's crimes—
Ah me!—
Who gets full but at stated times,
You see.
Yet there is solace, I can prove,
For Bacchus treads not in a groove,
And none needs wait for Luna's move.
Tralee!

When Money Talks.

"Money talks," the saying goes.
Guess of words it's shy,
For all it ever says to me
Is merely this: "Good by."

Keep Joggin' 'Long.

Noticed this at divers times
While trav'lin' in the throng;
The way to reach your station is
To just keep joggin' 'long.

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

A HOPEFUL VIEW OF THINGS.

The following conversation is The California Weekly's answer to a question that we do not agree with, but we found it so interesting and so optimistic—from a rather novel basis of optimism, to be sure—that we cannot forego sharing it with our readers.—The Editor.]

The Editor,

The California Weekly,
San Francisco, Cal.

Dear Sir—I like you least when you take to talking in the terms of evolution, and diagnosing our human case in the language of the survival of the strong and of the fit. Dr. David Starr Jordan told Jack London once that he was badly in need of a college education to orient up his view point. Doctor Jordan isn't far from the office of The California Weekly. If a memory running back four years isn't elastic enough to have become sieve-like the biological syllabus of Doctor Jordan preaches quite another evolutionary decalogue than that to which you appeal.

In the first place Nature's never going to let you get away from the fact that she had as much to do with the making of man as any of the sub-human forms, and therefore had as much to do with the instilling into the hearts of men those qualities of hope, faith and charity, also citizenship and fellowship, as she did those qualities of conquest and struggle and fight and ruin practiced upon the weak by the conquering strong. Wherefore Nature backs up and fashionably buttresses about her moral law as firmly as she does her Jungle Law; each has its proper zone and its sphere. In either of the spheres he is a luckless cuss who tries to operate on the code of the other; the moralist is luckless and "appalled," as you put it, before the "un-moral" fact of some conquest of nature, only where he's preaching a false conception of the zone within which the moral law grew, thrived and has its being.

And therefore the sphere in which it is God's law, as there is that other sphere in which his is the Jungle Law.

The moralist is luckless who, for instance, would try to stand in the path of the throwing of our world's business onto the Big Unit basis. The Trust is wholly protected and entrenched by economic needs to which it gave an economic answer. It has come to remain, and the moralist who would try to harry it forth to destruction harries in vain, whether in muck-raking journal, prayerful pulpit, or insurging congressional seat. Nature, then—God's nature, and Christ's nature—is wholly on the side of the Trust. The moralist is only a self-confounded fool without warrant of God or man who weeps while it thrives.

And in addition to this there's another fact: it is just as inevitable and just as certain as its companion one: it is that the Big Business magnates will continue their march to jail, and will continue their stampede to social disgrace and defamation. The penitentiary doors will yawn for them just as hungrily as ever, and will stay right on the job till it gets them. Read your newspaper headlines to-day if you think Trust Magnates strong, save as a softening Christian fellowship comes into the world to make us different from what we are. "Walsh and Morse to Jail," is one headline I recall off hand. "The Ice Trust Indicted" is another, and what happened to the poor and recent H. O. Havemeyer you surely know. Foolhardy men were these first outcroppings of the Trust idea; they tried to tie to that Jungle Law and they did it in a zone where Nature fights only for the moral law. Those checks and balances by which Nature moves zig-zaggingly forward to its retributions and its progress move slow. They are the mills of the gods. Unconsciously or consciously The California Weekly in its birth and its history has been a part of them. Foolhardy men of the Trusts? The thing they did not take into account was that the very forces that made them possible—the telephone, telegraph, quick transportation, large horizons—also made possible and inevitable another thing: it forced onto the Big Unit basis the Neighborhood idea in life—just the same good, old fashioned neighborhood in which Uncle John and Aunt Mary and the home folks live and move and have their being—the same neighborhood that makes this letter from one in New York a friendly, neighborly letter to one on the continent's other edge.

And nature never yet established a neighborhood without therein buttressing about the human moral law or a sub-human counterpart. Watch the ant scouts gather in the beetle on which your heel has trod and you'll understand that—or, if convinced you must be, watch them carry it to the hill for the common good of all. And did you ever hear a roast on a trust that served instead of exploits? Did you ever hear of a Yankee merchant making a get-away of a wooden nutmeg trick on the groceryman around the corner from his saw mill? And believe me just as the wooden nutmeg man had to go to distant England to win you will never live to read of an exploiting trust saving itself from the sheer days of cleanup that are as surely ahead as the days of sunshine. The Trust—it was inevitable. The Harrimans, the Havemeyers, the Guggenheims—they will be driven out of the field of Big Business as surely as the strong ever went marching along over the weak. Havemeyer insulted me four times when, as a reporter, I sought to interview him; his successor, President Thomas, invited me to his office that he might tell the public things that it should know, and what he had learned through seeing what happened to Havemeyer, made him know it paid to tell. No, we need not wait for any new Christianizing force within the world, to emphasize the strength of clean, united civilization. The man nearest to God in all this world, I do not think to-day is in a pulpit. He is an American. He is nearer to God than any man ever was before him in all the history of the world. For there is no pathway up to God. There is only a hard mountain, heavily timbered and one who listens with his ear attuned to what is going on can hear the ringing of the ax that is carving out the way. The man who is nearest up to God is a friend of Mr. Roosevelt. He is a co-worker with Ida Tarbell and Ray Stannard Baker, and Jane Addams, and David Starr Jordan. He doesn't care much for religion, and art and literature are not engrossing his attention. Perhaps he is Norman Hapgood. The thing at which he is working is the job of cutting free our state, and our church and our press from its alliances with all things that are not kind and friendly and neighborly. He is spelling out to our Big Business brigands society's indictment and order of outlawry against them. He is spreading the zone of the neighborhood, which is not different whether among wolves, or bees, or Yankees, and has always been admirably governed in whatever size established, into the modern and inevitable Big Unit basis.

Very truly,

ISAAC RUSSELL.

stand, and who does it when he has to, but who prefers to give a "cup of cold water"—hot coffee—to every man, and a bed and a bath as well, and to trust in the Power that sent him here to get results in the salvation of souls. There may be artistic limitations to Mr. Westenberg's methods that the polite Christian of the Western Addition would shudder at, but my word for it that Mr. Westenberg is a man, and that he is doing a work none the less useful and noble for its being humble as well.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

League Trying to Reach A Consensus of Opinion

The Executive Committee of the Lincoln - Roosevelt Republican League held an all-day session Monday consulting as to who is best fitted for the head of the ticket. There was unanimity in favor of Hiram Johnson if he could be induced to accept the leadership, but he could not, because he could not be made to feel that his candidacy was either indispensable to the success of the reform movement or of the Republican party in the November election. If he could have been made to feel that indispensability doubtless his decision would have been different. The failure to agree upon another name was not the result of hostility to any of those who have been talked of as leaders of the ticket to go before the primary, but to a desire to think it over for another week before taking action. Consequently the committee will meet again on the fifteenth for another conference. What will be done after an agreement is reached is not now clear. Some think it best to get out with the requisite petitions without holding a larger conference, and others think that a representative convention of several hundred from all parts of the state will be better. That issue will probably be threshed out at the next meeting. The hope is to fix upon a candidate so satisfactory to Republicans of the state that there may be no division of the free government forces. The matter is in charge of able and conscientious men without a thought of self-seeking on the part of anyone of them for themselves or for their friends. The common good is the only good they seek.

Harris Weinstock Being Considered

There is a feeling among thoughtful men that any compromise made as to preference in a gubernatorial candidate should be made upward and not downward, on a stronger man rather than a weaker. With this idea in mind there has been a directing of attention toward Mr. Harris Weinstock. He is not a candidate and not in politics, and never has been, further than to discharge the civic duties pertaining to citizenship, and yet no man in the state has taken a keener interest in public affairs. He is able to serve the people as governor without great personal sacrifice inasmuch as he has retired from active business with a comfortable fortune. He made that fortune here in California by square dealing and patient industry. No taint attaches to a dollar of his. He has been a model employer and a model citizen. He knows his state and its people and they know him and respect him. While he is not a "glad-hander" he is a good talker and would make a governor of whom California would come to be proud. On moral issues he is a rock. His ideals are high. His name should not be dismissed from the mind without the most careful consideration. A compromise on Harris Weinstock would be upward and not down, on a stronger man, not a weaker.

Other Candidates Being Talked Of

Phil Stanton, a whirlwind campaigner, by the way, is fighting for the Republican nomination for governor with characteristic energy. He is making hay down south whether the sun shines or not and he is not without popularity in his own bailiwick. It is improbable that he has received any positive assurances from the head of the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau, but he would hardly have ventured to enter the field without at least some encouragement from that quarter. Alden Anderson is now looked upon as the most likely man to receive the "organization" backing "unbeknownst" of course to Alden Anderson. He is thought to be the man who can best bind up the party's wounds, being neither very fat nor very lean, very subservient nor very independent, very strong nor very weak, a reputable gentleman of good parts who has filled many responsible positions acceptably and always without antagonizing the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company or seeming to be very closely allied with it. Of course all candidates for gubernatorial honors, this year, whether Democrat or Republican, will swear that they will not know that there is such a thing as the Southern Pacific Political Bureau, and Mr. Anderson may be relied on to take the test oath along with the rest. It will be remembered with what pious fervor James N. Gillett so asseverated four years ago, and how George Knight, with less of piety but greater vehemence, affirmed that it was so, but after election it was different. Meantime Charles F. Curry is sawing wood. If Stanton can draw some good votes away from the Lincoln-Roosevelt candidate in the south, and Anderson in the north, and Curry can get all the bad ones north and south he may be "it." Of course The Watchman would not charge either Stanton or Anderson with being party to such a conspiracy, but there is not man born of woman that the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company will not bray as in a mortar in order to hold the reins of the government of California in its own hands. If that bureau is not trying to name the Lincoln-Roosevelt candidate also, then is The Watchman mistaken again.

Success In Los Angeles Nerves to New Efforts

Southern California will put forth great efforts this year to send to the state legislature an unusual group of men. The success of the Good Government movement inspired the south with confidence. In every legislative district the anti-machine forces are organizing for the permanent redemption of California from Southern Pacific control. Special attention is being paid to the senate. In every southern district there are excellent prospects that a high-grade man will be presented at the primaries in opposition to the railroad's candidate. In the thirtieth district, which includes Inyo and San Bernardino counties, two names are prominently mentioned for the senate, A. C. Denman, Jr., of Redlands, candidate of the "organization," and Dr. W. F. Burke of Ontario, of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League. Doctor Burke represents the most substantial and progressive type of citizen. He was formerly chairman of the San Bernardino County Republican Central Committee, in which capacity he performed noble service for the league in the primary campaign a year ago. His election would be a most felicitous change in that district. Of that "smart boy," Willis, this state has grown exceedingly weary.

Straight Issue of Right Man vs. Wrong

The thirty-fourth district, Los Angeles, probably will be contested by Assemblyman Leeds, representing the machine, and A. J. Wallace, standing for the decent element within the Republican party. Leeds made about as bad a record at the last session as he had time to make. He voted wrong on about every important issue and went further than the average time-serving machine politician would have dared to go to render the direct primary law as nearly worthless as possible. He ought never again to be chosen to fill a place where he can do so much mischief in a short time as he can in the senate. Mr. Wallace, on the other hand, has to his credit the best record made by any member of the Los Angeles city council, which went out of power last month. As chairman of the council finance committee he stood like Gibraltar in defense of the city treasury. On his feet he is a quick thinker, which makes him an able debater. He would be one of the biggest men ever sent to the senate from any district in the state, and would make a splendid floor leader for the progressive Republicans.

McCartney Spared Just as Well as Not

In the thirty-eighth district Senator McCartney, of mother-in-law notoriety, is said to be out for reelection. He is a deputy in the office of the district attorney of Los Angeles county. His opponent probably will be Leslie R. Hewitt, city attorney of Los Angeles. It has been found necessary for Los Angeles to send its city attorney to Sacramento in the interest of legislation affecting the city. People feel that it will promote Mr. Hewitt's efficiency to send him to the capital as a senator rather than as a watchdog stationed without the sacred portals of the legislative halls. Under ordinary circumstances the thirty-eighth would be a hard district for an independent Republican, but so highly qualified and so popular is Hewitt that it is the general opinion that he will have little trouble in bowling McCartney over. Hewitt is thoroughly wise to the political game, and the most expert players sent to Sacramento by the push would find in him a man who could neither be bluffed nor cajoled.

It Is Sloane's Duty To Beat Leroy Wright

In the fortieth district Senator Leroy Wright appears to be in a receptive mood toward re-nomination. Feelers were put out to test his availability for the lieutenant-governorship; but he evidently has become convinced that the people of the state are not inclined to indorse his record in the legislature. Hichborn's History of the Legislature of 1909, which is being widely read nowadays, discloses the fact that Wright's record on measures regarded as issues between the people and the Southern Pacific machine is not such as to entitle him to confidence. The better element within the party in his district is determined to put in his place a man who is known to be right on the big essential questions and who will be able to present in good form the claims of San Diego for state aid for the Panama-California Exposition. There is a growing feeling that Judge W. A. Sloane is the man for the place. He is one of the strongest men of Southern California, a man of dignity, of high ideals, with a high regard for those progressive principles of government for which the people generally are contending. His nomination and election would entail considerable personal sacrifice on his part, but the friends of better government in his district will leave no word unsaid in their efforts to gain his consent to become a candidate.

A Straight Man and A Straight Record

In the thirty-sixth district Charles W. Bell will be returned without serious opposition. Hichborn's History of the Legislature of 1909 places the name of Bell at the head of the list of senate desirables. Senator Bell enjoys the enviable distinction of not having voted wrong on a single issue between the people and the machine. Senator Bell appears to have given up the idea, if he himself ever seriously cherished it, of making the race for secretary of state, which, perhaps, is to be regretted. Of all the candidates so far suggested for secretary of state, Senator Bell, and he alone, is a big enough man to hold that office. Any man who is big enough to be secretary of state is big enough to be governor.

Grove Johnson's Seat Will Be Contested

It will be good news to those who stand for good politics and good lawmaking in this state to know that Grove L. Johnson's seat in the assembly is to be contested. The contestant is to be Charles A. Bliss, a youngish attorney of Sacramento who stands well, and the odds are thought to be on the side of Bliss. The fight may not be wholly on organization and anti-organization lines, but rather Johnson or anti-Johnson. In other words there are organization men who are likely to support

Bliss in the knowledge that Johnson is not so much an organization man as he is a Johnson. This is not saying that Johnson is ever in sincerity an anti-organization man. Bliss is well vouched for as straight, and there will be Bliss in the legislature, and in Sacramento, too, if Bliss is elected, whereat many an organization man will laugh in his sleeve. Grove L. Johnson has served the public too long if not too faithfully and all who believe in Right Things will rejoice if the seventeenth assembly district shall, in the plenitude of its wisdom, conclude to leave him at home this time and ever after.

The Status of Curry Keeps All Guessing

The exact attitude of the "organization" toward Charles F. Curry as a candidate for governor continues to be a subject of gossip in all places where politicians meet. It is a capital topic for gossip, too, because it is full of complexities and contradictions. Ordinarily it is assumed that any thorough machine politician is likely to be acceptable to the organization when in quest of candidates, and everyone knows that Curry is a machinist; yet ever since his candidacy for governor began to assume the look of reality there have been evidences of marked aversion to him on the part of the organization. At first this was generally regarded as a politic pretense, and it was quite commonly believed that a month or two more would see the organization reposing lovingly in Mr. Curry's arms; but two or three months have gone by, Governor Gillett has removed himself from the list of candidates, and there is no sign that the aversion has grown less. According to one story, Mr. Herrin left word when he started on his recent trip to New York that in no event should his lieutenants come out for Curry for governor, because he was a "dangerous man." In what sense dangerous, if this story be true, the hearer is left to guess, save that one report had it that Mr. Herrin thought Mr. Curry could not be elected if nominated. Another theory is that the chief of the organization considers Curry too much of an organizer to be trusted; that is to say, an organizer who, if given a good opportunity, would set up for himself and decline to recognize any higher authority in push politics. One of these guesses may be as good as the other, and the reader is welcome to take his choice, unless he prefers to think there may be some truth in both hypotheses. But, at any rate, there is, so far, no co-operation between Curry and the organization. As to what may come hereafter, that is a different matter.

Politicians Are Slow Catching the New Idea

The inability of the ordinary politician to realize that the direct primary law has made a real change in the way in which politics must be done in this state receives an illustration almost every day in the so-called news printed in the newspapers. For example, here is the Chronicle saying that the San Bernardino county politicians, who had been planning to secure three places on the state ticket, have decided it would be beyond their power to obtain so much; therefore they have decided to drop Judge Oster, who aspired to a supreme court nomination, and Jeff. McElvaine, who desired to succeed himself as member of the State Board of Equalization, and will concentrate upon Walter Wagner as candidate for secretary of state. Here we have the politician thinking in the terms of the old politics because he cannot comprehend the new. In the old days of delegates and convention trading the San Bernardino politicians would have done just the thing which is now attributed to them, and it would have been the only way of securing nomination for a local man; it would have been easy to do, since any acknowledged boss could order a candidate off the track and enforce his order. But that is all over with now; anyone can run for a state office who can get his petition signed and pay $50, and not all the bosses in creation can say him nay. Neither will it matter whether three candidates hail from San Bernardino or whether only one does so; it is not probable that Judge Oster or Mr. McElvaine, by running for the offices they want, could diminish the number of votes Mr. Wagner would get, or vice versa. To the old-time convention manipulator this will seem sad, but it is true and he must make up his mind to submit to a change which will appear to him, in the first bitterness of his grief, when he fully comprehends it, the total ruination of the game of politics.

Heney Will Not As He Ought Not

Mr. Francis J. Heney has definitely stated in a telegram to the editor of the Fresno Republican that he will not be a candidate for governor of California. There are many who will be disappointed in his determination, but there really is a limit to the demands which the public has a right to make of Mr. Heney. He gave three of the most strenuous years of a most strenuous life to the public service without one dollar of compensation from any source, and he came very near to giving his life, too. He did give his health, his strength and his nervous energies and he must have time in which to recuperate, physically, nervously, and he ought to financially. If he were the only man in California who could make the issue plain between those who stand for corporation rule and those who do not, if he were the only man who could stand the strain of corporate pressure, it would be different, but he is not. Hiram Johnson could stand that strain and make the needful personal sacrifice. Chester H. Rowell could do it and so could William R. Davis, but a straight issue must be drawn by a man as straight as the issue. The Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League movement can stand it to be beaten, but it cannot suffer a compromise to be made without consequences certain to prove fatal.

Frank Putnam Flint Brought squarely up Out of the Fight

Brought squarely up against the proposition, to be or not to be a candidate for reelection to the United States senate, Frank Putnam Flint has decided not to be. The decision was wise, but, as elsewhere shown, the reason given for it was neither proper nor adequate. We do not want a man for senator who will deliberately violate the law limiting the expenditure to be incurred in becoming senator, and if Frank Flint could be elected to the senate by expending $2,580, the sum allowed to be expended in the primary election where the fight would be, he would not let that sum block his way. Therefore we look elsewhere than to the expense of making the race for a reason for not making it. Perhaps Senator Flint does not like the senatorial job. Perhaps he spoke frankly when he declared that he wanted to devote the next few years to making money. Perhaps he has the sagacity to know that this is not going to be a good year for going before the people wearing a Sunset Route design stamped all over him. His indisposition to being financed and put through the mills of the Southern Pacific gods has developed within the last half dozen years, for not even he himself will deny that it was that influence that made him United States senator five years ago. Whatever the reason he is out of it anyhow, for which the Lord be thankit. Now for a man of real senatorial size to take his place! Who shall he be?

When the Primary Came In The Frank Flints Went Out

Senator Flint, in his letter explaining why he will not be a candidate for reelection; says the new conditions created by the direct primary law make it necessary to have a personal machine in every county in the state and he has not the money to pay for the upbuilding of such a machine in his interest. Consider this for a moment; it will repay thought. Senator Flint assumes that the voters would have no natural interest in voting for him or for any other given candidate—that is, would not voluntarily go to the polls and vote for him; they are to be rounded up, organized, drilled and finally marched to the polls on primary day and voted by persons who must be hired for the purpose. In other words, according to Senator Flint, the people of California, left to themselves, have no capacity to decide whom they want for United States senator and to vote for him; they are incapable of making a choice except as they are operated upon by a political machine. That the junior senator should think this is significant; it shows the effect of the school in which he was trained; he is a perfect product of the Southern Pacific Republican machine. He knows no way, he can conceive no way, in which politics might be done save the way in which he has been brought up to do politics. But, in a sense, Senator Flint is right, after all, because henceforth it will be well nigh impossible for men such as he to be nominated for United States senators; the only available candidates will be those who have some hold upon public confidence based on public service and recognition of their independence of machines, corporations and push politics. When the direct primary came in the opportunity for the Frank Flints went out.

MORE LIGHT ON COMPULSORY VOTING

SOME OBJECTIONS ANSWERED; AND ITS PRACTICAL OPERATION IN EUROPE.

By A. B. NYE, State Controller.

An excellent general statement of the reasons for compulsory voting was given by Mr. Courtenay De Kalb, who broke ground for this reform in his recent paper before the Commonwealth Club, and from which I quote the following:

Lack of participation is the great evil of popular government—the desire to have rights without duties, the unwillingness to sacrifice personal convenience for the sake of a better conduct of affairs. . . . We have demonstrated the power for good of popular suffrage. It has become the corner-stone of independence, but it is also a ready means for working incalculable harm unless the whole mass of voters exercise the right. The only safeguard of a right is the consistent use of it. If we do not use it, some one else will, and that leaves open the door to abuse. The protection of the state involves the exercise of the suffrage by all who are entitled to it. The non-voter is a greater danger than the violent partisan. How to awaken his sense of responsibility has always been a difficult problem. The Socialists who chant l'Internationale have probably given the cue:

"No rights without duties;
No duties without rights."

Objections to Compulsory Voting Answered.

Following this comprehensive summary, we cannot do better than to enumerate and answer such arguments as have been advanced against compulsory suffrage. It is said that such a thing would be illogical, because the very idea of voting involves voluntary choice, and moreover a voter may be conscientiously opposed to all of the candidates offered. Again, if voting is to be enforced by law, there must be a punishment for those who neglect to perform their duty, and no one has yet been able to suggest a penalty which is practicable. But more than this, no evil exists great enough to justify the application of a drastic remedy, since the duty of voting is fairly well performed; the vote cast is nearly always representative, and a larger vote would seldom if ever change results materially.
